T.N. THE TRANSLATOR TO THE READER.

GOod Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English, M. Caluines booke of the institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluine first wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of small volume, and since that season he hath at sundrie times published it with newe encreases, still protesting at euery edition himselfe to bee one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing doe growe in profiting, and with their profiting doe proceede in writing. At length hauing in many his other workes trauailed about exposition of sundry bookes of the Scriptures, and in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him and not in any other Methode, were not so ready for the readers vse, hee therefore entred into this purpose to enlarge this booke of Institutions, and therin to treat of al those titles and common places largely, with this entent, that whensoeuer any occasion fell in his other bookes to treate of any such cause, he woulde not newly amplifie his bookes of commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholie to this storehouse and treasure of that sort of diuine learning. As age and weakenesse grewe vpon him, so hee hastened his labour, and according to his petition to God, he in manner ended his life with his worke, for he liued not long after. So great a iewell was meete to be made most beneficiall that is to say, applied to most common vse. Therefore in the very beginning of the Queenes maiesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the church of Christ, at the speciall request of my deere friendes of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe and Edward Whitchurch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrewe, Greeke, & Latine tongues the other her highnes printer of the bookes of common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my said friende Edward Whitchurch, a man well knowen of vpright heart and dealing, an auncient zealous Gospeller, as plaine and true a friend as euer I knewe liuing, and as desirous to doe any thing to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my said first edition of this booke, I considered howe the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plentie of matter in small rome of wordes, yea and those so circumspectly and precisely ordered, to auoid the cauillations of such, as for enmitie to the truth therein conteyned, would gladly seeke & abuse all aduantages which might be found by any ouersight in penning of it, that the sentences were therby become so ful as nothing might well be added without idle ſuperfluity, and againe ſo nicely pared that nothing coulde bee miniſhed without taking away ſome neceſſarie ſubſtance of matter therein expreſſed. This maner of writing, beſide the peculiar tearmes of artes and figures, and the difficulty of the matters thẽſelues, being throughout inrerlaced with the ſchoolemens cõtrouerſies, made a great hardnes in the authors owne booke, in that tongue wherein otherwiſe he is both plentifull and eaſie, inſomuch that it ſufficeth not to reade him once, vnleſſe you can be content to reade in vaine. This conſideration encombred me with great doubtfulneſſe for the whole order and frame of my tranſlation. If I ſhould follow the wordes, I ſawe that of neceſſity the hardneſſe in the tranſlation muſt needes be greater than was in the tongue wherein it was originally written. If I ſhoulde leaue the courſe of wordes, and graunt my ſelfe liberty after the natural manner of my owne tongue, to ſay that in Engliſh which I conceaued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainely perceiued howe hardely I might eſcape errour, and on the other ſide in this matter of faith and religion, howe perilous it was to erre. For I durſt not preſume to warrant my ſelfe to haue his meaning without his wordes. And they that wote what it is to tranſlate well and faithfully, ſpecially in matters of religiõ, do know that not the onely grãmaticall conſtruction of words ſufficeth, but the very building & order to obſerue all aduantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of wordes, maketh much to the true ſetting foorth of a writers minde. In the ende, I reſted vpon this determination, to followe the words ſo neere as the phraſe of the Engliſh tongue woulde ſuffer mee. Which purpoſe I ſo perfourmed, that if the Engliſh booke were printed in ſuch paper and letter as the Latine is, it ſhould not exceede the Latine in quantitie. Whereby, beſide all other commodities that a faithfull tranſlation of ſo good a worke may bring, this one benefite is moreouer prouided for ſuch as are deſirous to attaine ſome knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be wiſhed in many of thoſe men for whoſe profeſſion this booke moſt fitly ſerueth) that they ſhall not finde any more Engliſh than ſhall ſuffice to conſtrue the Latine withall, except in ſuch fewe places, where the great difference of the phraſes of the languages enforced me: ſo that comparing the one with the other, they ſhall both profit in good matter, and furniſh themſelues with vnderſtanding of that ſpeache, wherein the greateſt treaſures of knowledge are diſcloſed. In the doing hereof, I did not onely truſt mine owne wit or abilitie, but examined my whole doing from ſentence to ſentence throughout the whole booke with conference and ouerlooking of ſuch learned mẽ, as my tranſlation being allowed by their iudgement, I did both ſatisfie mine owne conſcience that I had done truely, and their approuing of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing ſhould herein be deliuered him but ſound, vnmingled, and vncorrupted doctrine, euen in ſuch ſort as the author himſelfe had firſt framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned and vertuous man M. Dauid Whitehed (whome I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining euery ſentence throughout the whole booke. Beſide all this, I priuately required many and generally all men with whome I euer had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truely translated, or not plainely Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amend it. Since which time I haue not bene aduertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession being otherwise occupied any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause, why not onely at the second and thirde time but also at this impression, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In deede I perceiued many men wel minded and studious of this booke, to require a table for their ease and furtherance. Their honest desire I haue fulfilled in the second edition, and haue added thereto a plentifull table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters discourſed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and vnder euerie title is set foorth a briefe summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke concerning the matter belonging to that title or common place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, and Section or diuision of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and proued. And for the redier finding thereof, I haue caused the number of the Chapters to bee set vpon euery leafe in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsuall figures of Algorisme. And now at this last publishing, my friendes by whose charge it is now newly imprinted in a Romane letter and smaller volume, with diuerse other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your benefite. Moreouer, whereas in the first edition the euill maner of my scribling hand, the enterlining of my Copy, and some other causes well knowen among workemen of that faculty, made very many faults to passe the Printer, I haue in the second impression caused the booke to be composed by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needes be that it was much more truely done than the other was, as I my selfe doe knowe aboue three hundred faults amended. And nowe at this last Printing, the cõposing after a printed copy bringeth some ease, & the diligẽce vsed about the correction, hauing bene right faithfully looked vnto, it cãnot be but much more truly set forth. This also is performed, ỹ the volume being smaller, with a letter faire & legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common vse, and so to more large communicating of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instruction of their faith, and guiding of their duties. Thus on the printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commoditie (good Readers) is prouided for. Nowe resteth your owne diligence for your owne profite in studying it. To spend many wordes in commending the worke it selfe, were needlesse: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vntruly and not vainly say, that though many great learned men haue written bookes of common places of our religion, as Melanchton, Sarcerius, and other, whose workes are verie good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the consenting iudgement of those that vnderstand the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Caluine, both for his substantiall sufficiencie of doctrine, the sound declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deepe and strong confutation of all olde and newe hereſies: ſo that (the holy Scriptures excepted) this is one of the moſt profitable bookes for all ſtudents of Chriſtis diuinitie. Wherein (good Readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefite, that you may haue this profite of my trauel, ſo I beſeech you let me haue this vſe of your gentleneſſe, that my doings may be conſtrued to ſuch good end as I haue meant them: and that if any thing miſlike you by reaſon of hardneſſe, or any other cauſe that may ſeeme to be my default, you wil not forthwith condemne the work, but read it ofter: in which doing you will finde (as many haue confeſſed to me that they haue found by experience) that thoſe things which at the firſt reading ſhall diſpleaſe you for hardneſſe, ſhall be found ſo eaſie as ſo hard matter would ſuffer, and for the moſt part more eaſie than ſome other phraſe which ſhould with greater looſeneſſe and ſmother ſliding away deceiue your vnderſtanding. I confeſſe indeede it is not finely and pleaſantly written, nor carieth with it ſuch delitefull grace of ſpech as ſome great wiſe men haue beſtowed vpon ſome fooliſher thinges, yet it conteineth ſound trueth ſet footh with faithfull plainneſſe without wrong done to the authors meaning: and ſo if you accept and vſe it, you ſhal not faile to haue great profit thereby, and I ſhall thinke my labour verie well imployed.

Thomas Norton.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING THE French King his soueraigne Lord, Iohn Caluine wisheth peace and saluation in Christ.

WHen I did first set my hande to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble King) than to write anie thing that afterward shoulde be presented to your maiestie. Onelie my mind was to teach certaine introductions, wherby they that are touched with some zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlines. And this trauaile I tooke principallie for my contrimen the Frenchmen, of whom I vnderstood very manie to hunger & thirst for Christ, but I saw verie few that had rightlie receiued so much as anie litle knowledge of him. And that this was my meaning, the booke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceiued, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre preuailed in your realme, that in it there is no roome for sound doctrine: I thought I should do a thing worth my trauaile, all in one worke both to giue an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: wherebie ye may learne what maner of doctrine that is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this daie trouble your realme with sword & fire. For I will not feare to confesse, that I haue in this worke comprehended in manner the summe of that selfe same doctrine against which they crie out, that it ought to be punished with prisonment, banishment, condemnation without iudgement, and with fire, that it ought to be chased awaie by land and sea. I knowe in deede with how hainous informations they haue filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to weight, that there shalbe no innocence, neither in wordes nor deedes, if it may be enough to accuse. Truelie if anie, to bring the same in hatred shall alledge that this doctrine whereof I nowe go about to yeelde account vnto you, hath beene long ago condemned by consent of all degrees, and attainted by manie iudgements alreadie giuen in iudicial courts, al that he saith shal amounte to no more but that it hath partlie bin violentlie throwen downe by the banding & power of the aduersaries thereof, & partlie bin traiterouslie & fraudulentlie oppressed with their lies and suttle practises & slaunders. Herein is violence shewed that without hearing the cause, blodie sentences are pronoūced against it: therein is fraud, that it is without deserning accused of sedition & euil doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfullie cōplaine of these things, you your selfe can beare vs witnes, most noble king, with how lying slanders it is dailie accused vnto you: as, that it tendeth to no other ende but to wrish from kings their sceptres out of their handes, to throwe downe all iudges seates and iudgements, to subuerte all orders and ciuil gouernments, to trouble the peace and quiet of the people, to abolish all lawes, to vndoe all proprieties and possessions, finallie to turne all thinges vpside downe. And yet you heare the smallest portion. For horrible thinges they spread abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole worlde might worthilie iudge it with the maintainers thereof, worthie of a thousand fiers and gallows. Who can now marueil that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongful accusations are beleeued? Lo, this is the cause that al degrees agree & conspire to the condemning of vs & our doctrine. They that sit to iudge, being ravished with this affection pronounce for sentēces their foreconceived determinations which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they haue well enough discharged their duetie, if they commaund no man to be drawen to execution, but such as are found guilty either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnesse. But of what faults? of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what lawe condemned? Herein should haue stand the succour of defence for them, not to denie the doctrine is selfe, but to maintaine is for true. But here is all libertie once to mutter, vtterly cut off from vs.

Wherefore I doe not vniustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your owne hand the whole hearing of the cause which hitherto hath bene troublesomely handled or rather carelesly tossed without all order of lawe, more by outragious heate than iudiciall grauitie. Neither yet thinke, that I here goe about to make mine owne priuate defense, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe returne into my native countrie, to which although I beare such affection of naturall loue as becommeth me: yet as the case nowe is, I not miscontentedly want it. But I take vpon mee the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himselfe, which at this day hauing bene by all meanes torne & troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in dispaired case, and that in deede rather by the tyrannie of certaine Pharises than by your owne knowledge. But how that cōmeth to passe, it is not here needeful to tell: truely it lieth in great distres. For thus farre haue the vngodly preuailed, that the trueth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vnregarded: as for the silly poore Church, it is either wasted with cruel slaughters, and so driuen away with banishments, or dismayed with threatens and terrors, that it dare not once open her mouth. And yet still they continue with such rage & fiercenes as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall alreadie bending and the ruine which themselues haue made. In the meane time no man steppeth forth, to set him selfe in defense against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fauour the trueth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskilfulnesse of ignorant men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and vnskilfulnesse which they know to be the most certaine trueth of God: calling them ignorant me, whose wits they see that Christ hath not so despised but that he hath vouchsaued to communicate to them the mysteries, of his heauenly wisedome. So much are all ashamed of the Gospel. It shalbe your office (most noble King) not to turne away your eares nor your minde from so iust a defense: specially when so great a matter is in question: namelie how the glorie of God may be maintained safe in earth, how the trueth of God may keepe her honor, howe Christ may haue his kingdome preserued whole among vs. This is a matter worthie for your eares, worthy for your iudgements, worthy for your royal throne. For, euen this thought maketh a true king to acknowledge himselfe in the gouernance of his kingdome to be the minister of God. Neither doth he now vse a kingdome but a robberie which reigneth not to this end that he may serue the glorie of God. And he is deceiued that looketh for a long prosperitie of that kingdome, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holy word: forasmuch as the heauenly Oracle Prouer. 29. 18. can not proue vaine, whereby it is proclaimed, that the people shalbe scattered abroade where prophecie falleth. Neither ought the contemps of our baseneſſe to withdrawe you from this purpose. We verily knowe right well, howe poore and abiect silly men wee bee, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persons, yea and (if you will) certaine excrements and outcastes of the worlde, or whatsoeuer viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for vs to glorie vpon before God, but his onely mercie whereby we are without any our deseruing receiued into the hope of eternall saluation: and before men, nothing but our weakenes, which among them it is taken for a most great shame to confesse so much as in countenance. But our doctrine must be aduanced hie aboue all glorie of the world, must stand vnuanquishable aboue all power: because it is not ours, but the doctrine of the liuing God and of his Christ, whome the Father hath appointed king to beare rule euen from sea to sea, and from the riuers euen to the endes of the earth: and so to beare rule, that striking the whole earth with the onely rod of his mouth, he may breake it with all the iron and brasen strength, with all the golden and siluer glistering thereof, as it were potters vessels: as the propheses propheeie of the roialtie of his kingdome. Our aduersaries in deede do crie out to the contrarie, and say that we falsly pretende the worde of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not onely a malicious sclaunder, but also a notable shamelesnes, you your selfe by reading our confession, may according to your vvisedome iudge. Yet here it is also good to say somewhat, either to moue you to willingneste and heedefulnesse, or at the least to prepare you a vvay to the reading of it. Paul, when he willed all propheeie to be framed to the agreeableneste of faith, hath set a most sure rule wherby the expounding of Scripture ought to be tried. Now if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is alreadie in our hands. For what doth better or more fitlie agree with faith, than to acknowledge our selues naked of al vertue, that of God we may be clothed? empty of al good, that of him we may be filled? the bondseruãts of sin, that of him we may be made free? blind that of him we may be enlightned? lame, that of him we may be made streight? feeble, that of him we may be vpholde? to take from our selues al matter of glorying, that he alone may be glorious on hie, & in him vve may glorie? When we say theste & such like things, they interrupt vs & crie out, that by this meane is ouerthrovven Free vvote, not vvhat blinde light of nature, fained preparations, free vvill, vvorkes meritorius of eternal saluation, together vvith their supererogations: because they cannot abide that the vvhole praise and glorie of all goodnes, vertue, righteousnes, and vvisedome should remaine in God. But vve read not that they vvere blamed that haue drawen too much out of the fountaine of liuing vvater: on the contrarie side they are sharpely rebuked vvhich haue digged to themselues pittes, broken pittes, vvhich are not able to holde vvater. Againe, vvhat is more agreeable vvith faith, than to promise to themselues that God will be to them a fauourable Father, vvhere Christ is acknovvledged to be a brother and procurer of fauour? than assuredly to looke for all things ioyfull and prosperous at his hand, vvhose vnspeakeable loue tovvard vs hath proceeded so farre, that he hath not spared his onely begotten sonne, but that he gaue him for vs? than to rest in sure looking for saluation & eternall life, vvhere vve thinke vpon Christ giuen of the Father, in vvhom such treasures are hidden? Here they steppe in against vs, and crie out that this certaintie of affiance is not vvithout arrogancie & presumption. But as nothing of our selues, so all thinges ought vve to presume of God: and vve are for none other reason spoiled of vaine glorie, but that vve should learne to glorie in the Lorde. What is there more? Consider (most mightie Prince) all the parts of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kinde of vvicked men, vnlesse you plainely finde that vve are in trouble and railed at, because vve put our trust in the liuing God: because vve beleeue that this is the eternall life, to knovve one true God, and him vvhome he hath sent Jesus Christ. For this hope, some of vs are bounde in irons, some are vvhipped, some are carried about in mockage, some are condemned without iudgement, some are most cruellie tormented, some escape away by flight: but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terriblie accursed, torne with slanders, and handled in most hainous wise. Now look vpon our aduersaries (I speake of the degree of Priestes, at whose becke and will the other exercise enimitie against vs) and consider with me a little while, with what zeal they be carried. As for the true religion, which is taught in the scriptures, and which ought to be holden certaine among all men, they easilie giue leaue both to themselues and other to be ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it: and they thinke that it maketh small matter what euerie man beleeue or not beleeue concerning God and Christ, so that he do with an vnexpressed faith (as they call it) submit his mind to the iudgement of the Church: neither are they much moued, if it happen that the glorie of God bee defiled with manifest blasphemies, so that no man lift vp his finger against the supremacie of the Apostolike sea, and authoritie of our holie mother the Church. Why therefore doe they with so great cruelti e and fiercenesse fight for the Masse, Purgatorie, Pilgrimages, and such trifles, so farre foorth, that they say that without suche expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these thinges, godlinesse can not stande, whereas yet they proue not that any of these things come out of the word of God: Why so, but because their belly is their God, their kitchen is their religion: which beeing taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them do plenteously glut themselues, & other some line with gnawing of poore crustes, yet they line all of one Pot, which without these warming helpes should not onely waxe colde, but also throughlie freese. Therefore how much more euerie of them is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warrier he is for their faith. Finallie they all endeuour themselues to this, to keepe still either both kingdome safe, and their bellie full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth amie token, be it neuer so little. Neither yet so doe they cease to slaunder our doctrine, and by all the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it new, and lately forged: they cauill that it is doubtfull, & vncertaine: they demaunde by what miracles it is confirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it should preuaile against the consent of so many holie fathers, and the most ancient custome: they presse vpon vs to confesse it to be schismaticall, which moueth warre against the Church, or that the Churche hath lien deade in manie ages in which no such thing hath beene heard of. Last of al they saie that there neede no arguments, for (saie they) it maie by the fruites be iudged of what sort it is, namelie which hath bred so hugie a heape of sects, so manie turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnes of vices. Truelie full easie it is for them, to triumph vpon a forsaken cause before the light beleeuing & ignorant multitude. But if wee might also haue our turn likewise allowed vs to speak, verilie this sharp heat would soone be cooled wherwith they do so with ful mouth & as licentiouslie as vnpunishedly fome against vs.

First, whereas they call it newe, they do great wrong to God, whose holie worde deserued not to be accused of newnesse. To them in deede I nothing doubt that it is newe, to whome Christe is newe, & his Gospell is newe. But they which knewe that preaching of Paul to be olde, that Iesus Christ died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification, shall finde nothing new among vs. Whereas it hath long lyen hidden vnknown, and buried: that is the fault of the vngodlinesse of men. Now sith it is by the bountifulnesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution of receiue againe the title of auncientie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignoraunce springeth this, that they take it for doubt-doubtfull and vncertaine. This verily is it which the Lord by his prophet complaineth, that the oxe knewe his owner, and the aſſe his maiſters ſtall, but his people knew not him. But howſoeuer they mocke at the vncertaintie of it: if they were driuen to ſeale their owne doctrine with their owne bloud, & with loſſe of their life, men might ſee how much they ſet by it. But farre other is our aſſiance, which dreadeth neither the terrors of death, nor yet the very iudgement ſeate of God. Eſay.1.3.

Whereas they require miracles of vs, they deale vnreaſonably with vs. For we coine no newe Goſpell, but holde faſt the ſelfe ſame Goſpell for confirming of the trueth whereof all the miracles do ſerue that euer Chriſt and his Apoſtles haue done. But this thing they haue ſpeciall aboue vs, that they can euen to this day confirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alleadge miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwiſe wel ſtabliſhed: they are ſo either triflinge and worthy to be laughed at, or vain & lying. And yet, although they were neuer ſo monſtrous, they ought not to haue ben of any value againſt the worde of God: foraſmuch as the name of God ought both in euerie place & at euerie time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by naturall order of things. This falſe colour might peraduenture haue made the better ſhewe, if the Scripture did not informe vs of the lawfull end and vſe of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the ſignes which followed the preaching of the Apoſtles were ſet foorth for the confirming of it: Likewiſe Luke alſo ſaith that the Lorde did beare witneſſe to the worde of his grace, when ſignes and wonders were ſhewed by the handes of the Apoſtles. Wherwith wholly agreeth that ſaying of the Apoſtle, that when the Goſpel was preached, ſaluation was confirmed by this, that the Lord did beare witneſſe to it with ſignes, and wonders, and diuers powers. But thoſe things which we heare to be the ſealings of the Goſpel, ſhal we turne to the deſtroying of the credit of the Goſpel? thoſe thinges which are appointed onely to ſtabliſh the trueth, ſhal we apply to confirming of lyes? Therefore it is meete that the doctrine, which (as the Euangeliſt ſaith) goeth before miracles, bee firſt examined and tried. If that be allowed, then is may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Chriſt teacheth) this is the marke, if it tende not to the ſeeking of the glorie of men, but of God. Sith Chriſt affirmeth this to be the proofe of doctrine, miracles are wrongfully eſteemed which are drawen to any other ende than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remember that Sathan hath his miracles, which although they be iuggling deceites rather than true powers, yet are ſuch as may deceiue the ignorant & vnskilful. Magicians & enchanters haue bin alwaie famous in miracles: wonderfull miracles haue nouriſhed idolatrie: which yet do not proue to vs, that the ſuperſtition of Magicians & idolaters is lawful. And with this battering ramme in old time the Donatiſts did ſhake the ſimplicitie of the cõmon people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therfore we do now make the ſame anſwer to our aduerſaries, which Auguſtine then made to the Donatiſtes: that the Lord hath made vs ware againſt ſuch miracle workers, when he foreſolde that there ſhould come falſe prophetes, which with lying ſignes & diuerſe wonders, ſhould if it were poſſible, bring the elect into errour. And Paul hath giuen warning that the kingdom of Antichriſt ſhould be with all power, & ſignes, & lying wonders. But theſe miracles (ſay they) are done not of idols, not of ſorcerers, not of falſe prophets, but of the Saints. As though we knew not that this is the craft of ſatã, to transfigure himſelf into an angel of light. In old time the Ægyptians worſhipped Ieremy which was buried among the, with ſacrifices & other diuine honors. Did not they abuſe the holie prophet of God to idolatrie? And yet by ſuch worſhipping of his tomb, they obteined that they thought the healing of the ſtinging of the ſer- In Ioh. tract.93 Mar.24.24. 1.Theſ 2.9. 2.Cor.11.14. Hieron. in præfa. Ieiem.

pents to be the iust reward thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath beene and euer shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that haue not receiued the loue of trueth, that they may beleeue lying? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, and not subiect to cauillations. As for miracles which they bring foorth for themselues, they are meere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead awaie the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanitie.

2. Thes. 2. 11.

Moreouer, they doe slaunderously set the Fathers against vs (I meane the auncient Fathers & the writers of the age as yet more vncorrupted) as though they had them for maintainers of their vngodlinesse: by whose authoritie if the debate were to bee ended, the better part of the victorie (to speake euen most modestlie) woulde bende to our side. But whereas manie thinges haue beene excellentlie well and wiselie written of those Fathers, & in some things, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good naturall children forsooth, according to the rightnesse that they haue, both of wit, iudgement, and minde, doe worship onelie their faultes and errours: and those thinges which are well spoken, they either marke not, or faine as if they knewe them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may saie that their care was altogether to gather dung in the golde of the Fathers. Then they oppresse vs with importunate crying out against vs, as despisers and enimies of the Fathers. But wee doe so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I coulde verie easilie proone by their consenting voices, the greater part of these thinges that we say at this daie. But we so reade their writings, that we alwaie remember, that all thinges are ours, to serue vs, not to haue dominion euer vs: and that wee are Christes alone, whome wee must obeie in all thinges without exception. Who so keepeth not this choise, shall haue nothing certaine in Religion: forasmuch as those holie men were ignorant of manie thinges, do oftentimes striue one with another, yea and sometimes fight with themselues.

1. Cor. 3. 21.

Not without cause (saie they) we are warned of Salomō, that we passe not the old bounds which our Fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the bounding of fieldes, and the obedience of Faith, which ought to bee so framed that it forget her people and the house of her father. If they haue so great delight to vse allegories, why doe they not rather expound the Apostles, than anie other, to be their fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to plucke vp: for so did Hierome expounde it, whose wordes they haue registred among their Canons. But if they wil haue the bounds of the same fathers, whom they meane, to be stedfastlie kept: why do they so oft as they list, so licentiously passe them?

Prou. 22. 28. Psal. 45. 11.

Of the number of the fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, & that therfore he needeth neither cups nor dishes: the other saide, that the holy things require not gold, & that those things please not with gold, which are not bought with gold. Therfore they passe the bound, which are in the holie thinges so much delighted with golde, siluer, iuorie, marble, precious stones and silkes, and thinke that God is not rightlie worshipped, vnlesse altogether they bee dissolutelie set out with exquisite gorgeousnesse, or rather with outragious excesse. A Father was hee, which saide, that he therefore did freelie eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because hee was a Christian. Therefore they passe the boundes, when they accurse the soule that tasteth flesh in lent. Fathers were they, of whō the one said that a Monk which laboreth not with his handes, is iudged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you wil) a robber: the other said, that it is not lawfull for monkes to liue of other mens goods, although they be continuallie busied in contemplations, in Prayers, in studie. This bound also they haue passed, when they placed the idle & barrell-bellies of Monks in stewes & brothelhouses.

to be fatted with other mens ſubſtance. A Father was he, which ſaid, that it is a horrible abomination to ſee any image painted, either of Chriſt or of any ſaints in the temples of Chriſtians. Neither was this pronounced by the mouth of one man alone, but alſo decreed by an Eccleſiaſticall Councell, that that which is worſhipped ſhould not be painted on walles. They are farre from holding themſelues within theſe boundes, when they leaue not one corner without images. An other Father counſelled, that hauing done the duetie of naturall kindeneſſe toward the dead in burying them, we ſhould let them reſt. Theſe boundes they breake, when they caſt into men a continuall carefulneſſe of the dead. One of the Fathers was he, which teſtifieth that the ſubſtance of bread and wine in the ſacrament of the ſupper ſo remaineth and ceaſeth not, as in the Lorde Chriſt remaineth the ſubſtance and nature of man ioyned with the ſubſtance of God. Therefore they paſſe meaſure, which faine that after the words of the Lord rehearſed, the ſubſtance of bread and wine ceaſſeth, that it may be tranſubſtantiate into his body and bloud. Fathers were they which as they deliuered to the whole Church but one ſacrament of Thankeſgiuing, and as they debarred from it wicked and hainous euill doers: ſo did greeuouſly condemne all thoſe which being preſent, did not communicate of it. Howe farre haue they remoued thoſe bounds, when they fill not only Churches, but alſo priuate houſes with their maſſes, and admit all men to looke vpon them, and euery man ſo much more gladly as hee more largely payeth, howe vncleane and wicked ſo euer they be: but allure no man to faith in Chriſt and faithfull communicating of the Sacraments: yea rather doe boaſtingly ſet out to ſale their owne worke for the grace and merite of Chriſt? Fathers were they, of whom the one decreed, that they ſhould be altogether debarred from the vſe of the holy Supper of Chriſt, which holding themſelues contented with partaking of the one kinde, abſteined from the other. And the other Father ſtoutly maintaineth, that to the Chriſtian people the bloud of the Lord ought not to be denied, for the confeſſion whereof they are commanded to ſhedde their owne bloud. Theſe bounds alſo they haue taken away, when they haue by an inuiolable law commaunded the ſelfe ſame thing which the one of theſe Fathers puniſhed with excommunication, and the other reproued with a ſtrong reaſon. A Father was he, which affirmed it to be raſhnes to determine any thing of a doubtfull matter on the one ſide or the other, without cleare and euident witneſſings of the Scripture. This bound they forgot, when they ſtabliſhed ſo many conſtitutions, ſo many canons, ſo many maiſterly determinations, without any word of God. A father was he, which among other hereſies reproched Montanus with this, that he was the firſt that had charged men with lawes of faſtings. This bound alſo they haue farre paſſed, when they commanded faſting with moſt ſtraight lawes. A father was he, which denied that mariage ought to be forbidden to miniſters of the Church, and pronounced a mans lying with his owne wife to be chaſtitie: and fathers were they, which agreed to his authoritie. Beyond theſe bounds haue they gone, when they ſeuerely enioyned vnmaried life to their ſacrificers. A Father was he which iudged, that onely Chriſt ought to be heard, of whom it is ſaid, Heare him: and that we ought not to haue regard, what other men which were before vs, haue ſaide or done, but what Chriſt (which is the firſt of all) hath commaunded. This bound neither do they appoint to themſelues, nor do ſuffer other to haue it appointed them, when they ſet both ouer themſelues and other any miniſters whatſoeuer they be, rather than Chriſt. A Father was he, which affirmed that the Church ought not to ſet it ſelfe before Chriſt, becauſe he alway iudged truely: but the iudges of the Church, as men, are commonly deceiued. They breaking through this bound alſo, ſticke not to affirme that the whole authoritie of the Scripture hangeth vpon the awardment of the church. All the Fathers haue with one heart accurſed, and with one mouth pronounced it abhominable, that the holie Worde of God ſhould bee entangled with the ſubtelties of Sophiſters, and brawlinges of Logitians. Doe they holde themſelues within theſe boundes, when they goe about nothing elſe in their whole life, but with endleſſe ſtrifes, and more than ſophiſticall brabblinges to wrappe and encomber the ſimplicitie of the Scripture? ſo that if the fathers were nowe raiſed to life againe, and ſhoulde heare ſuch an art of brawling, which theſe men call Speculatiue Diuinitie, they woulde beleeue that nothing leſſe is done than anie diſputation had of God. But my talke ſhould ſpread it ſelf beyond due bounds, if I would recken vp how boldlie theſe men ſhake of the yoke of the Fathers, whoſe obedient children they would ſeeme to bee. Truelie both moneths and yeeres woulde bee too little for me. And yet they are of ſo extreame and deſperate ſhameleſneſſe, that they dare blame vs for that wee ſticke not to paſſe the auncient boundes.

But now wheras they cal vs to cuſtom, they nothing preuail. For wee ſhould be moſte vniuſtlie dealt with, if we ſhould be driuen to yeeld to cuſtome. Truelie if the iudgements of men were right, Cuſtome ſhould be taken of the good. But it oftentimes happeneth that men doe otherwiſe. For, that which is ſeene to bee done of manie, by and by obteineth the right of a Cuſtome. But the ſtate of men hath ſcarcelie at any time beene in ſo good caſe, that the better thinges pleaſed the greater number. Therefore for the moſt part of the priuate vices of manie hath beene made a publike errour, or rather a common conſent of vices, which now theſe good men woulde haue to ſtand for a law. Who ſo haue eyes do ſee that not onelie one ſea of euilles hath ouerflowed, many poiſonous peſtilences haue inuaded the worlde, that all thinges runne headlong to ruine: ſo that either the matters of men muſt be vtterlie deſpaired, or we muſt lay hand vnto, or rather vſe violence vpon ſo great euils. And remedie is by no other reaſon driuen away, but becauſe we haue now long time accuſtomed vs to euilles. But bee it that publike errour haue place in matters of common weale: yet in the kindome of God his onelie trueth is to be heard and regarded, to which by no ſucceeding courſe of yeares, by no cuſtome, by no conſpired agreement, may any preſcription be limitted. in olde time Eſay taught the elect of God, that they ſhoulde not ſay Conſpiring, to all thinges in which the people ſaid Conſpiring: that is to ſay, that they ſhould not conſpire together to the wicked agreement of the people, nor ſhould feare and dreade the peoples feare: but rather that they ſhoulde ſanctifie the Lorde of hoſtes, and he ſhould be their feare and dread. Now therefore let them as much as they liſt obiect againſt vs both paſſed and preſent ages, if we ſanctify the Lorde of hoſtes, we will not bee much afraide. For whether it bee that many ages haue conſented to like vngodlineſſe, hee is ſtrong to take vengeance to the third and fourth generation: or if the whole worlde together conſpire into one ſelfe ſame wickedneſſe, hee hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offende with the multitude, when hee did with a generall ouerflowing deſtroy the whole kinde of men, preſeruing Noe with a ſmall houſhoulde, which that die with companie of a multitude. Moreouer they ought to haue conſidered that which Cyprian ſaith in certaine places, that they which ſinne by ignorance, although they cannot cleare themſelues from all fault, yet may ſeeme after ſome manner excuſable: but who ſo obſtinately refuſe the trueth offered by the grace of God, they haue nothing to pretend for their excuſe.

As for their double horned argument, they do not driue vs to so hard a streight with it, to compel vs to confesse, that either the Church hath line dead a certaine time, or that we haue controuersy against the Church. Truelie the Church of Christe hath liued and shall liue, so long as Christ shall raigne at the right hand of the Father: by whose hande she is vpholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safetie. For hee will vndoubtedlie performe that which he hath once promised, that he will bee present with his euen vntill the ending of the worlde. Against it now wee haue no warre at all. For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithfull honour and worship the one God and Christ the Lorde, in like sort as he hath alway beene worshipped of all the godlie. But they themselues not a litle way erre from the trueth, when they acknowleage no Church, but which they see with presens eie, and go about to compasse it about with those boundes in which is is not enclosed. Vpon these pointes hangeth our controuersie: first that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appearing and to bee seene: then, that they set the same forme in the see of the church of Rome, and in the order of their prelates. Wee on the contrarie side affirme, both that the Church may consist of no appearing forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shew, which they foolishlie haue in admiration, but hath a far other mark, namely the pure preaching of the word of God, and the right ministration of sacraments. They are in a rage, vnlesse the church may be alwaies pointed out with a finger. But how oft happened it in the people of the Iewes to bee so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme think we to haue shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the comming of Christ hath it lien hidde without forme? How since that time hath it bin so oppressed with wars, sedtions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liued at that time, would they haue beleeued that ther was any church? but it was said to Helias, that there were preserued seuē thousand men, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to be douful to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable form with their eyes, should they not by & by haue bin discouraged? And verily Hylarie accounted it euen alreadie in his time for a most great fault, that being occupied with the foolish admiration of the dignitie of byshops, they marked not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that visor. For thus he saith: One thing I warn you, beware of antichrist: for you are ill taken with the loue of walls: ye do ill worship the church of God in houses & buildings: vnder them yee do ill thrust in the name of peace. It is doubtful that in those Antichrist shal sit? Mountaines & woods & lakes, & prisons, & caues are safer for me. For in these the prophets, when they were either abiding or thrown into them, did prophecie. But what doth the worlde at this day honor in his horned byshops, but that it thinketh them to be holie prelates of religion, whome it seeth to bee heades ouer great Cities? Away therefore with such foolishe esteeming. But rather let vs leaue this to the Lorde, forasmuch as hee alone knoweth who bee his, and sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outwarde knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeaunce of God vppon the earth. But if the wickednesse of men so deserue, why doe wee seeke to withstande the iust vengeance of GOD? In such wise the Lorde hath in times past taken vengeaunce of the vnthankefulnesse of men. For because they would not receiue his trueth, and had quenched his light, hee suffered them beeing blinded in sense, both to bee mocked with lyes full of absurditie, and to bee drowned in deepe darknesse, so that there was no face of the true Church to be seene.

Yet in the meane time he saued his both beeing scattered abroade and lying hidden in the middest of errours and darknesse, from destruction. And no maruell. For he can skill to saue both in the verie confusion of Babylon, and in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they would haue the forme of the church to be iudged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: how perillous that is, I wil rather point vnto than declare, least I should draw out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike see, and the Bishops that are annointed and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and miters, doe represent the church, and ought to be taken for the Church: and therefore they cannot erre. How so? because they are pastors of the Church, and consecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israel also Pastors? But Aaron and his sonnes after that they were made priests, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why shoulde not the foure hundred Prophetes which lyed to Achab, haue represented the Church? But the Church was on Micheas side, beeing indeede but one man alone, and vnregarded, but out of whose mouth came trueth. Did not the false Prophetes in resemblaunce beare both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise vp against Ieremy, and with threatning boasted that it was not possible that the lawe shoulde perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Ieremy alone was sent against the whole companie of the Propheters, to declare from the Lorde, that it shoulde come to passe, that the law shoulde perish from the Priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the worde from the Prophet. Did not such a glistering shew shine in that Counsell which the Bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ? Now let them goe and sticke fast in the outward visour, that they may make Christ and all the prophets of God, sciſmatikes: and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holie ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfullie aunswere me, in what nation & place they think that the Church remained since the time that by the decree of the Councell at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and depriued from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They cannot, though they would burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onelie of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of sciſme, rebellion, and obstinacie, with the whole flocke of Cardinalles and Bishops, which had with him practised the dissolution of the Councell. Yet afterward being borne vp by the fauour of Princes he recouered his papacie safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had beene orderly made by the authoritie of a generall and holie Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauing that hee himselfe was appeased with a Cardinalls hat, as it were a barking dog with a peece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebelles, and obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Byshops, Abbots and prieſtes that haue beene since. Heere they are taken and can goe no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the Church? will they denie that the councell was generall, which wanted nothing to the outward maiestie: namelie, which being solemnelie summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all thinges, continued in the same dignitie to the last end? Will they confesse Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either let them otherwise define the forme of the church, or they all as manie as are of them shall be of vs accounted schismatikes, which wittingly and willinglie haue beene ordered of heretikes. If it had neuer before beene knowne, that the church is not bound to outwarde pompes, they themselues may bee to vs a large proofe, which vnder that glorious title of the Church haue so long so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the Church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragicall doinges wherewith their whole life swarmeth full: because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to read our writings, you shall plainely know that the very doctrine, the doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the church is a deadlie butcherie of soules, the firebrand, ruine, and destruction of the Church.

Finally they doe not vprightlie enough, when they doe spitefully rehearse howe great troubles, vproares, and contentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawen with it, & what fruites it now beareth in many. For the blame of these euils is vnworthilie laid vpon it which ought rather to haue bin imputed to the malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall propertie of the worde of God, that whensoeuer it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easily shewe forth themselues when they are receiued with fauorable eares of all men, and are heard of the world reioycing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all thinges were drowned in deepe darkenesse, the Lord of this world made a sport and a play in maner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should he else doe but laugh and plaie being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shining from aboue somewhat scattered abroad his darknes, whē that strong mā troubled and assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his wonted drowsinesse, & hastilie to arme himselfe. And first he stirred vp the force of men, wherby he might violently oppresse the trueth beginning to shine. By which when he nothing preuailed, hee turned to subtile entrappings. He stirred vp dissentions and disagreements of doctrines by his Catabaptists, and other monstruous lewde men, whereby he might darken it and at length vtterly quench it. And now he cōtinueth to aßaile it with both engines. For he trauaileth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede: and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his crafte vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, and hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But howe great maliciousnes is it to lay vpon the worde of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which naughty & rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceiuers doe raise against it? Yet it is no newe exāple. Elias was asked whether is were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditious mā. The Apostles were accused of making a cōmotion amōg the people. What other thing doe they which at this daie do father vpon vs all the troubles, vproares and contentions that boile vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namelie that it is not we that scatter errors or stirre vp vproares: but it is they themselues that wrastle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beate backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to meete with the weakenes of other, who oftentimes happen to be moued with such offences, and in their dismaying to wauer. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discouraged, knowe that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same thinges that nowe happen vnto vs. There were vnlearned and vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those thinges that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, which when they heard that sinne abolished

This is the most sure and most trustie marke, whereby it is discerned from lying doctrines, which doe easily shewe forth themselues when they are receiued with fauorable eares of all men, and are heard of the world reioycing at them. So in certaine ages past, when all thinges were drowned in deepe darkenesse, the Lord of this would made a sport and a play in maner of all men, and lay idle and tooke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sound peace. For, what should he else doe but laugh and plaie being in quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shining from aboue somewhat scattered abroad his darknes, whē that strong mā troubled and assailed his kingdome, then he began to shake off his wonted drowsinesse, & hastilie to arme himselfe. And first he stirred vp the force of men, wherby he might violently oppresse the trueth beginning to shine. By which when he nothing preuailed, hee turned to subtile entrappings. He stirred vp dissentions and disagreements of doctrines by his Catabaptists, and other monstruous lewde men, whereby he might darken it and at length vtterly quench it. And now he cōtinueth to assaile it with both engines. For he trauaileth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede: and with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe and beare fruit. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craftes vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, and hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But howe great maliciousnes is it to lay vpon the worde of God, the hatred either of the seditions, which naughty & rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceiuers doe raise against it? Yet it is no newe exāple. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditious mā. The Apostles were accused of making a cōmotion amōg the people. What other thing doe they which at this daie do father vpon vs all the troubles, vproares and contentions that boile vp against vs? But what is to be answered to such, Elias hath taught vs: namelie that it is not we that scatter errors or stirre vp vproares: but it is they themselues that wrastle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beate backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to meete with the weakenes of other, who oftentimes happen to be moued with such offences, and in their dismaying to wauer. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismaying and be discouraged, knowe that the Apostles in their time felt by experience the same thinges that nowe happen vnto vs. There were vnlearned and vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those thinges that Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, which when they heard that sinne aboūded to the end that grace might more abound, by and by obiected, Wee will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfull are not vnder the lawe, they by and by answered, We will then sinne, because we are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to euil. There entred priuily many false Apostles to destroy the churches which he had builded. Some by enuy & cõtention, and not purelie, yea and maliciouslie preached the Gospel, thinking to adde more affliction to his bandes. Somewhere the Gospel not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the thinges of Iesus Christ. Some went backeward, dogges to their vomit, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most part did draw the libertie of the Spirit to the licentiousnes of the flesh. Many brethren crept in, by whome there came afterward great dangers to the godlie. Among the brethren themselues were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles haue done in this case? Should they not either haue dissembled for a time, or rather altogether haue giuen ouer and forsaken the Gospel, which they sawe to be the seedplot of so manie contentions, the matter of so many dangers the occasion of so many offences? No. But for helpe in such distresses this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence, set vnto the ruine and rising againe of manie, and for a signe that should be spokẽ against. With which affiance they being armed, went forward boldly through al dangers of vprores & offences. With the same thought we also ought to be vpholden, forasmuch as Paul testifieth that this is the perpetual propertie of the Gospel to be the sauor of death vnto death to them that perish, although it were ordeined to this vse that it should be the sauor of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the saluation of the faithful: which verilie we should also feele, if we did not with our vnthankefulnesse corrupt this so singular a benefite of God, and turne that to our owne destruction which ought to haue bin to vs the onely defence of our safetie.

2. Cor. 2.16.

But nowe I returne to you, my soueraigne Lord. Let those false reports nothing moue you, by which our aduersaries trauel to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this newe Gospel (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the author of diuision, but of peace: and the sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Diuell. And we are vnworthily accused of such desires, whereof we neuer gaue any suspicion were it neuer so small. It is likely that wee forsooth doe practise the ouerthrowing of kingdomes, of whome there hath neuer bin heard any one seditious word, whose life hath euer beene knowen quiet and simple, when we lined vnder you, and which nowe being chased from home, yet cease not to pray for all thinges prosperous to you and your kingdome. It is likely forsooth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whose behauiours although many thinges may be found faultie, yet there is nothing worthie of so great reproching: neither haue we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospel, but that our life may be to these backbiters an examplar of chastitie, liberalitie, mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and whatsoeuer other vertue. Verily it is by the proofe it selfe euident that we doe vnfainedly feare and worship God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life our and death, & enuie it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witnes of innocence & ciuill vprightnes, in whome this onelie thing was punished with death, which ought to haue bin accounted for a singular praise. But if any vnder pretence of the Gospel doe stirre vp tumultes (as hitherto it hath not bin found that there haue bin any such in your Realme) if any pretende the libertie of the grace of God to defende the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I haue knowen many) there be lawes & penaltie of lawes, by which they may according to their desernings be sharpely punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not euil spoken of for the wickednes of naughtie men. Thus haue yee (O King) the venemous vniustice of the sclaunderers largely enough declred, that you may not with an eare of too easie beliefe bende to their reportes. I feare me also least it be too largely set out, for asmuch as this preface is in a maner come to the quantitie of a whole booke of defense, whereby I entended not to make a defense in deede, but onelie to mollifie your mind aforehand to giue audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shalbe able to recouer the fauur therof, if you shal once haue without displeasure and troublous affection red ouer this our confession, which we will to be in steed of a defece for vs to your maiestie. But if the whisperings of the malicious do so possesse your eares, that there is no place for accused me, to speake for themselues: and if those outragious furies doe still with your winking at them, exercise cruelties with prisoning, tormenting, cutting and burning: we shall in deede, as sheepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and waite for the strong hand of the Lord: which shall without doubt be present in time, and stretch foorth it selfe armed, both to deliuer the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumph with so great assuredneße.

IOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

AT the firſt ſetting out of this worke, becauſe I did not looke for that ſucceſſe, which the Lord of his vnmeaſurable goodneſſe hath giuen, I had (as men vſe to doe in ſmal workes) for the more part lightly paſſed it ouer. But when I vnderſtood that it was receiued with that fauour of all the godly, which I neuer durſt haue deſired, much leſſe haue hoped for: as I verilie felt in my heart that much more was giuen to me than I had deſerued, ſo I thought it ſhould be a great vnthākefulnes if I ſhould not at the leaſt after my ſclender abilitie endeuor to anſwere ſo fauorable affections toward me, and which of them ſelues prouoked my diligence. And this I attempted not onelie in the ſecond ſetting forth of it: but howe oft ſince that time the worke hath bin imprinted, ſo oft hath it bin enriched with ſome encreaſe. But although I did not then repent me of the labor that I had imployed: yet I neuer held my ſelfe contented till it was diſpoſed into that order which is now ſet before you. Now I truſt I haue giuen you that which may be allowed by al your iudgements. Truely with how great endeuor I haue applied my ſelfe to the doing of this ſeruice to the Church of God, I may bring foorth for an euident witneſſe, that this laſt winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had ſummoned me to death, howe much more the ſickenes enforced vpon me, ſo much leſſe I ſpared my ſelfe, till I might leaue this booke to ouerliue me, which might make ſome part of thankfull recōpence to ſo gentle prouoking of the godly. I had rather in deed it had bene done ſooner: but it is ſoone enough if well enough. And I ſhall then thinke that it is come abroad in good ſeaſon, when I ſhall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentifull fruite than it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my onely deſire. And truely full ill it were with me, if I did not holding my ſelfe contented with the allowance of God alone, deſpiſe the iudgementes of men, whether they be the fooliſh and froward iudgements of the vnskilfull, or the wrongfull and malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly ſetled my minde to the endeuor both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: and though I am cleare in mine owne conſcience, and haue himſelfe and the Angels to witneſſe with me, that ſince I tooke vpon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I haue tended to none other purpoſe but that I might profite the Church in mainteining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath ben snatched at, bitten, & torne in sunder with mo slaunders than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly enformed that at Augsburgh where the assembly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my reuolting to the Papacie, and the same was more greedily receiued in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankfulnes who are not ignorant of many trialles had of my stedfastnes, which trialles as they shake off so foule a sclaunder, so they should with al indifferent and gentle iudges haue defended me from it. But the Diuell with his whole route is deceiued if in oppressing me with filthy lies, he thinke that by his vniust dealing I shal be either the more discouraged or made the lesse diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his vnmeasurable goodnes will grant me that I may with euen sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Wherof I giue to the godly readers a newe proofe in this setting forth of this Booke. Nowe in this trauell this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy diuinitie to the reading of the worde of God, that they may both haue an easie entrie into it, & go forward in it without stumbling: for I thinke that I haue in all points so knit vp together the summe of religion, & disposed the same in such order, that whosoeuer shall well haue it in minde, it shall not be harde for him to determine both what hee ought chiefely to seeke in the Scripture: and to what marke to apply whatsoeuer is conteined in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plaine, If I shal hereafter set forth any expositions of Scripture, because I shall not neede to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, and to wander out into common places: I wil alway knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shalbe eased of great paine & tediousnes, so that he come furnished aforehand with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessarie instrument. But because the intent of this purpose, doth clearely as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare in deede what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Farewell frendly Reader, and if thou receiue any fruite of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

Augustine in his vij. Epistle.

I professe my selfe to be one of the number of them, which write in profiting, and profit in writing.

WHAT CHAPTERS ARE conteined in the Bookes of this Institution.

In the first booke which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator, are contained xviij. Chapters.

THat the knowledge of God, & of our selues, are things conioyned: and howe they be linked the one with the other.

2 What it is to knowe God, and to what end tendeth ỹ knowledge of him.

3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the minds of men.

4 That the same knowledge is either choked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

5 That the knowledge of God doeth shiningly appeare in the making of the worlde, and in the continuall gouernement thereof.

6 That to attaine to God the creator, it is needefull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maistresse.

7 By what testimonie the Scripture ought to bee stablished, that is by the witnes of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remaine certaine: And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

8 That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proofs to stablish the credit of the Scripture.

9 That those fantasticall men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, doe ouerthrowe all the principles of godlinesse.

10 That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against al ỹ Gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

11 That it is vnlawful to attribute vnto God a visible forme, & that generally, they forsake God, so many as doe erect to themselues any images.

12 That God is seuerally discerned from idols, that he may be onely and wholly worshipped.

13 That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, which essence containeth in it three persons.

14 That the Scripture euen in the creation of the worlde, and of al thinges, doth by certaine markes put difference betweene the true God, and faigned Gods.

15 What a one man was created: wherein there is intreated of the powers of the soule, and of the image of God, of freewill, and of the first integritie of nature.

16 That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the worlde, which himselfe hath created, and by his prouidence doeth gouerne all the partes thereof.

17 Whereto and to what ende this doctrine is to be applied, that we may be certaine of the profit thereof.

18 That God doth so vse the seruice of wicked men, and so boweth their minder to put his iudgement in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

In the second booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, which knowledge was first opened to the fathers in the time of the lawe, and then to vs in the Gospell: are conteined xvij. Chapters.

1 THat by Adams sinne and falling away, mankinde became accursed, & did degenerate from his first estate: wherein is entreated of originall sinne.

2 That

2 That man is now spoiled of the freedome of will, and made subiect to miserable bondage.
3 That out of the corrupt nature of mā proceedeth nothing but damnable.
4 How God worketh in the hearts of men.
5 A confutation of the obiections that are wont to be brought for the defence of freewill.
6 That man being lost must seeke for redemption in Christ.
7 That the lawe was giuen, not to holde still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ vntill his comming.
8 An exposition of the morall lawe.
9 That Christe although hee was knowen to the Iewes vnder the law, yet was he deliuered onely by the Gospel.
10 Of the likenesse of the olde & new Testament.
11 Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.
12 That it behooued that Christe to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.
13 That Christe tooke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.
14 Howe the natures of the Mediator do make one person.
15 That we may knowe to what ende Christ was sent of his father, & what he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his prophetical office, his kingdome, & his priesthoode.
16 Howe Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, wherin is entreated of his Death and resurrection, and his Ascending into heauen.
17 That it is truely and properly said, that Christ hath deserued Gods fauour and saluation for vs.

In the thirde Booke which intreateth of the maner howe to receiue the grace of Christ, and what fruites come thereof to vs, and what effectes follow of it: are conteined xxv. Chapters.

1 THat those things which are spoken of Christ doe profit vs, by secret working of the holy Ghost.
2 Of faith, wherein both is the definition of it, and the properties that it hath are declared.
3 That wee are regenerate by faith, wherein is intreated of repentance.
4 That all that the Sophisters babble in their schooles of penance, is far from the pureneſſe of the Gospell: where is entreated of confession & Satisfaction.
5 Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactiōs, as pardons & purgatory.
6 Of the life of a Christian man. And first by what argumentes the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.
7 The summe of a Christian life: where is entreated of ỹ forsaking of our selues.
8 Of the bearing of the Crosse, which is a parte of the forsaking of our selues.
9 Of the meditatiō of the life to come.
10 Howe we ought to vse this present life, and the helpes thereof.
11 Of the Iustificatiō of faith, & first of the definitiō of the name & of ỹ thing.
12 That to the ende we may be fully persuaded of the free iustification, we must lift vp our minds to the iudgement seate of God.
13 That there are two thinges to be marked in free iustification.
14 What is ỹ beginning of iustificatiō, and the continuall proceeding thereof.
15 That those things that are cōmonly boasted concerning the merites of workes, do ouerthrow as wel the prayse of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednes of saluation.
16 A confutation of the slaunders, whereby the Papists goe about to bring this doctrine in hatred.
17 The agreement of the promises of the Lawe and the Gospell.
18 That

18 That of the reward, the righteousnes of workes is ill gathered.
19 Of Christian libertie.
20 Of prayer which is the cheefe exercise of faith, and whereby wee daily receiue the benefites of God.
21 Of the eternall election, whereby God hath predestinate some to saluation, some other to destruction.
22 A confirmation of this doctrine by the testimonies of Scripture.
23 A confutation of the slaunders, wherewith this doctrine hath alway beene vniustly charged.
24 That Election is stablished by the calling of GOD: and that the reprobate doe bring vpon them selues the iust destruction, to which they are appointed.
25 Of the last Resurrection.

In the fourth booke vvhich entreateth of the outvvard meanes or helpes vvhereby God calleth vs into the followship of Christ, and holdeth vs in it: are contained 20. Chapters.

1 OF the true Church with which wee ought to keepe vnitie, because it is the mother of all the godly.
2 A comparison of the false Churche with the true Church.
3 Of the teachers and ministers of the church, and of their election and office.
4 Of the state of the olde church, and of the maner of gouerning that was in vse before the papacie.
5 That the olde forme of gouernment is vtterly ouerthrowne by the tyranny of the papacie.
6 Of the supremacie of ỹ Sea of Rome.
7 Of the beginning and encreasing of the papacie of Rome, vntill it aduanced it selfe to this height, whereby both the libertie of the church hath beene oppressed, and all the right gouernment thereof ouerthrowne.
8 Of the power of the church as touching the articles of faith: and with howe vnbridled licentiousnesse it hath in the papacy bin wrested to corrupt al pureneſſe of doctrine.
9 Of councelles and of their authoritie.
10 Of the power in making of lawes wherein the pope and his haue vsed a most cruell tyranny and butcherie vpon soules.
11 Of the iurisdiction of the church and the abuse thereof, such as is seene in the papacy.
12 Of the discipline of the Church, whereof the cheefe vse is in the censures and excommunication.
13 Of vowes, by rash promising whereof eche man hath miserably entangled himselfe.
14 Of Sacraments.
15 Of baptisme.
16 That the baptisme of Infantes doth very well agree with the institution of Christ, and the nature of the signe.
17 Of the holy Supper of Christe: and what is auaileth vs.
18 Of the popish Masse, by which sacriledge the supper of Christ hath not onely bin prophaned, but also brought to nought.
19 Of the fiue falsely named Sacraments: where is declared, that the other fiue which haue bin hitherto commonly taken for sacraments, are not Sacraments: and then is shewed what maner of thinges they be.
20 Of ciuill gouernement.

FINIS.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

That the knowvledge of God, and of our ſelues, are things conioyned: and howv they be linked the one vvith the other.

THE whole ſumme in a manner of all our wiſedome, which onely ought to be accompted true and perfect wiſedome, conſiſteth in two partes, that is to ſaye, the knowledge of God, and of our ſelues. But whereas theſe two knowledges be with many bondes linked togither: yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to diſcerne. For, firſt no man can looke vpon him ſelfe, but he muſt needes by and by turne all his ſenſes to the beholding of God, in whome he liueth and is moued: becauſe it is plaine, that thoſe gifts wherewith wee be indued, are not of our ſelues, yea, euen that that we haue being is nothing els but an eſſence in the one God. Finally, by theſe good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certaine ſtreames to the ſpring head. And ſo by our owne needineſſe, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miſerable ruine, whereinto the fall of the firſt man hath throwne vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes, not onely being foodeleſſe and hungrie, to craue from thence that which wee lacke, but alſo being awakened with feare, to learne humilitie. For as there is found in man a certaine worlde of all miſeries, and ſince we haue ben ſpoyled of the diuine apparell, our ſhamefull nakedneſſe diſcloſeth an infinite heape of filthie diſgracements: it muſt needes be that euery man be pricked with knowledge in conſcience of his owne vnhappineſſe to make him come at the leaſt vnto ſome knowledge of God. So by the vnderſtanding of our ignorance, vanitie, beggerie, weaknes, peruerſenes, & corruption, wee learne to reknowledge that no where elſe but in the Lorde abideth the true light of wiſedome, ſound vertue, perfect abundance of all good things, and puritie of righteouſnes. And ſo by our owne euils wee are ſtirred to conſider the good things of God: and we cannot earneſtly aſpire towarde him, vntill we beginne to miſlike our ſelues. For of al mē what one is there, that would not willingly reſt in him ſelfe? yea, who doth not reſt, ſo long as he knoweth not himſelfe, that is to ſay, ſo long as he is contented with his own giftes, & ignorant or vnmindfull of his owne miſerie? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of himſelfe, not onely pricked forward to ſeeke God, but alſo led as it were by the hand to finde him.

VVhether vvee conſider our being, the giftes vvherevvith vve are endevved, or the euils that are found in vs, vvee are thereby led to the knovvledge of God.

Till vvee haue considered the exact perfection of iustice, vvisedome and all vertue, vvhich is in God, vve neuer knovv our ovvne imperfection.

2 Againe, it is certeine, that man neuer commeth vnto ỹ true knowledge of him selfe, vnlesse he hath first beholden the face of God, and from beholding thereof do descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntil that with manifest proues wee be conuinced of our vnrighteousnesse, filthinesse, follie and vncleannes. But we are not conuinced therof, if we looke vpon our selues only, and not vpon God also, who is the only rule whereby this iudgement ought to be tried. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vaine resemblance of righteousnes doth aboundantly content vs in stead of righteousnes in deed. And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, ỹ is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthy pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we hold our selues within the boundes of mans vncleannesse. Like as the eye that is vsed to see nothing but blacke, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more plainly discerne by our bodily sense how much wee are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at midday we either looke downe vpon the ground, or behold those things that rounde about lye open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to haue verie assured and pearcing force of sight: but when wee looke vp to the sunne, and beholde it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpenes that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightnesse by and by dasseled and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse ỹ the same sharp sight which we had in cõsidering earthly things, when it commeth to the sunne, is but meere dulnes. Euen so commeth it to passe in weying our spirituall good things. For while wee looke no further than the earth, so long being well contented with our owne righteousnesse, wisedome and strength, wee doe sweetely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in manner halfe gods. But if wee once begin to raise vp our thought vnto God, and to wey what a one he is, and how exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisedome & power, after the rule whereof wee ought to be framed: then that which before did please vs in our selues with false pretẽce of righteousnesse, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednesse: then that which did marueilously deceiue vs vnder colour of wisedome, shal stinke before vs as extreme follie: then that which did beare the face of strength, shal be proued to be most miserable weakenes. So slenderly doth that which in vs seemeth euen most perfect, answere in proportion to the purenes of God.

The beholding of the maiestie of god maketh men to see their ovvne baseness.

3 Hereof proceedeth that trembling and amasednes, wherewith the scripture in manie places reciteth that the holy men were stricken & astonished so oft as they perceiued the presence of God. For when we see ỹ they which in his absence did stand assured & vnmoued, so sone as he discloseth his glory, begin so to quake & are so dismaid, that they fall down, yea are swalowed vp, & in maner as destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered therby, that man is neuer sufficiently touched & inwardly moued with knowledge of his own basenes, vntil he haue compared himself to the maiestie of God But of such dismaying we haue often examples both in the Iudges & in ỹ Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: Wee shall dye

becauſe the Lord hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the hiſtorie of Iob, to throw men down with knowledge of their own folly, weaknes, & vncleannes, bringeth alway his principall proofe from deſcribing Gods wiſedome, ſtrength & clenneſſe. And that not without cauſe. For we ſee how Abraham, the neerer that he came to behold the glorie of God, the better acknowledged himſelfe to be earth & duſt. We ſee how Elias could not abide to tary his comming to him with vncouered face: ſo terrible is the beholding of him. And what may man do that is but corruption and a worme, when euen the Cherubins for verie feare muſt hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Eſay ſpeaketh of: The Sunne ſhal bluſh, & the Moone ſhalbe aſhamed, when the Lord of hoſtes ſhal raigne, that is to ſaye, when he diſplayeth his brightnes, and bringeth it nearer to ſight, then in compariſon thereof the brighteſt thing of al ſhalbe darkened. But howſoeuer the knowledge of God and of our ſelues, are with mutual knot linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth that firſt wee intreat of the knowledge of God, and after come downe to ſpeake of the knowledge of our ſelues.

The ſecond Chapter.

What it is to know God, and to what end tendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not onely that knowledge, whereby wee conceiue that there is ſome God, but alſo that, whereby we learne ſo much as behoueth vs to knowe of him, and as is profitable for his glorie: finally ſo much as is expedient. For, to ſpeake properly, wee cannot ſaye that God is knowen where there is no religion nor godlineſſe. But here I doe not yet touch that ſpeciall kind of knowledge whereby thoſe men that are in themſelues reprobate and accurſed do conceiue God the redeemer in Chriſt the mediator: but I ſpeake only of that firſt & ſimple maner of knowledge, whervnto the verie order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in ſtate of innocencie. For although no man, ſith mankind is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be either a father, or author of ſaluation, or in any wiſe fauourable, vnleſſe Chriſt come as a meane to pacifie him towardes vs: yet it is one thing to feele that God our maker doth by his power ſuſtaine vs, by his prouidence gouerne vs, by his goodneſſe nouriſh vs, and endue vs with all kindes of bleſſings: and another thing to embrace the grace of reconciliation offered vs in Chriſt. Whereas therfore the Lord firſt ſimply appeareth as wel by the making of the worlde, as by the generall doctrine of the ſcripture, to be the Creator, and then in the face of Chriſt to be the redeemer: hereupon ariſe two ſortes of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, and then the other ſhal orderly folow in the place fit for it. For although our mind cannot conceiue ỹ knowledge of God, but ỹ it muſt giue to him ſome kind of worſhip, yet ſhal it not be ſufficient ſimply to know that it is he only that ought to be honored & worſhipped of all men, vnleſſe we be alſo perſuaded that he is the fountaine of al good things, to the ende that we ſhould ſeeke for nothing elſewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not onely for that as he hath once created this worlde, ſo by his infinite power hee ſuſtaineth it, by his wiſedome he gouerneth it, by his goodnes he preſerueth it, and ſpecially mankind he ruleth by his righteouſnes and iudgement, ſuffreth by his mercy, and ſauegardeth by his defence: but alſo becauſe there can no where be found any one drop either of wiſedome, or of light, or of righteouſnes, or of power, or of vprightnes, or of ſincere truth, which floweth not from him, or whereof he is not the cauſe: to this end verily, that we ſhould learne to looke for & craue all theſe things at his hand, and with thankeſgeuing account them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a meere ſcholemaſter of godlines, out of which ſpringeth religion: Godlines I cal a reuerence of God ioyned with loue of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefites. For men will neuer with willing obedience ſubmit themſelues to God, vntill they perceiue that they owe all things to him, that they are nouriſhed by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, ſo that nothing is to be ſought elſewhere than in him. Yea, they will neuer yeld themſelues truely & with all their heart wholely to him, vnles they aſſuredly beleeue that in him is perfect felicitie repoſed for them.

The knowledge whereby wee conceiue that there is a God, that hee is the creator & preſeruer of al things that are, and the only giuer of good things, breedeth godlines and obedience.

2 Therefore they do but trifle with vaine ſpeculations, which in entreating of this queſtion, do make it their purpoſe to diſcuſſe, what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to knowe what maner one he is, & what agreeth with his nature. For to what end ſerueth it to confeſſe as Epicure doth, that there is a God which doth onely delight himſelfe with idleneſſe, hauing no care of the world? Finally, what profiteth it to know ſuch a God with whom we may haue nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to ſerue to this end, firſt to frame vs to feare and reuerence: then that by it guyding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hande, and to account them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou muſt therewithall by and by thinke, that foraſmuch as thou art his creature, therfore thou art of right ſubiect & bound to his authoritie, that thou oweſt him thy life, ẏ whatſoeuer thou enterpriſeſt, whatſoeuer thou doeſt, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it foloweth that thy life is peruerſely corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, foraſmuch as his will ought to be our lawe to liue by. Againe, thou canſt not cleerely ſee him, but that thou muſt needes know that he is ẏ fountaine & original of al good things, whereupon ſhould growe both a deſire to cleaue vnto him, and an aſſured truſt in him, if mans owne corruptneſſe did not drawe his minde from the right ſearching of him. For firſt of all, the godly mind doth not as by a dreame imagine to her ſelfe any God at aduenture, but ſtedfaſtly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doeth not falſely forge of him whatſoeuer her ſelfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be ſuch a one as he diſcloſeth himſelfe, & doth alway with great diligence beware that with preſumptuous raſhneſſe ſhe paſſe not beyond his will, and ſo wander out of the way. And when ſhee ſo knoweth him, becauſe ſhee vnderſtandeth that he gouerneth all things, ſhee aſſuredly truſteth that he is her ſafe keeper and defender, and therefore wholely committeth her ſelfe to his faith, becauſe ſhe vnderſtandeth that he is the author of all good things: therefore if any thing trouble her, or if ſhe want any thing, by and by ſhe flyeth to him for ſuccour, looking for helpe at his hand. Becauſe ſhe is perſwa-

ded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence she resteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euils to finde ready remedie in his mercifull kindnesse. Because she knoweth him to be her Lord & father, therfore she determineth that he is worthie that she should in al things haue regard to his authoritie, reuerence his maiestie, procure the aduauncement of his glorie, and obey his commaundements. Because shee seeth that hee is a righteous Iudge, and armed with his seueritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his iudgement seat before her eyes, and with feare of him withdraweth and restraineth her selfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is shee not so affraid with the feeling of his iudgement, that shee would conuey her selfe from it, although th re were away open to escape it: but rather she doth no lesse loue him, while he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, than while he is beneficial to the godly, forasmuch as shee vnderstandeth that it doth no lesse belong to his glorie that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euil doers, than that he hath rewarde of eternall life for the righteous. Moreouer shee doeth not for onely feare of punishment refraine her selfe from sinning: but because shee loueth and reuerenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoureth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet she dreadeth his onely displeasure. Now behold what is the pure and true religion, euen faith ioyned with an earnest feare of God: so that feare may containe in it a willing reuerence, and draw with it a right forme of worshipping such as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedefully to be noted, because all men generally do worship God, but fewe do reuerence him, while ech where is great pompous shewe in ceremonies, but the pureneſse of heart is rare to be found.

3 Truely, they that iudge rightly, wil alwaye holde this for certaine, that there is grauen in the minds of men a certaine feeling of the Godhed, which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this perswasion, that there is a God, is euē from their generation naturally planted in them, and deepely rooted within their bones, the verie obstinacie of the wicked is a substancial witnes, which with their furious striuing yet can neuer winde themselues out of the feare of God. Although Diagoras and such other do iest and laugh at all that hath in all ages beene beleeued concerning religion: although Dionysius do scoffe at the heauenly iudgement: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the worme of conscience gnaweth them much more sharply than all hot searing irons. I alleage not this ỹ Cicero saith, that errors by continuance of time growe out of vse, & religion daily more and more encreaseth and waxeth better. For the world (as a litle hereafter we shall haue occasiō to shew) trauaileth as much as in it lieth to shake off al knowledge of God, & by al meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this onely I say, that when the dull hardnesse, which the wicked doe desirously labour to get to despise God withall, doth lye pyningly in their heartes, yet the same feeling of God, which they would moste of all desire to haue vtterly destroyed, liueth still, and sometime doth vtter it selfe: whereby wee gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in scholes, but such a one whereof euery man is a teacher to himselfe euen from his mothers wombe, and such a one as nature suffereth none to forget, although many bend all their endeuour to shake it out of their minde. Nowe, if all men be borne and doe liue to this ende, to knowe God, and the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheth away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is euident, that they all swarue out of kinde from the lawe of their creation, that doe not direct to this marke al the whole thoughts and doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselues were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraigne good of the soule is the likenesse of God, when the soule hauing throughly conceiued the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore verie aptly doth Grillus reason in Plutarche, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken from their life, are not only nothing better than brute beasts, but also many waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to so manie sortes of euils, they continually draw forth a troublesome vnquiet life: and therefore the worshipping of God is the onely thing that maketh them better than brute beastes, by which alone they aspire to immortalitie.

It is in vaine to knowe God of whom the most godles haue a kind of feeling, vnlesse we knowe him so that wee also worship him.

The third Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the mindes of men.

VVhy God hath imprinted some knowledge of him selfe in all mens mindes, as that all nations, euen idolaters themselues do proue.

WE hold it out of controuersie, that there is in the mind of man, euen by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the ende that no man shoulde flee to the pretence of ignorance, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine vnderstanding of his diuine maiestie, the remembrance whereof, with powring in nowe and then as it were newe drops, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, doe knowe that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all bee condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worshipped him, and dedicated their life to his will. But truely if the not knowing of God bee any where to be found, it is likely that there can nowhere elsse be any example of it more than among the grosseste sortes of peoples & fardest from ciuil order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man saith) there is no natiō so barbarous, no kind of people so sauage, in whom resteth not this persuasion that there is a God. And euen they that in other partes of their life seeme verie litle to differ from brute beastes, yet do continually keepe a certaine seede of religion. So throughly hath this common principle possessed al mens mindes, & so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bin no countrie, no citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession, that a feeling of y Godhead is written in the hearts of al men. Yea and idolatrie it selfe is a substantial proofe of this persuasion. For we know how vnwillingly man abaseth himselfe to honor other creatures aboue himselfe. Therefore when hee had rather worship a blocke and a stone, than he woulde be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted persuasion of God is of moste great force, which is impossible to be raced out of the mind of man, that it is much more easie to haue the affection of nature broken, as in deede it is broken when man from his owne naturall swelling pride of his owne will stoupeth

downe euen to the baſeſt creatures to honor God.

2 Wherefore it is moſt vaine which ſome do ſay, that religion was deuiſed by the ſutteltie and craft of a fewe, by this policie, to keepe the ſimple people in awe, whereas they themſelues that procured other to worſhip God, beleeued nothing leſſe than that there was any God at all. I graunt in deede that ſuttle men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reuerence, & caſt them in a feare, to make their minds the more pliable to obedience: But this they coulde neuer haue brought to paſſe, vnleſſe the mindes of men had beene alreadie before hande perſuaded that there was a God, out of which perſuation as out of ſeede ſpringeth that readie inclination to religion. Neither is it likely that euen they which ſuttelly deceiued the ſimple ſort with colour of religion, were them ſelues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times paſt there haue beene ſome, and at this day there ariſe vp many that denye that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are deſirous not to knowe. We read of none that euer did breake foorth into more preſumptuous and vnbridled deſpiſing of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miſerably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And ſo againſt his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilful purpoſe he endeuoured to deſpiſe. And the ſame may a man commonly ſee to happen to ſuch as he was. For the bolder deſpiſer of God that any man is, the more is hee troubled at the verie noyſe of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods maieſtie, which doeth ſo much the more vehemently ſtrike their conſciences as they more labour to flie away from it? They doe in deede looke about for all the ſtaring holes that may be, to hide themſelues from the preſence of the Lorde: but whether they will or no, they are ſtill holden faſt tyed. For howſoeuer ſometime it ſeemeth to vaniſh away for a moment, yet it oft returneth again, and with newe aſſault doeth runne vppon them: ſo that the reſt which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conſcience, is much like to the ſleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which euen while they ſleepe doe not quietly reſt, becauſe they are at euery moment vexed with horrible & dredful dreames Therefore the verie vngodly themſelues ſerue for an example to proue that there alway liueth in al mens minds ſome knowledge of God.

Yea, they which do moſt denie it, ſhewe moſt that it cannot reaſonably be denyed.

The iiij. Chapter.

That the ſame knowledge is either choked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

BVt as experience teacheth that God hath ſowen the ſeede of religion in al men, ſo ſcarſely may be founde the hundreth man, that hauing it conceiued in his heart doeth cheriſh it, but no man in whom it ripeneth, ſo far is it of that any fruite appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that ſom become vaine in their owne ſuperſtitions, or that ſome doe of ſet purpoſe maliciouſly reuolt from God; yet all doe runne out of kinde from the true knowledge of him. So commeth it to paſſe that there remaineth no true godlineſſe in the worlde. But whereas I ſaid that ſome by errour fall into ſuperſtition, ſtition, I meane not thereby as though their ſimplicitie might excuſe them from blame, becauſe the blindneſſe that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proude vanitie, and with ſtubborneſſe. Vanitie and the ſame ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miſerable men both in the ſeeking of God do not climbe aboue themſelues as they ought to haue done, but meaſure him according to the proportion of their own fleſhly dulneſſe, and alſo neglecting the ſound manner of ſearching for him, do curiouſly flie to vaine ſpeculatiõs. And ſo they conceiue him not ſuch a one as he offreth himſelfe, but do imagine him ſuch a one as of their owne raſh preſumption they haue forged him. Which gulfe being once opened, what way ſoeuer they ſtirre their feete, they muſt needes alway runne headlong into deſtruction. For whatſoeuer afterwarde they go about toward the worſhipping or ſeruice of God, they cannot account it done to him, becauſe they worſhip not him, but rather the deuiſe of their owne heart, and their owne dreame in ſtead of him. This peruerſenes doth Paul expreſſely touch, where he ſaith, that they were made fooles when they couered to be wiſe. He had before ſaid, that they were made vaine in their imaginations: but leaſt any man ſhould thereby excuſe them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded becauſe not contented with ſobrietie, but preſumptuouſly taking vpon them ſelues more than they ought, they wilfully bring darkneſſe vpon them, yea with vaine and frowarde pride doe make themſelues fooles. Whereupon followeth, that their fooliſhneſſe is not excuſable, whereof the cauſe is not onely vaine curioſitie, but alſo a greedines to knowe more than is meete for them, ioyned with a falſe confidence.

The erronious immagination which ſuperſtitious perſons haue of God, cannot be excuſed, for that they are the cauſe of their owne blindneſſe.

Rom. 1. 22.

2 As for this that Dauid ſaieth, that the wicked & mad men thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: Firſt that is meant only of thoſe that choking the light of nature, do of purpoſe make themſelues ſenſeleſſe, as wee ſhall ſee againe a litle hereafter. Euen as wee ſee that manie after that they haue ben hardened with boldneſſe and cuſtome of ſinning, doe furiouſly put from them all the remembrance of God which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly miniſtred vnto their mindes. Now Dauid, to make their madneſſe the more deteſtable, bringeth them in as though they preciſely denyed, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but becauſe in taking frõ him his iudgement & prouidence, they ſhut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing leſſe agreeth with ỹ nature of God, than to throw away the gouernement of the world, and leaue it to fortune, to winke at the ſinnes of men, ſo as they may liue in licentious outrage vnpuniſhed: whoſoeuer he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly iudgement, doth careleſly followe his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the iuſt vengeance of God, to drawe a fatneſſe ouer their hearts, ſo that the wicked when they haue once cloſed their eyes, euen in ſeeing may not ſee. And Dauid in an other place is the beſt expounder of his own meaning, wher he ſaith: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked. Againe, that in their euil doings they proudly reioyce at themſelues, becauſe they perſuade themſelues that God doth not looke vpõ them. Therfore although they be compelled to acknowledge ſome God, yet they doe rob him of his glorie

Pſa. 13. 1.

Malicious ſinners are ſaid to thinke there is no God, not as if they did preciſely denie him to be, but becauſe they labour to put off frõ themſelues all feeling of his powver, vvhich notvvithſtanding they cannot do.

glorie in withdrawing from him his power. For as God (as Paul witnesseth) cannot denie himselfe, because he continually abydeth like himselfe: so is it truely said, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image, doe denie God. Moreouer it is to be noted that although they wrastle against their own naturall feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardnesse can neuer so farre preuaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his iudgement seate. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any feare from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutish forgetfulnes of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcibly carie them. 2. Tim. 2. 13.

3 So is that vaine defense ouerthrowen, which many are wont to pretende for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any deuotion to religion sufficeth, whatsoeuer it be, though it be neuer so much contrarie to order and trueth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the wil of God, as by a perpetual rule: and that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or fantasie, that may be diuersly fashioned after euery mans liking. And truely we may plainly see with how lying deceits superstition mocketh God, while shee goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching hold of those things in a maner onely, which God hath testified that he careth not for, shee either contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appointeth and sayeth to bee pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoeuer do set vp newe inuented formes of worshipping God, they worship and honour their owne doting deuises: because they durst not so trifle with God, vnlesse they had first fained a God, agreeing with the follies of their trifling toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vnstaied and wandring opinion of the maiestie of God, is a verie not knowing of God. When (saith he) ye knewe not God, ye serued them that in nature were no gods. And in another place he saieth that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they straied from ỹ right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleeue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from and forsakest the true God: whome when thou hast once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It followeth therefore, that we must determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

God alloweth no deuotion but that vvhich springeth frō the true knowledge of his name.

Gal. 4. 8. Eph. 2. 12.

4 There is also a second fault, that they neither haue at any time any cōsideration of God, but against their wils, nor do approch towarde him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawen to him: and euen then also they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maiestie, but onely a seruile & constrayned feare, which the iudgement of God wringeth out of them: which iudgement because they cannot escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithall they abhorre it. And so that saying of Statius, that feare first made gods in the worlde, may be fitly spoken of vngodlinesse, and of this kind of vngodlinesse only. They that haue a minde abhorring from the iustice of God, doe heartily wish to haue his throne of iudgement ouerthrown, which they know to ſtand for puniſhment of offences againſt his iuſtice by which affectiō they warre againſt God, who cannot be without his iudgement. But when they vnderſtande that his power impoſſible to bee auoided, hangeth ouer them: becauſe they can neither by force remoue it, nor by flight eſcape it, therefore they feare it. So leaſt they ſhould in all things ſeeme to deſpiſe him, whoſe maieſtie ſtill preſſeth vpon them, they vſe a certaine outward forme of religion, ſuch as it is: but in the meane time they ceaſe not to defile themſelues with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outragious miſchiefes to miſchiefes, vntil they haue in al pointes violate the holy law of the Lord, & deſtroyed his whole righteouſnes, or at leaſt they are not ſo holden back with that fained feare of God, but ẏ they ſweetly reſt in their ſinnes, and flatter themſelues, & had rather to follow the intemperance of their fleſh than reſtraine it with the bridle of the holy Ghoſt. But foraſmuch as the ſame is but a voyd and lying ſhadow of religion, yea ſcarcely worthy to be called a ſhadow: hereby againe is eaſily gathered, how much the true godlineſſe, which is powred onely into the heartes of the faithfull, I meane that out of which religion ſpringeth, doeth differ from this confuſe knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compaſſes, to ſeeme nigh vnto God, whom they flye from. For whereas there ought to haue beene one continuall vnbroken courſe of obedience in their whole life, they in a manner in all their doings careleſly rebelling againſt him, labour with a few ſacrifices to appeaſe him. Wheras they ought to haue ſerued him with holineſſe of life & ſyncerenes of heart, they inuent triflings & obſeruances of no value, to procure his fauour withall: yea they do ẏ more licentiouſly lie dulin their owne dregges, becauſe they truſt that they may be diſcharged againſt him with their own mockeries of propiciatorie ſatisfactions. Finally whereas their affiance ought to haue beene faſtened in him, they neglecting him doe reſt in themſelues, or in creatures. At length they entangle themſelues with ſuch a heape of errors, that the darke miſt of malice doeth choke, & at laſt vtterly quench thoſe ſparkes, that glimmeringly ſhined to make them ſee the glorie of God. Yet that ſeede ſtill remaineth which can by no meane be plucked vp by the roote, to beleeue that there is a certaine godhead: but the ſame ſeede is ſo corrupted, that it bringeth foorth of it none other but verie euil fruites. Yea thereby is that which I trauaile to proue more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in ẏ hearts of men, foraſmuch as the verie reprobate themſelues are of neceſſitie enforced to cōfeſſe it. In quiet proſperitie they pleaſantly mock at God, yea they are ful of talk & prating to diminiſh the greatnes of his power: but if once any deſperation touch them, it ſtirreth them vp to ſeeke the ſame God, and miniſtreth them ſodaine ſhort prayers: by which it may appeare, that they were not vtterly ignorant of God, but that the ſame which ought ſooner to haue beene vttered, was by obſtinacie ſuppreſſed.

God accepteth not their seruice vvho seeke him onely by feare in cases of extremitie, vvhich neuertheless doth prooue that there vvas a seed of the knowledge of god: vvhich lay before suppressed in them.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledge of God doth shiningly appeare in the making of the worlde and in the continual gouernement thereof.

Moreouer

MOreouer becauſe the furtheſt ende of bleſſed life ſtandeth in the knowledge of God: that the way to felicitie ſhould be ſtopped to none, therefore God hath not onely planted in the mindes of men that ſeede of religion which we haue ſpoken of, but alſo hath ſo diſcloſed himſelfe in the whole workemanſhip of the worlde, and daily ſo manifeſtly preſenteth himſelfe, that men cannot open their eyes but they muſt needes beholde him. His ſubſtance in deede is incomprehenſible, ſo that his diuine maieſtie farre furmounteth all mens ſenſes: but he hath in all his workes grauen certaine markes of his glorie, and thoſe ſo plaine and notably diſcernable, that the excuſe of ignorance is taken away from men, be they neuer ſo groſſe & dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfully cryeth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he ſhoulde haue ſaide, that then he firſt began to come foorth to be ſeene in viſible apparel, ſince the time that he firſt diſplayed his enſignes in the creation of the worlde, by which euen now what way ſoeuer wee turne our eyes, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the ſame place alſo the ſame Prophet aptly cõpareth the heauens as they be diſplaied abroad, to his royal pauillion: he ſaieth that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that the clouds are his chariots, that he rideth vppon the wings of the windes, that the windes and lightenings are his ſwift meſſengers. And becauſe the glorie of his power and wiſedome doeth more fully ſhine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his pallace. And firſt of all, what way ſoeuer thou turne thy eyes, there is no peece of the world be it neuer ſo ſmall, wherein are not ſeene at leaſt ſome ſparkles of his glorie to ſhine. But as for this moſt large & beautiful frame, thou canſt not with one viewe peruſe the wide compaſſe of it, but that thou muſt needes be on euery ſide ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrues doth verie wel call the ages of the world the ſpectacle of inuiſible things, for that the ſo orderly framing of the world ſerueth vs for a mirrour wherein we may behold God, which otherwiſe is inuiſible. For which cauſe the Prophet aſſigneth to the heauenly creatures a language that all nations vnderſtand, for that in them there is a more euident teſtification of the Godhead, than that it ought to eſcape the conſideration of any nation be they neuer ſo dull. Which thing the Apoſtle declaring more plainly ſayth, that there is diſcloſed vnto men ſo much as was behooueful to be knowen concerning God: becauſe al men without exception, do throughly ſee his inuiſible things euen to his verie power and Godhead, which they vnderſtand by the creation of the world.

Gods power & Godhead ſhineth ſo cleerely in the worlde, that it may be ſeene of all be they neuer ſo dull.

2. As for his wonderfull wiſedome, there are innumerable proues both in heauen and in earth that witneſſe it: I meane not onely that ſecreter ſort of things, for the neerer marking whereof Aſtrologie, Phiſicke, & all natural Philoſophy ſerueth, but euen thoſe things that thruſt themſelues in ſight of euery one, euen of the rudeſt vnlearned man, ſo that men cannot open their eies but they muſt needes be witneſſes of them. But truely they that haue digeſted, yea or but taſted the liberal arts, being holpen by the ayde thereof, doe proceede much further to looke into ſ secrets of Gods wiſedom. Yet is there no man ſo hindred by lack of knowledge of thoſe arts, but that he throughly ſeeth seeth abundantly enough of cunning workmanship in Gods works, to bring him in admiration of the workeman thereof. As for example to the searching out of the mouings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, and noting of their properties, there needeth art & an exacter diligence: by which being throughly perceiued, as the prouidēce of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is conuenient, that the mind rise somewhat the higher thereby to behold his glorie. But forasmuch as the vnlearned people, yea, and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the onely helpe of their eies, cannot be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so seuerally well ordered and disposed varietie doth of it selfe shewe forth it selfe: it is euident that there is no man to whom God doeth not largely open his wisedome.

In libr. de vsu part.

Likewise it requireth a singular sharpnes of wit, to wey with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportional agreement, the beautie, & vse in the frame of mans bodie: but by al mens confession, the body of man doth vtter in verie shew of it selfe so cunning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be iudged wonderfull.

VVee neede not seeke farre for the knowledge of god vvhē in our owne faces vvee may see him.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in olde time did not without cause call man a little worlde, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnesse and wisedome of God, and containeth in him selfe miracles ynough to occupie our mindes, if wee will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had saide that the verie blinde men may find out God by groping for him, by & by saith further, that he is not to be sought farre of, because al men doe feele vndoubtedly within themselues the heauenly grace wherewith they be quickened. But if wee neede to go no further then our selues, to finde & take holde of God: what pardon shall his slothfulnesse deserue that wil not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to find God? And the same is the reason why Dauid, when he had shortly spoken in the aduauncement of the wonderfull name & honour of God that do euery where gloriously shine, by & by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindfull of him? Againe, Out of the mouth of infants & sucking babes thou hast stablished strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kind of man is a mirror of the works of God, but also that the very infants while they yet hang on their mothers breastes, haue tongues eloquent enough to preach his glorie, so that there needeth no other orators. And therefore he doubteth not to set their mouthes in the vaward, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse that would according to their diuelish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And hereupon riseth that which Paul alledgeth out of Aratus, that we are the ofspring of God: because he garnishing vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euen by comon reason, and as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truely no man will assentingly and willingly yeeld him selfe to serue God, but he that hauing tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

Act.17.28.

4 *And here is disclosed the foule vnthankefulnesse of men, which while they haue within themselues a workehouse gloriously furnished with innumerable merable workes of God, and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plentie of riches, and when they ought to burst forth into praising of him, are contrariwise puffed vp and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diuersly in marueilous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great varietie of gifts they possesse by his liberalitie: whether they wil or no, they are enforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppresse it close within them. Truely they neede not to go out of them selues, so that they would not in presumptuously taking vpon themselues that which is giuen from heauen, burie within the ground that which brightly giueth light to their minds to see God. But euen at this day the earth beareth many monsterous spirites, which sticke not to abuse the whole seede of godhead that is sowen in mans nature, & to employ it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madnes, that man finding God a hundred times in his bodye and his soule, shoulde by the verie same pretence of excellencie deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chaunce made different from brute beastes. But they pretende a cloke of nature, whom they account the maker of all things, and so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workemanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eyes euen to the nailes of their toaes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare giftes of the soule, doe represent a diuine nature that doeth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giants Cyclopes would (bearing themselues bold vpō this hie degree) outragiously make warre against God. Do the whole treasures of the heauenly wisedome so meete together, to rule a worme of fiue feete long: and shall the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde bee without this prerogatiue? First to agree that there is a certeine instrumentall thing that answereth to all the partes of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure answere mee, what meeting of vndiuisible bodies, boyling the meate & drinke in man, doeth dispose parte into excrementes and parte into bloud, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeuouring to doe their office, euen as if so manie seuerall soules did by common aduise rule one bodie.

5 But I haue not now to doe with that stie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being giuen to suttelties, would by crooked conueiance writh that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bind the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body, & with praises of nature they doe as much as in them is, suppresse the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being enclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the starres, to learne the greatnesse of one, to knowe what space they be distant one from another, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or ỹ way? I graunt in deede that

They obscure the glorie of God, vvho binde the soule in such sort vnto the body that they take from it those operations vvhich depending not at all vpō corporall instruments do both shevv the diuine nature of the soule, and the povverfull prouidence of him that created it.

that there is some vse of Astrologie: but my meaning is only to shewe that in this so deep searching out of heauenly things, it is not an instrumental measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it selfe seuerall from the bodie. I haue shewed one example, by which it shalbe easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truely the manifold nimblenesse of the soule, by which it surueyeth both heauen & earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, keepeth in memorie things heard long before, & expresseth eche thing to it selfe by imagination, also the ingeniousnesse by which it inuenteth things incredible, & which is the mother of so many marueilous artes, are sure tokens of diuine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleeping it doth not only roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiueth manie things profitable, reasoneth of many things, and also prophecieth of things to come. What shal we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are imprinted in man, cannot be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shalbe of diuine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator? Shall wee forsooth by iudgement that is put into vs discerne betweene right & wrong, & shal there be no iudge in heauen? Shal we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of vnderstanding, & shal no God be waking in gouerning the world? Shal we be so counted the inuenters of so many artes and profitable things, that God shal be defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from an other and not from our selues, all that we haue, is in diuerse wise distributed among vs? As for that, which some do babble of the secret inspiration that giueth liuelinesse to the world, it is not only weake, but also vngodly. They like wel that famous saying of Vergil:

Aen. 6.

First heauen and earth, and flowing fieldes of seas,
The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars,
Spirite feedes within, and throughout all the lims,
Infused minde the whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large bigge bodie mixe it selfe.
Thence come the kinds of men and eke of beastes,
And liues of flying foules, and monsters strange,
That water beares within the marble Sea.
A fieire liuelinesse and heauenly race there is Within those seedes, &c.

Forsooth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the creator of it selfe. So in an other place the same author folowing the common opinion of the Greekes and Latins, sayth:

Geo. 4.

Some say that bees haue part of minde diuine,
And heauenly draughter. For eke they say that God
Gothe through the coastes of land, and creekes of sea,
And through deepe skie. And hence the flocks and herdes,
And men, and all the kindes of sauage beastes
Ech at their birth receiue their fustle liues.
And thereto are they rendred all at last,
And all resolued are returnd againe.
Ne place there is for death: but liuely they,

Flie into number of the ſtarres aboue,
And take their place within the loftie skie.

Loe, what that hungrie ſpeculation of the vniuerſall minde that giueth ſoule and liuelineſſe to the world, auaileth to engender and nouriſh godlines in the hearts of men. Which doth alſo better appeare by the blaſphemous ſayings of the filthie dogg Lucretius, which are deriued from the ſame principle. Euen this is it, to make a ſhadowiſh God, to driue farre away the true God whome we ought to feare and worſhip. I graunt in deede that this may be godlily ſaid, ſo that it proceede from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but becauſe it is a harde and an vnproper manner of ſpeach, foraſmuch as Nature is rather an order preſcribed by God: therefore in things of ſo great weight and to which is due a ſinguler religiouſneſſe, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confuſedly with the inferior courſe of his workes. Let vs therefore remember, ſo oft as any man conſidereth his owne nature, that there is one God which ſo gouerneth all natures, that his will is to haue vs looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worſhipped and called vpon of vs: becauſe there is nothing more againſt conueniencie of reaſon, than for vs to enioy thoſe excellent giftes that ſauour of diuine nature in vs, and to deſpiſe the author that freely doth giue them vnto vs. Nowe as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceably drawe vs to conſider it, vnleſſe perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a ſtrength it is with his onely word to vphold this infinite maſſe of heauen and earth, with his onely becke, ſometime to ſhake the heauen with noiſe of thunders, to burne vp eche thing with lightenings, to ſet the aire on fire with lightning flames, ſometime to trouble it with diuers ſortes of tempeſtes, and by and by the ſame God when he liſt in one moment to make faire weather: to holde in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heighth ſeemeth to threaten continuall deſtruction to the earth, ſometime in horrible wiſe to raiſe it vp with outragious violence of windes, and ſometime to appeaſe the waues and make it calme againe. For proofe hereof doe ſerue all the praiſes of God gathered of the teſtimonies of nature, ſpecially in the booke of Iob & in Eſay, which nowe of purpoſe I ouerpaſſe, becauſe they ſhall elſe where haue an other place fitter for them, where I ſhall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both ſtrangers and they of the houſhold of God haue this way of ſeeking God common to them both, that is, to follow theſe firſt draughts which both aboue and beneath doe as in a ſhadowe ſet forth a liuely image of him. And now the ſame power leadeth vs to conſider his eternitie. For it muſt needes be that he from whome all things haue their beginning, is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning of himſelfe. But nowe if any man enquire the cauſe whereby he both was once lead to creat all theſe things, and is now moued to preſerue them: we ſhal finde that his onely goodnes was it that cauſed him. Yea and although this onely be the cauſe, yet ought the ſame aboundantly to ſuffice to allure vs to the loue of him, for aſmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet ſayeth) vppon which his mercie is not powred out.

The vvorks of god in cherishing the good, punishing the vvicked, and calling sinners home vnto himselfe, are proofes of his exceeding power & vertue.

6 Also in the second sort of his workes, I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinarie course of nature, there doeth appeare no lesse euident proofe of his powers. For in gouerning the fellowship of men he so ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable meanes good and bountifull to all men, yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his fauourable kindnes to the godly, and his seueritie to the wicked and euil doers. For not doubtfull are the punishments that he layeth vpon haynous offences: like as he doth openly shew himselfe a defender and reuenger of innocency, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessitie, asswageth & comforteth their sorrowes, relieueth their calamities, & by all meanes prouideth for their safetie. Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his iustice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euil doers for a time to reioyce vnpunished: and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many aduersities, yea & to be oppressed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly. But rather a much contrarie consideration ought to enter into our mindes: that when by manifest shewe of his wrath he punisheth one sin, we should therfore thinke that he hateth all sinnes: and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished, we should therevpon thinke that there shalbe an other iudgement to which they are differred to be then punished. Likewise howe great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercie, while he oftentimes ceasseth not to shew his vnwearied bountifulnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse, vntill he haue subdued their frowardnes with doing them good?

The goodnes of god is shewed by deliuering men that are in miserie, his strength by ouerthrowing them that are mightie, his wisedome by disposing al things in fittest opportunitie.

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth, how God in cases past hope, doeth sodenly and wonderfully and beside all hope succour men that are in miserie and in a manner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wilderneſſe from the wilde beastes, and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth foode to the needie and hungrie, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dongeons and yron bands, or bringeth men in peril of shipwrack safe into the hauen, or healeth the half dead of diseases, or scorcheth ỹ earth with heat & drineſſe, or maketh it fruteful with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the baſest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the hie degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed foorth, he gathereth that those thinges which are iudged chaunces happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauenly prouidence and specially of his fatherly kindneſſe, and that therby is giuen matter of reioycing to the godly, and the wicked & reprobate haue their mouthes stopped. But becauſe the greater part infected with their errours are blinde in so cleare a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out, that it is a gift of rare & singular wisedome, wisely to wey these workes of God: by sight whereof they nothing profit that otherwise seeme most cleere sighted. And truely howe much soeuer ỹ glorie of God doth apparantly shine before them, yet scarsly the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power & wisedom are no more hid in darknes: whereof the one, his power, doeth notably appeare, when the fierce outragiousneſſe of the wicked being in all mens opinion vnfrom many, the feeble from the ſtrong. As for his wiſedom, it ſelfe ſheweth it ſelf manifeſtly excellent, while it diſpoſeth euery thing in fitteſt oportunitie, confoundeth the wiſedome of the world be it neuer ſo pearcing, findeth out ỹ ſubtile in their ſubtiltie, finally gouerneth al things by moſt conuenięt order.

8 We ſee that it needeth no long or laborſome demonſtration, to fetch out teſtimonies, to ſerue for the glorious declaration & proofe of Gods maieſtie: for by theſe fewe that we haue touched, it appeareth, that which way ſo euer a man chaunce to looke, they are ſo common & readie that they may be eaſily marked with eye, & pointed out with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that wee are called to the knowledge of God, not ſuch as contented with vaine ſpeculation, doeth but flye about in the braine, but ſuch as ſhalbe ſound & fruitful, if it be rightly conceiued & take roote in our hearts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force wherof becauſe we feele within vs, & do enioy the benefits of them, it muſt needes be that wee be inwardly moued much more liuely with ſuch a knowledge, than if we ſhould imagin God to be ſuch one, of whom we ſhould haue no feeling. Whereby we vnderſtand that this is the righteſt way & fitteſt order to ſeeke God, not to attempt to enter depely with preſumptuous curioſitie throughly to diſcuſſe his ſubſtāce, which is rather to be reuerently worſhipped than ſcrupulouſly ſearched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himſelfe nere & familiar, & doth in a maner communicate himſelfe vnto vs. And this the Apoſtle meant, when he ſaid, that God is not to be ſought a farre of, foraſmuch as he with his moſt preſent power dwelleth within euery one of vs. Wherefore Act.17.27.

to the particular rehearſal of his workes, proteſteth that the ſame will ſhewe foorth it ſelf. Therfore we alſo ought to giue our ſelues into ſuch a ſearching out of God, as may ſo holde our wit ſuſpended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly moue vs with effectual feeling. And, as Auguſtine teacheth in another place, becauſe we are not able to conceiue him, it behoueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatneſſe, to looke vnto his workes, that we may be refreſhed with his goodnes.

The true knowledge of God conſiſteth not in the curious ſearching of his nature, but in the inward feeling of his power.

In Pſa.144.

The knowledge of thoſe things which here God worketh vpon man, doth giue vs a taſte of that which ſhal be more fully accomplished in the life to come, eſpecially if we conſider his effectuall working in our ſelues.

9 Then ſuch a knowledge ought not onely to ſtirre vs vp to the worſhipping of God, but alſo to awake vs, and raiſe vs to hope of the life to come. For when we conſider that ſuch examples as God ſheweth both of his mercifulneſſe, and of his ſeueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without doubt we muſt thinke, that herein he doth but make a ſhewe afore hande of thoſe things, whereof the open diſcloſing & ful deliuerance is differred vnto another life. On the other ſide, when we ſee that ỹ godly are by the vngodly grieued with afflictions, troubled with iniuries, oppreſſed with ſlaunders, and vexed with deſpitefull dealings and reproches: contrariwiſe that wicked doers doe flouriſh, proſper and obtaine quiet with honour, yea, and that vnpuniſhed: we muſt by and by gather that there ſhal be an other life, wherein is layd vp in ſtore both due reuenge for wickednes, and rewarde for righteouſnes. Moreouer when we note that the faithfull are often chaſtiſed with the roddes of the Lord, wee may moſt certainly determine that much leſſe the vngodly ſhal eſcape his ſcourges. For verie well is that ſpoken of Auguſtine, If euery ſinne ſhould now be puniſhed with open paine, it woulde be thought that nothing were reſerued to the laſt iudgement. Againe, if God ſhoulde now openly puniſh no ſinne, it would be beleeued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we muſt confeſſe, that in euery particular worke of God, but principally in the vniuerſall generalitie of them, the powers of God are ſet foorth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But whereas theſe his powers do in his workes moſt brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what valour they be, and to what end we ought to wey them: this we then only attaine to vnderſtand when we diſcend into our ſelues, and do conſider by what meanes God doth ſhewe forth in vs his life, wiſedome, and power, and doth vſe towardes vs his righteouſnes, goodneſſe, and mercifull kindneſſe. For though Dauid iuſtly complaineth, that the vnbeleeuing do dote in folly, becauſe they wey not the deepe counſailes of God in his gouernance of mankind: yet, that is alſo moſt true, which he ſayth in another place, that the wonderfull wiſedome of God in that behalfe exceedeth the hayres of our head. But becauſe this point ſhall hereafter in place conuenient be more largely entreated, therefore I doe at this time paſſe it ouer.

De ciui. dei, c. 8.

Pſa. 92. 7.

Pſal. 40. 13.

God manifeſting himſelfe, men profit not by it, becauſe they beholde things don vvithout regarding the doer, or they aſcribe that to fortune vvhich hee doeth, or if they haue ſome feeling of God, they depraue it vvith doting fancies, vvhich fault is common vnto all, euen the sharpeſt vvitted.

10 But with howe greate brightneſſe ſoeuer God doeth in the mirror of his workes ſhewe by repreſentation both himſelfe and his immortall kingdome: yet ſuch is our groſſe blockiſhneſſe, that wee ſtande dully amaſed at ſo plaine teſtimonies, ſo that they paſſe away from vs without profite. For, as touching the frame and moſt beautifull placing of the worlde, how many a one is there of vs, that when hee either lifteth vp his eyes to heauen, or caſteth them about on the diuerſe countries of the earth, doeth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, & doth not rather reſt in beholding the workes without hauing regard of the workeman? But as touching thoſe things that daily happen beſide the order of naturall courſe, how many a one is there that doeth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about & rowled by blinde vnaduiſedneſſe of fortune, than gouerned by prouidence of God? But if at any time we be by the guiding & direction of theſe things driuen to the conſideration of God, (as all men muſt needes be) yet ſo ſoone as we haue without aduiſement conceiued a feeling of ſome godhead, we by & by ſlide away to the dotages or erronious inuentions of our fleſh, & with our vanitie we corrupt the pure veritie of God. So herein in deede we differ one frō an other, that euery man priuately by himſelfe procureth to himſelfe ſome peculiar error: but in this point we all are moſt like together, that wee

all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wittes are subiect, but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpnesse of vnderstanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewrayed their owne dulnesse and beastly ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe ouer all the rest, which are much more vnreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe, the most religious and most sober of all the rest, vainely erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chaunce to the other, when the chiefe of them, whose part was to giue light to the rest, doe themselues so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods gouernance of mens matters doth so plainly proue his prouidēce, that it cannot be denied, yet this doeth no more preuaile with men, than if they beleeued that all things are tossed vp and downe with the rash will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanitie and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnesse hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

11 Hereof proceedeth that vnmeasurable sinck of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bin filled and ouerflowen. For ech mans wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no maruel that euery seuerall nation was diuersly drawen into seuerall deuises, and not that onely, but also that ech seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnesse was ioyned to ignorance and darknesse, there hath beene scarcely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idole or fansie in steede of God. Truely, euen as out of a wide and large spring doe issue waters, so the infinite number of gods hath flowed out of ỹ wit of man, while euery man ouer licentiously straying, erroniously deuiseth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I neede not here to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the worlde hath beene entangled: because both in so doing I should neuer haue ende, and also though I speake not one worde of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth howe horrible is the blindnesse of mans minde. I passe ouer the rude and vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason and learning to pearce into heauen, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wit that any of them was endued, and filled with art and science, with so much the more glorious colours he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one doe narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false colours. The Stoickes seemed in their owne conceite to speake verie wisely, that out of al the partes of nature may be gathered diuerse names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in sunder. As though we were not alreadie more than enough enclined to vanitie, vnlesse a manifold plentie of gods set before vs, should further and more violently draw vs into error. Also the Ægyptians mysticall science of diuinitie sheweth, that they al diligently endeuoured to this end, not to seem to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceiue the simple & ignorant: but no mortall man euer inuented any thing, whereby religion hath not bin fowly corrupted.

Men vvhen they trust to their owne vvittes, become in their opinions concerning God, either vaine, as the Stoikes, and the Ægyptians, or irreligious as the Epicures, or irresolute as Symonides.

And this ſo confuſe diuerſitie emboldened the Epicures & other groſſe deſpiſers of godlineſſe, by little and little to caſt of al feeling of God. For when they ſaw the wiſeſt of all to ſtriue in contrarie opinions, they ſticked not out of their diſagreements, & out of the fooliſh or apparantly erronious doctrine of each of them, to gather, that men doe in vaine and fondly procure torments to themſelues while they ſearch for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without puniſhment, becauſe it was better briefely to denie vtterly, that there is any God, than to faigne vncertaine gods, and ſo to raiſe vp contentions that neuer ſhould haue end. And too much fondly do they reaſon, or rather caſt a miſt, to hide their vngodlines by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reaſon that any thing ſhoulde be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all do confeſſe, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned doe ſo much diſagree, thereupon is gathered that the wittes of men are more than dull and blinde in heauenly myſteries, that do ſo erre in ſeeking out of God. Some other doe praiſe that anſwere of Symonides, which being demaunded of King Hieron, what God was, deſired to haue a dayes reſpite graunted him to ſtudie vppon it. And when the next day following, the king demaunded the ſame queſtion he required two dayes reſpite, and ſo oftentimes doubling the number of dayes at length he aunſwered: How much the more I conſider it, ſo much the harder the matter ſeemeth vnto mee. But graunting that he did wiſely to ſuſpend his ſentence of ſo darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be onely taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, ſoundly, and plainly concerning God, but onely are tyed to confuſed principles to worſhip an vnknowen God.

It cannot be true vvorshipping of God vvhich is grounded onely vpon common reaſon, cuſtome, or conſent of men, beeng not taught by the lavv vvhat God they ought to vvorship.

12 Now we muſt alſo hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religion (as all they muſt needes doe that are giuen to their owne opinion) doe depart from the one God. They wil boaſt that their meaning is otherwiſe: but what they meane, or what they perſuade themſelues maketh not much to ỹ matter, ſith the holy ghoſt pronounceth, ỹ al they are Apoſtataes, that according to the darknes of their own mind do thruſt dinels in the place of God. For this reaſon, Paul pronounceth that the Epheſians were without a God, til they had learned by the goſpel, what it was to worſhip the true God. And we muſt not think this to be ſpoken of one nation only, for as much as he generally affirmeth in another place, that all men were become vaine in their imaginations, ſince that in the creation of the world, the Maieſtie of the creator was diſcloſed vnto them. And therefore the ſcripture, to make place for the true & one only God, condemneth of falſehod & lying, whatſoeuer godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at al, but in the mount Sion, where flouriſhed the peculiar knowledge of God. Truely, among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Chriſtes time ſeemed to approch nigheſt to true godlines: and yet we heare it ſpoken by Chriſtes owne mouth, that they knew not what they worſhipped. Wherupon foloweth, that they were deceiued with vaine error. Finally, although they were not all infected with groſſe faults, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approued religion that was grounded only vpon common reaſon. For albeit, that there were a fewe that were not so mad as ỹ comon people were, yet this doctrine of Paul remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world conceiue not the wisedom of God. Now if ỹ most excellent haue wandred in darknesse, what is to be saide of the verie dregges? Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the holy Ghost do refuse as bastarde worshippings all formes of worshipping, deuised by the wil of men. Because in heauenly mysteries opinion conceiued by wit of men, although it doe not alway breede a heap of errors, yet is alway the mother of errour. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no small fault, at aduenture, to worship an vnknowen God: of which fault, al they by Christs own mouth are pronounced guiltie, ỹ are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to say that religion was grounded vpon common consent. Yea, and in Xenophon, Socrates praised the answere of Apollo, wherein he willed that euery man should worship gods after the maner of the countrey, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortal men by this power, of their owne authoritie to determine that which farre surmounteth the world? or who can so rest in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinances of peoples, as to receiue without doubting a God deliuered by mans deuise? Euery man rather wil stand to his own iudgement, than yeelde himselfe to the will of another. Sith therefore it is too weake & feeble a bond of godlines, in worshipping of God to followe either a custome of a citie or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God himselfe must testifie of himselfe from heauen.

1. Cor. 2. 8.

Iohn. 4. 22.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightned doe shine in the edifice of the world, to shew foorth the glorie of the creator, which do so euery way display their beames vpon vs, that yet of themselues they cannot bring vs into the right way. In deede they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as be choked vp before that they can spread abroad any full brightnes. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the worlde images of things inuisible, saith further, that by faith is perceiued, that they were framed by the word of God, meaning thereby that the inuisible godhead is in deede represented by such shewes, but that wee haue no eyes to see the same throughly, vnlesse they be enlightned by ỹ reuelation of God through faith. And Paul, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be knowen concerning God, doeth not meane such a disclosing as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth, that the same proceedeth no further but to make them vnexcusable. The same Paul also, although in one place he saith, that God is not to be sought a far of as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in another place teacheth to what ende that neereneſse auaileth. In the ages past (saith he) God suffred the nations to walke in their own wayes: yet he left not himselfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, giuing showers & fruitfull seasons, filling the hearts of men with foode & gladnes. Howsoeuer therefore the Lorde be not without testimonie, while with his great and manifold bountifulneſse he sweetely allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for al that, they ceasse not to follow their own wayes, that is to say, their damnable errours.

By the creatures of the vvorld vve cannot aſpire to the true knovvledge of God, except our hearts be alſo enlightened by him through faith.

Heb. 11. 3.

Act. 17. & 27.

Act. 13. & 16.

Our ignorance nevertheleſſe becauſe it commeth by our owvne fault is vvithout excuſe.

14 But although we want natural power, whereby wee cannot climbe vp vnto the pure and cleare knowledge of God, yet becauſe the fault of our dulneſſe is in our ſelues, therefore all coulour of excuſe is cut awaye from vs. For we cannot ſo pretende ignorance, but that euen our conſcience doth ſtil condemne vs of ſlouthfulneſſe and vnthankfulneſſe. It is a defence forſooth right worthie to be receiued, if man wil alleage that he wãted eares to heare the trueth, for the publiſhing whereof the verie dumb creatures haue lowde voices: if man ſhall ſay that he cannot ſee thoſe things with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes do ſhewe him: if man ſhall lay for his excuſe the feeblenes of his wit, where all creatures without reaſon doe inſtruct him: Wherefore ſith all things do ſhew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuſe of our wandering and ſtraying out of the waye. But howſoeuer it is to be imputed to the fault of men, that they do by and by corrupt the ſeede of the knowledge of God, ſowne in their mindes by maruelous workmanſhip of nature, ſo that it groweth not to good and cleane fruite: yet it is moſt true, that wee are not ſufficiently inſtructed by that bare and ſimple teſtimony, that the creatures doe honourably declare of Gods glorie. For ſo ſoone as wee haue taken by the beholding of the worlde a ſmall taſte of the godhead, we leauing the true God doe in ſtead of him raiſe vp dreames and fanſies of our owne braine, and doe conuey hither and thither from the true fountaine the praiſe of righteouſnes, wiſdome, goodneſſe and power. Moreouer we doe ſo either obſcure, or by ill eſteeming them, depraue his dayly doings, that wee take away both from them their glorie, and from the Author his due praiſe.

The vi. Chapter.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is needefull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maiſtreſſe.

The true creater & gouernor of the vvorld cannot perfectly be knovven vvithout the vvord, vvhich meane, God hath vſed euer ſithens the beginning, to inſtruct his people by.

THerefore, although that ſame brightneſſe, which both in heauen & earth ſhineth in the eyes of all men, doeth ſufficiently take away all defence from the wickedneſſe of men, euen ſo as God, to wrap all mankinde in one giltineſſe, doeth ſhewe his diuine maieſtie to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it neceſſarie that wee haue alſo an other and a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the verie Creator of the worlde. Therefore not in vaine hee hath added the light of his worde, that thereby he might bee knowen to ſaluation. And this prerogatiue hee hath vouchſafed to giue vs, whome it pleaſed him more neerely and more familiarly to drawe together to himſelfe. For becauſe he ſawe the mindes of all men to be carried about with wandering and vnſtedfaſt motion, after hee had choſen the Iewes to his peculiar flocke, he compaſſed them in as it were with barres, that they ſhould not wander out in vanitie as other did. And not without cauſe he holdeth vs with the ſame meane in the true knowledge of himſelfe. For otherwiſe euen they ſhould quickly ſwarue away that ſeeme to ſtande ſtedfaſt in compariſon of other. For as olde men, or purblinde, or they whoſe eyes are dimme ſighted, if you laye a faire booke before them, though they perceiue that there is ſomewhat written therein, yet can they not read two wordes together: but being holpen with spectacles set between them and it, they beginne to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp together in our mindes the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but confused, doth remoue the mist, and plainly shewe vs the true God. This therefore is a singular gift, that to the instruction of his church God vseth not only dumme teachers, but also openeth his owne holy mouth: not onely publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therwithal pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worship: and doth not onely teach the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth himselfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept from the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to giue them also his worde. Which is the righter and certainer marke to knowe him by. And it is not to be douted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham, & the rest of the fathers by this help attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were seuerally different from the vnbeleeuers I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternal life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was needefull for them to knowe God not only to be the creator, but also the redeemer: as doubtlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kinde of knowledge whereby was giuen to vnderstand who is the God by whom the world was made & is gouerned, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adioyned, which only quickneth dead soules, whereby God is knowen not only to be the maker of the world & the only author & iudge of al things that are done, but also to be the redeemer in the person of the mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world & corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreat of the remedie thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the couenant whereby God hath adopted to himself the children of Abraham, & of that speciall part of doctrine whereby the faithful haue alway bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane nations: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine marks seuerally discerned from the counterfait multitude of false gods. And then the order it selfe shal conueniently bring vs to the redeemer. But although we shall alleage many testimonies out of thee new Testament, and some also out of the law & the Prophets, wherein is expresse mention made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this ende, to proue that in the scripture is disclosed vnto vs God the creator of the world, & in the scripture is set forth what we ought to thinke of him, to the end that wee should not seeke about the bush for an vncertaine godhead.

The fathers which knewe God by the worde, knewe also the worde to be of god who hath published the same in writing, that all ages might bee taught by it.

2 But whether God were knowen to the fathers by oracles & visions, or whether by ỹ meane & ministration of men he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliuer to their posteritie: yet it is vndoubtedly true, that in their hearts was engrauen a stedfast certeintie of doctrine, so as they might be persuaded & vnderstand, that it which they had learned came from God. For God alwayes made vndoubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded al vncertain opinion. At length that by continual proceeding of doctrine, the trueth surviuing in all ages might still remaine in the worlde, the same oracles which hee had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to haue as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this entent was the law published, whervnto after were added the Prophets for expositors. For though there were diuers vses of the law, as hereafter shal better appeare in place conuenient: and specially the principal purpose of Moses & al the Prophets was to teach the maner of reconciliation between god & men, for which cause also Paul calleth Christ the end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrin of faith & repentance which sheweth forth Christ ỹ mediatour, the Scripture doth by certain markes & tokens paint out the only & true God, in that that he hath created & doth gouerne the world, to the end he should be seuerally knowen & not reckned in the false number of famed gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earnestly to bende his eyes to consider the workes of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bende his eares to the word, that he may better profit therby. And therfore it is no marueil that they which are borne in darknesse do more & more waxe harde in their amazed dulnes, because verie few of them doe giue themselues pliable to learn of the word of God, whereby to keepe them within their bounds, but they rather reioyce in their own vanitie. Thus then ought we to hold, ỹ to the end true religion may shine among vs, we must take our beginning at the heauenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any tast be it neuer so little of true & sound doctrine, vnlesse he haue bin scholer to the scripture. And from hence groweth the original of true vnderstanding, that we reuerently embrace whatsoeuer it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not only the perfect & in al points absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truely in this behalfe God of his singular prouidence hath prouided for men in and for all ages.

Rom. 10. 4.

For manie causes it was needefull the word shoulde be written, and that we should trie our selues therunto.

3 For if we consider how slippery an inclination mans mind hath to slyde into forgetfulnes of God, how great a readines to fall into all kind of errors, how great a lust to forge oftentimes newe & counterfait religions, wee may thereby perceiue how necessarie it was to haue the heauenly doctrine so put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulnes, or growe vaine by errour, or be corrupted by boldnes of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alway vsed the helpe of his word, toward al those whom it pleased him at any time fruitfully to instruct, because he foresaw that his image emprinted in the most beautiful forme of ỹ world was not sufficiently effectuall: Therefore it behoueth vs to trauaile this straight way, if wee earnestly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his worde, wherein God is wel & liuely set out by his workes, when his workes be weyed not after the peruersinesse of our owne iudgement, but according to the rule of ỹ eternal trueth. If we swarue from that word, as I said euen now, although wee runne neuer so fast: yet wee shall neuer attaine to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must think, ỹ the brightnesse of the face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be atteined vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which wee cannot vnwrap our selues,

vnleſſe we be by the line of the word guided into it: ſo that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to runne neuer ſo faſt in another. And therefore Dauid oftentimes when he teacheth that ſuperſtitions are to be taken away out of the worlde, that pure religion may flouriſh, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this worde reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine whereby he challengeth to himſelfe a lawfull gouernement: becauſe errours can neuer be rooted out of the hearts of men, til the true knowledge of God be planted. Pſa.9.& 96.97. 59.&c.

4 Therfore the ſame Prophet, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glory of God, that the firmament ſheweth foorth the workes of his hands, that the orderly ſucceeding courſe of daies & nightes preacheth his maieſtie, then deſcendeth to make mention of his word. The lawe of the Lord (ſaith he) is vndefiled, conuerting ſoules: the witnes of the lord is faithful, giuing wiſdom to little ones: the righteouſneſſes of the Lord are vpright, making harts chearful, the cõmandement of the Lord is bright, giuing light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth alſo the other vſes of the lawe, yet in generalitie he meaneth, that foraſmuch as God doth in vaine cal vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth, therefore this is the peculiar ſchoole of the children of God. The ſame meaning hath the 29. Pſalme, where the Prophet hauing preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, ſhowers, whirlewinds and ſtormes, ſhaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the Ceder trees: in the end at laſt he goeth further and ſaith, that his praiſes are ſung in the ſanctuarie, becauſe the vnbeleeuers are deafe and heare not all the voices of God that reſound in the aire. And in like manner in an other Pſalme, after that he had deſcribed the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus concludeth: thy teſtimonies are verified, the beautie of thy temple is holines for euer. And out of this mearing alſo proceeded that which Chriſt ſaide to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the reſt did honour that which they knewe not, and that onely the Iewes did worſhip the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reaſon of the feeblenes thereof can by no meane attaine vnto God, but being holpen and lifted vp by his holye worde, it folowed of neceſſitie, that all men, except the Iewes, did wander in vanitie and errour, becauſe they ſought God without his word. Pſal.19.21. It is in vaine to ſeeke God by contemplation of his creatures vvithout the ſtudie of his vvord. Pſal.93.5. Iohn.4.22.

The vij. Chapter.

By vvhat teſtimonie the Scripture ought to be eſtabliſhed, that is by the vvitneſſe of the holy Ghoſt, that the authoritie thereof may remaine certaine. And that it is a vvicked inuention to ſay that the credit thereof doth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

BVt before I go any further, it is needefull to ſay ſomewhat of the authority of the Scripture, not onely to prepare mens mindes to reuerence it, but alſo to take away all doubt thereof. Now, when it is a matter confeſſed that it is the word of God that is there ſet foorth, there is no man of ſo deſperate boldneſſe, vnleſſe he be voide of all common ſenſe and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that ſpeaketh it. But becauſe there are The credit of the ſcripture doth not depend vpon the churches receiuing and authoriſing of it.

not dayly oracles giuen from heauen, and the onely Scriptures remaine wherin it hath pleased him to preserue his truth to perpetual memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credit among the faithfull, but in that they do beleeue that it is as verily come from heauen, as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therin. This matter in deede is right worthie both to be largely entreated of and diligently weyed. But the readers shall pardon mee if I rather regarde what the proportion of the worke which I haue begon may beare, than what the largenes of the matter requireth. There is growne vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath onely so much authoritie as by common consent of the Church is giuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuiolable trueth of God did rest vppon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy ghost, they aske of vs who can assure vs that these scriptures came from God: or who can ascertaine vs that they haue continued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently receiued, & that other to be striken out of the number of scripture, vnlesse the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? I. hangeth therefore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, and what bookes are to be reckened in the canon thereof. So these robbers of Gods honor, while they seeke vnder colour of the church to bring in an vnbridled tyrannie, care nothing with what absurdities they snare both themselues and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleeued among the simple, that the church can doe all things. But if it be so: what shal become of the poore consciences that seeke stedfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine thereof stande and be staied onely vpon the iudgement of men? When they receiue such answere, shall they sease to wauer and tremble? Againe, to what scornes of the vngodly is our faith made subiect? into howe great suspition with all men is it brought, if this be beleeued, that it hath but as it were a borowed credit by the fauour of men?

The Church depending vpon the scripture, doth not by her testimonie giue it credit, but because it hath an euidece of certaintie with it selfe, doth therefore of duetie acknowledge it to be the truth of God.

2 But such bablers are well confuted euen with one worde of the Apostle. He testifieth that the church is builded vpō the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needes be, that the same doctrine stoode in stedfast certeintie, before that the Church began to be. Neither can they well cauil, that although the Church take her first beginning thereof, yet it remaineth doubtful what is to be said of the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, vnlesse the iudgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophets & preaching of the Apostles: whersoeuer that doctrine shalbe founde, the allowed credit thereof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had neuer bin. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuise, that the Church hath power to iudge the scripture, so as the certaintie of the scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore, when the Church doth receiue the scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doubtfull, and that otherwise should be in controuerſie, make it autentike and of credite: but becauſe ſhee acknowledgeth it to be the trueth of her God, according to her duetie of godlineſſe without delay ſhee doth honor it. Whereas they demaunde, howe ſhall wee be perſwaded that it came from God, vnleſſe wee reſort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man ſhoulde aske, howe ſhall wee learne to know light from darkeneſſe, white from blacke, or ſweete from ſower. For the Scripture ſheweth in it ſelfe no leſſe apparant ſenſe of her trueth, than white and blacke things doe of their colour, or ſweete & ſower things of taſte.

3 I know that they commonly alleage the ſaying of Auguſtine, where hee ſaith that he would not beleeue the Goſpell, ſaue that the authoritie of the Church moued him thereto. But how vntruely and cauillouſly it is alleged for ſuch a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is eaſie to perceiue. He had to doe with the Manichees, which required to be beleeued without gainſaying, when they vaunted that they had the trueth on their ſide, but proued it not. And to make their Manicheus to be beleeued, they pretended the Goſpel. Now Auguſtine asketh them what they would do, if they did light vpon a man that would not beleeue the goſpel it ſelfe, with what manner of perſwaſion they would draw him to their opinion. Afterward he ſaith: I my ſelfe would not beleeue the Goſpel, &c. ſaue that the authoritie of the church moued me therto. Meaning that he himſelf, when he was a ſtranger from the faith, could not otherwiſe be brought to embrace the goſpell for the aſſured trueth of God, but by this, that he was ouercome with the authoritie of the church. And what maruel is it, if a man not yet knowing Chriſt, haue regard to men? Auguſtine therefore doeth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authoritie of the church, nor meaneth that the certainty of ỹ goſpel doth hang therupon: but ſimply & onely, that there ſhould be no aſſurednes of the goſpel to the infidels, whereby they might be won to Chriſt, vnleſſe the conſent of the church did driue them vnto it. And ỹ ſame meaning a little before he doth plainly confirme in this ſaying. When I ſhall praiſe that which I beleeue, & ſcorne that which thou beleeueſt, what thinkeſt thou meete for vs to iudge or do? but that we forſake ſuch men as firſt cal vs to come and know certaine truethes, and after commaund vs to beleeue things vncertaine: and that wee follow them that require vs firſt to beleeue that which we are not yet able to ſee, that being made ſtrong by beleeuing, we may attaine to vnderſtand the thing that we beleeue: not men now, but God himſelf inwardly ſtrengthning and giuing light to our mind. Theſe are the verie words of Auguſtine: whereby euery man may eaſily gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credite that wee haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awardement of the church, but onely to ſhewe this, (which wee our ſelues alſo do confeſſe to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the ſpirite of God, are brought by the reuerence of the church vnto a willingnes to be taught, ſo as they can find in their hearts to learne the faith of Chriſt by the Goſpel: and that thus by this meane the authoritie of the Church is an introduction, whereby wee are prepared to beleeue the Goſpell. For, as wee ſee, his minde is that the aſſurance of the godly godly be ſtayed vpon a far other foundation. Otherwiſe I doe not denye but that he often preſſeth the Manichies with the conſent of the whole church, when he ſeeketh to proue the ſame Scripture which they refuſed. And from hence it came, that he ſo reproched Fauſtus for that he did not yeld himſelfe to the truth of the goſpel ſo grounded, ſo ſtabliſhed, ſo glorioufly renoumed and from the verie time of the Apoſtles by certaine ſucceſſions perpetually commended. But he neuer trauaileth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter ẏ he diſputed of, he bringeth forth ẏ vniuerſal iudgement of the church, wherein he had the auantage of his aduerſaries. If any deſire a fuller proofe hereof, let him read his booke concerning the profit of beleeuing. Where he ſhal find that there is no other readineſſe of belieſe commended vnto vs by him, but that which only giueth vs an entrie, and is vnto vs a conuenient beginning to enquire, as he termeth it: and yet not that we ought to reſt vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and ſound trueth.

Contra Fauſtũ lib. 32.

Aug. de vtilita te cred.

Although there be reaſon enough to proue the diuine authoritie of the ſcripture againſt the cauillations of prophane men yet cannot it hereby finde that credit in the harts of men vvhich the aſſurance of godlines doth require, except it be inwvardly ſtaled by the teſtimonie of the holy Ghoſt, the ſame being the vvitneſſe vvhich vvas the author of it.

4 We ought to hold, as I before ſaid, that the credit of this doctrine, is not eſtabliſhed in vs, vntil ſuch time as wee be vndoubtedly perſuaded ẏ God is the author thereof. Therefore the principal proofe of the Scripture is commonly taken of the perſon of God the ſpeaker of it. The Prophets and Apoſtles boaſt not of their owne ſharp wit or any ſuch things as procure credite to men that ſpeake: neither ſtand they vpon proues by reaſon, but they bring foorth the holy name of God, thereby to compel the whole worlde to obedience Now we haue to ſee how not only by probable opinion, but by aparant truth it is euident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cauſe nor deceirfully pretended. If then we wil prouide wel for conſciences, ẏ they be not continually caried about with vnſtedfaſt doubting, nor may wauer, nor ſtay at euery ſmal ſtop, this maner of perſuaſion muſt be fetched deeper than from either the reaſons, iudgements or the coniectures of men, euen from the ſecret teſtimonie of the holy Ghoſt. True in deede it is, that if wee liſted to worke by way of argumentes, many things might be alledged that may eaſily proue, if there be any God in heauen, that the law, the prophecies and the goſpel came from him. Yea, although men learned & of deepe iudgement would ſtand vp to the contrarie, & would employ and ſhewe foorth the whole force of their wits in this diſputation: yet if they be not ſo hardned as to become deſperately ſhameleſſe, they would be compelled to confeſſe, that there are ſeene in the ſcripture manifeſt tokens that it is God that ſpeaketh therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrin therof is from heauen. And ſhortly hereafter we ſhal ſee, ẏ all the bookes of the holy ſcripture do far excel al other writings whatſoeuer they be. Yea, if we bring thither pure eyes & vncorrupted ſenſes, we ſhal forthwith find there the maieſtie of God, which ſhal ſubdue al hardnes of gainſaying, and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they doe diſorderly, that by diſputation trauel to eſtabliſh the perfect credit of the ſcripture. And truely although I am not furniſhed with great dexteritie, nor eloquence: yet if I were to contend with the moſt ſubtile deſpiſers of God, that haue a deſire to ſhew themſelues wittie & pleaſant in feebling the

authoritie of Scripture, I truſt it ſhould not be hard for mee to put to ſilence their bablings. And if it were profitable to ſpende labour in confuting their cauilations, I would with no great buſineſſe ſhake in ſunder the bragges that they mutter in corners. But though a man doe deliuer the ſound worde of God from the reproches of men, yet that ſufficeth not foorthwith to faſten in their hearts that aſſuredneſſe that godlineſſe requireth. Prophane men becauſe they thinke religion ſtandeth onely in opinion, to the ende they would beleeue nothing fondly or lightly, doe couet and require to haue it proued to them by reaſon, that Moſes and the Prophets ſpake from God. But I anſwere, that the teſtimonie of the holy Ghoſt is better than all reaſon. For as only God is a conuenient witneſſe of himſelfe in his owne worde, ſo ſhal the ſame word neuer find credit in the hearts of men, vntill it be ſealed vp with the inward witnes of the holy ghoſt. It behoueth therefore of neceſſitie that the ſame holy Ghoſt which ſpake by the mouth of the Prophets, do enter into our hearts to perſuade vs, that they faithfully vttered that which was by God commaunded them. And this order is verie aptly ſet foorth by Eſai in theſe wordes: My ſpirit which is in thee, and the wordes that I haue put in thy mouth and in the mouth of thy ſeede, ſhall not faile for euer. It greeueth ſome good men, that they haue not ready at hande ſome cleare proofe to alleage, when the wicked do without puniſhment murmure againſt the worde of God: As though the holy Ghoſt were not for this cauſe called both a ſeale and a pledge, becauſe vntil he doe lighten mens mindes, they do alway wauer among many doutings. Eſay. 51. 16.

5 Let this therefore ſtand for a certainly perſuaded truth, that they whom the holy Ghoſt hath inwardly taught, do wholy reſt vpon the ſcripture, and ỳ the ſame ſcripture is to be credited for it ſelfe ſake, & ought not to be made ſubiect to demonſtration and reaſons: but yet the certeintie which it getteth among vs, it attaineth by the witnes of the holy Ghoſt. For though by the onely maieſtie of it ſelfe it procureth reuerence to be giuen to it: yet then onely it throughly pearceth our affections, when it is ſealed in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt. So being lightned by his vertue, wee doe then beleeue, not by our owne iudgement, or other mens, that the ſcripture is from God: but aboue al mans iudgement we hold it moſt certainly determined, euen as if we beheld the maieſtie of God himſelfe there preſent, that by the miniſterie of men it came to vs from the verie mouth of God. Wee ſeeke not for arguments and likelihodes to reſt our iudgement vpon: but as to a thing without al compaſſe of conſideration, we ſubmit our iudgement & wit vnto it. And that not in ſuch ſort as ſome are wont ſometime haſtily to take hold of a thing vnknowen, which after being throughly perceiued diſpleaſeth them: but becauſe we are in our conſciences wel aſſured ỳ wee hold an inuincible truth. Neither in ſuch ſort, as ſilly men are wont to yeeld their minde in thraldom to ſuperſtitions: but becauſe we vndoubtedly perceiue therein the ſtrength & breathing of the diuine maieſtie, wherwith we are drawen & ſtirred to obey, both wittingly & willingly, & yet more liuely & effectually than mans will or wit can attaine. And therefore for good cauſe doeth God cry out by Eſay, that the Prophets with the whole people doe beare him witnes, Eſa. 43. 10.

The ſcripture for it ſelfe ſake is wor thie of credit, which notwithſtanding it doeth not obtaine in vs, til our hearts be ſo enlightened that we therein perceiue as it were the verie breathing of the diuine maieſtie.

witnesse, because being taught by prophecies they did vndoubtedly beleeue without guile or vncertaintie that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our persuasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, euen such a one, wherein the mind more assuredly & stedfastly resteth, than vpon any reasons: such is our feeling, as cannot proceede but by reuelation from heauen. I speake now of none other thing but that which euery one of the faithfull doeth by experience finde in himself, saving that my words do much want of a ful declaration of it. I leaue here many things vnspoken, because there wilbe elswhere againe a conuenient place to entreat of this matter. Only now let vs know, that onely that is the true faith which the spirite of God doth seale in our hearts. Yea with this only reason wil the sober reader, and willing to learne, be contented. Esai promiseth, that all the children of the renued church shalbe the scholers of God. A singular priuiledge therein doth God vouchsafe to grant to his elect only, whom he seuereth from all the rest of mankinde. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a readie cheerefulnes to heare the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moses, as it is written: Say nor in thy heart, who shall ascend into heauen, or who shal descend into the deepe? the word is euen in thine own mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of vnderstanding be layde vp in store for his children, it is no maruel nor vnlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seene such ignorance and dulnesse. The common multitude I call euen the most excellent of them, vntil such time as they be graffed into the body of the church. Moreouer Esai giuing warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible, not only to strangers but also to the Iewes that would be accounted of the houshold of God, addeth this reason: because the arme of God shal not be reueiled to al men. So oft therefore as the smalnesse of number of the beleeuers doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the mysteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

The viii. Chapter.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proues to establish the credit of Scripture.

The scripture being once deuoutly embraced, we are afterwarde the more established by considering the diuine disposition, maiestie & agreement which is in it, and the force which it hath in our minds through dignitie of matter, not grace of wordes.

VNlesse we haue this assurance, which is both more excellent and of more force than any iudgement of man, in vaine shall the authoritie of scripture either be strengthened with arguments, or stablished with consent of y church, or confirmed with any other means of defence. For vnlesse this foundation be layde, it still remaineth hanging in doubt. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of things, wee haue embraced it deuoutly, and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become verie fit helpes, which before were but of small force to graffe and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is marueilous, how great establishment groweth hereof, when with earnest studie wee consider how orderly & well framed a disposition of the diuine wisedome appeareth therein, howe heauenly a doctrine in euerie place of it, & nothing sauoring of earthlinesse, howe

howe beautifull an agreement of all the partes among themselues, and such other things as auaile to procure a maiestie to writings. But more perfectly are our hearts confirmed when wee consider, howe wee are euen violently carried to an admiration of it, rather with dignitie of matter, than with grace of wordes. For this also was not done without the singular prouidence of God, that the hie mysteries of the heauenly kingdome shoulde for the most part bee vttered vnder a contemptible baseneſſe of wordes, least if it had beene beautified with more glorious speach, the wicked should cauile that the onely force of eloquence doeth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a manner rude simplicitie doeth raise vp a greater reuerence of it selfe than any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may wee iudge, but that there is a more mightie strength of trueth in the holye Scripture, than that it needeth any art of wordes? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to proue that the faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God, and not vpon mans wisedome, beeause his preaching among them was set forth not with entising speach of mans wisedome, but in plaine euidence of the spirite and of power. For the trueth is then set free from all douting, when not vpholden by foraigne aides it selfe alone sufficeth to sustaine it selfe. But howe this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the writings of men, be they neuer so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our affections. Reade Demosthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sort: I graunt they shall marueilously allure, delite, moue, and rauish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely moue thy affections, it shall so pearce thy heart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in comparison of the efficacie of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in manner vanish away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do farre excell all giftes and graces of mans industrie: doe in deede breath out a certaine diuinitie. 1. Cor. 2. 4

2 I graunt in deede, that some of the Prophets haue an elegant, cleare, yea, & a beautiful phrase of speach, so as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane writers: and by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shewe that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and grosse style. But whether a man read Dauid, Esai, and such like, who haue a sweete and pleasant flowing speach, or Amos, the heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke sauoureth of countrie rudenes: in euerie one of them shall appeare that maiestie of the holy Ghost that I speake of. Yet am I not ignorant, that as Satan is in many things a counterfaiter of God, that with deceitfull resemblance hee might the better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he craftily spread abroad with rude and in manner barbarous speach those wicked errours wherewith he deceiued silly men; and hath oft times vsed discontinued phrases, that vnder such visor he might hide his deceites. But howe vaine and vncleanlie is that curious counterfaiting, all men that haue but meane vnderstanding doe plainly see. As for the holye Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many things, yet is it full of

of such sentences as could not be conceiued by man. Let all the Prophets be looked vpon, there shal not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacitie, in such sort that those are to be thought, to haue no iudgement of tast to whome their doctrine is vnsauourie.

The scripture ancienter than all other writings.

3 Other men haue largely entreated of this argument, wherefore at this time it sufficeth to touch but a fewe things, ỳ chiefely make for the principal summe of ỳ whole matter. Beside these points that I haue already touched, the verie antiquitie of ỳ Scripture is of great weight. For hosoeuer ỳ Greeke writers tel many fables of the Ægyptian diuinitie: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferior to the age of Moses. And Moses deuiseth not a new God, but setteth foorth the same thing which the Israelites had receiued in long proces of time, conueied to them by their fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the euerlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the couenant made with Abraham? If he had brought a thing neuer heard of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needes be ỳ the deliuerance from bondage, wher in they were deteined, was a thing well & commonly knowen among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did foorthwith raise vp all their minds. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC yeares. Now it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distãce of time was before al other writers, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the originall deliuerance of his doctrine: howe much the holye Scripture then is beyond all other writings in antiquitie?

Moyses in that he publisheth things tending to the dishonor of his owne stock, sheweth himselfe to haue followed no such humor as common writers among st men.

4 Vnlesse perhaps some list to beleeue the Ægyptians, that stretch their auntienty to sixe thousand yeares before the creation of the worlde. But sith their vaine babling hath bin alway scorned euen of al the prophane writers themselues, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Appion, alleageth testimonies worthie to bee remembred out of auncient writers, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the law hath beene famous euen from the first ages, although it were neither read nor truely knowen. Nowe, that neither there shoulde remaine to the malitious any cause of suspicion, nor to the wicked any occasion to cauill, God hath for both these daungers prouided good remedies. When Moyses rehearseth what Iacob almost three hundred yeares before had by heauenly inspiration pronounced vppon his owne posteritie, howe doeth hee set foorth his owne tribe? yea, in the person of Leui he spotteth it with eternall infamie. Symeon (sayeth hee) and Leui the vessels of wickednesse. My soule come not into their counsell, nor my tongue into their secret. Truely, he might haue passed ouer that blotte with silence, in so doing not onely to please his father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole familie with part of the same shame. How can that writer be suspected, which vnconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the holy Ghost, that the principall auncester of the familie whereof himselfe descended was an abominable doer, neither priuately prouided for his owne honour, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kinsmen, whome vndoubtedly this matter greeued? When also he rehearseth the wicked

murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, and Marie his sister: shall we saie that he spake after the meaning of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commandement of the holy Ghost? Moreouer, sith himselfe was hyest in authoritie, why did he not leaue at least the office of the hye priesthoode to his owne sonnes, but appointeth them to the baseste place? I touche here onely a fewe things of manie. But in the lawe it selfe a man shall eche where meete with many arguments that are able to bring full proofe to make men beleeue that Moses without all question commeth from heauen as an Angell of God. Num.12.7.

5 Nowe these so many and so notable miracles that he recounteth, are euen as manie establishments of the lawe that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was carried in a cloud vp into the mountaine: that there euen to the fourtieth day he continued without companie of men: that in the verie publishing of the lawe his face did shine as it were besette with sunne beames: that lightenings flashed round about: that thunders and noises were heard eche where in the ayre: that a trumpet sounded being not blowen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude set betweene, was kept from the sight of the people: that his authoritie was so miraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore, Dathan, and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke striken with a rodde did by and by powre foorth a riuer: that at his prayer it rayned Manna from heauen: did not God herein commend him from heauen as an vndoubted Prophet? If any man obiect against mee, that I take these things as confessed, which are not out of controuersie, it is easie to aunswere this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these things, what place was there to fayne before those witnesses that had them selues seene the thinges done? It is likely forsooth that he would come among them, and rebuking the people of infidelitie, stubbornes, vnthankfulnesse, and other sinnes, woulde haue boasted that his doctrine was established in their owne sight with such miracles, which in deede they neuer sawe. The authoritie of Moses confirmed by miracles. Exo.24.18. Exo.34.29. Exo.19,16. Exo.40.34. Num.16.24. Num.20.10. Num.11.9.

6 For this is also worthie to be noted, so oft as hee telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiously ioyneth such thinges as might stirre the whole people to crie out against him, if there had beene neuer so little occasion. Whereby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were euer more than sufficiétly conuinced by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier knowen, than that ỹ prophane could denie that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lying hath ministred them an other cauillation, saying, that they were don by Magicall artes and sorcerie. But what likely proofe haue they to accuse him for a sorcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, that he commanderh to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsel of sorcerers and soothsaiers? Truely no such deceiuer vseth his iuggling castes, but that he studieth to amase the mindes of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth onely execute those things that God hath appointed, His miracles not done by magicall arts and sorcerie. Exo.7.11. Leu.20. Exo.16.

he doth sufficiently wipe away all blottes of thinking euil of him. Now if the things themselues be considered, what enchantment coulde bring to passe, that Manna daily raining from heauen, should suffice to feede the people? and if any man kept in store more than his iust measure, by the verie rotting thereof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great proues God suffred his seruant so to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudly and impudently make insurrections, sometime diuers of them conspiring among themselues went about to ouerthrow the holy seruant of God: howe coulde he haue begiled their furor with illusions? And the end that followed plainly sheweth, that by this meane his doctrine was stablished to continue to the end of all ages.

Moses by foreshewing things which came to passe long after his decease, declareth that he spake by the inspiration of God.

7 Moreouer where he assigneth the chiefe gouernement to the tribe of Iuda in the person of the Patriarche Iacob, who can denie that this was done by spirite of prophecie, specially if we wey in consideration the thing it selfe, how in comming to passe it proued true? Imagine Moses to haue bin the first author of this prophecie: yet from the time that hee did first put it in writing, there passed foure hundred yeares wherein there was no mention of the scepter in the tribe of Iuda. After Saul was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdome should rest in the tribe of Beniamin. When Dauid was annointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritãce of the kingdome should be changed? who woulde haue looked that there should haue come a king out of the base house of a heardman? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour should light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this annointment was gouerned by any arte, trauaile or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heauenly prophecie? Likewise those things that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkely, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the couenant of God, seeing they came to passe almost two thousand yeares after, doe they not make it plaine, that he spake by the inspiration of God? I ouerskip his other tellings aforehand of things, which do so euidently sauour of the reuelation of God, that all men that haue their sound wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be short, that same one song of his, is a eleare looking glasse, wherein God euidently appeareth.

Sam.16.

Deut.32.

The like proues appeare in the writings of Esay Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel, and other Prophets, to shew that they spake by a diuine instinct.

Esa.45.1.

8 But in the other Prophets the same is yet also much more plainely seene. I will choose our onely a fewe examples, because to gather them al togither were too great a labour. When in the time of Esay the kingdome of Iuda was in peace, yea, when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esaie prophecie of the destruction of the citie and exile of the people. But admit that yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of god, to tel long before of such things as at that time seemed false, and afterwarde proued true: yet those prophecies that he vttereth concerning their deliuerance, whence shall we say that they proceeded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whome the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than an hundred dred yeares from the time that Esaie so prophecied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeare or thereabouts after the death of Esaie. No man could then gesse that there should be any such Cyrus, that should haue warre with the Babylonians, that should bring subiect so mightie a monarchie vnder his dominion, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Israel. Doeth not this bare telling without any garnishment of words euidently shewe, that the things that Esaie speaketh, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and not the coniectures of men? Againe, when Ieremie a litle before that the people were caried away, did determine the end of the captiuitie within threescore and ten yeres, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needes be that his tongue was gouerned by the spirit of God? What shamelesnesse shall it be to denie, that the credite of the Prophets was stablished by such prooues, and that the same thing was fulfilled in deede, which they themselues doe report to make their sayings to be beleeued? Beholde, the former things are come to passe, and newe things doe I declare: before they come foorth, I tell you of them. I leaue to speake how Hieremie and Ezechiel being so farre asunder, yet prophecying both at one time, they so agreede in all their sayings, as if either one of them had endyted the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of sixe hundred yeres after, in such sort as if he had compiled an historie of things alreadie done and commonly knowen? These things if godly men haue well considered, they shalbe sufficiently well furnished, to appease the barkings of the wicked. For the plaine proofe hereof is too cleare to be subiect to any cauillations at all.

9 I know what some learned men do prate in corners, to shew the quicknes of their wit in assaulting the truth of God. For they demaunde, who hath assured vs that these things which are read vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moses and the Prophets? Yea, they are so hardie to moue this question, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a man should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero, who woulde not say, that such madnesse were worthie to bee corrected with strokes and stripes? The lawe of Moses hath beene marueilously preserued, rather by heauenly prouidence than by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priestes it laie buried a litle while: yet since the time that the godly King Iosias found it, it hath stil by continuall succession from age to age beene vsed in the handes of men. Neither did Iosias bring it forth as an vnknowen or newe thing, but such a thing as had beene euer commonly published, and whereof the remembrance was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out therof, to remaine with the keepers of the Kings Records. Only this had happened, that the Priestes had ceassed to publish the law according to the old accustomed manner, and the people themselues had neglected their wonted reading of it. Yea, there in maner passed no age wherein the establishment thereof was not confirmed and renued. They that had David in their handes, knewe they not of Moses? But to speake of them all at once, it is most certaine that their writings came to posteritie none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeres deliuered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, & partly while the remembrance was fresh of it, did learne of them which heard them that they had so spoken.

They are absurd men vvhich aske hovv vve knovv that any booke vvas vvritten by Moses, and make it a question, vvhether euer there vvere any such man.

2. Mac. 1. 59.

10 As for that which they obiect out of the historie of the Machabees, to minish the credit of scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deuised more fit to stablish the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon them selues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (say they) commaunded all the bookes to be burned, whence are come these copies that wee now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so soone be made? It is euident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediatly abroade againe, and were without controuersie knowen to be the same of all godly men, that hauing beene brought vp in the doctrine of them, did familiarly knowe them. Yea, when all the wicked men being as it were conspired togither, did insolently triumph with reproches vppon the Iewes, yet neuer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For whatsoeuer they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the author of it. What then do these praters else, but bewraye their owne more than doggish frowardnesse, while they falsely saye, that these bookes are changed, and newe put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approued by consent of all histories? But to spend no more labour vainly in confuting such fooliish cauillations: let vs rather hereby consider howe great a care God had for the preseruation of his worde, when beyond the hope of all men he saued it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endewed the godly priestes and other with so great constancie, that they sticked not to redeeme this booke euen with losse of their life, if neede were, & so to conuey it ouer to posteritie: that he disapointed the narrow search of so many gouernours & souldiours. Who can but acknowledge the notable & miraculous worke of God, that these sacred monuments which the wicked verily thought to haue beene vtterly destroyed, by and by came abroade againe as fully restored, and that with a great deale more honour? For by and by folowed the translating of them into Greeke, to publish them throughout the world. And not in this onely appeared the miraculous working, that God preserued the tables of his couenāt from the bloudy proclamations of Antiochus: but also that among so manifold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherewith the whole nation was sometime worne to a few & wasted, & last of all, brought in maner to vtter destruction, yet they remained stil safe & extant. The Hebrue tongue lay not only vnesteemed, but almost vnknowen. And surely had not been Gods pleasure to haue his religion prouided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Iewes that were since their returne from exile, were swarued from the naturall vse of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophets that liued in that age, which is therefore worthie to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the lawe and the Prophets is the more plainly perceiued. And by whome

hath God preserued for vs the doctrine of saluation conteined in the law and the Prophets, to the ende that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? euen by the most cruelly bent enimies of Christ, the Iewes whom Saint Augustine doeth therefore worthily call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian church, because they haue ministred vnto vs that thing, to reade whereof, themselues haue no vse.

The mysteries vvhich the three Euangelistes deliuer in simple speech, the thundering maiestie of Iohn, the rude educatiō of the Apostles before they became teachers, S. Pauls crueltie against Christiās before he taught Christianitie, deliuereth the doctrine of the newe Testament from the contempt of prophane men.

11 Now if we come to the newe Testament, with howe sound pillers is the trueth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelistes write the historie in base and simple speache. Many proud men doe loath that simplicitie, because they take no heede to the chiefe points of doctrine therein, whereby it were easie to gather, that they entreat of heauenly mysteries aboue mans capacitie. Surely whosoeuer haue but one droppe of honest shame will be ashamed if they read the first Chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the summe whereof is shortly comprised by these three Euangelists, do easily deliuer their writing from all contempt. But Iohn thundering from an high, those whom he compelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbornesse more mightily than any thunderbolt. Now let come forth all these sharpnosed faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens hearts, let them read Iohns Gospel: Wil they or no, they shal there finde a thousand sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishnesse, yea, that may print a horrible brand in their owne consciences to restraine their laughing. The same is to be thought of Peter & Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blind, yet the verie heauenly maiestie in them holdeth all men bound, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doeth sufficiently aduaunce their doctrine aboue the worlde, that Mathew being before all giuen to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter & Iohn brought vp in their fisher boates, al grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paul, not onely from a professed, but also from a cruell & bloudie enimie conuerted to a newe man, with soudaine and vnhoped chaunge doth shewe, that being compelled by heauenly authoritie, he nowe maintaineth that doctrine, which before hee had fought against. Nowe let these dogges denye, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredite the historie: yet stil the trueth it self openly cryeth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which being before time despised men among the raskall people, sodenly began so gloriously to entreat of heauenly mysteries.

No small estimation growveth to the scripture, if the generall and continuall agreement of men in yelding consent & credit thereunto be considered.

12 There be yet also furthermore many verie good reasons, why the consent of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accounted no small matter, that since the Scripture was first published, the willes of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And that howsoeuer Sathan with all the worlde hath trauailed by marueilous meanes, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrowe it, or vtterly to blotte & deface it out of mens remembraunce, yet euer stil like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained inuincible. For there hath not lightly bin in old time any sophister, or Rhetorician that had any more excellēt wit than other, but he hath bent his force against this Scripture: yet they all haue nothing preuailed. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, & yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How could it haue resisted being so mightily on eche side assailed, if it had had none other defence but mans? Yea, rather it is hereby proued, that it came from God himselfe, that all the trauailes of men striuing against it, yet it hath of her owne power stil risen vp. Beside that, not one citie alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receiue & embrace it: but so farre as the world extendeth in length & breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of diuers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so diuers and disagreeing in maner in all things els, ought much to moue vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heauenly maiestie: no small estimation groweth vnto it, when we behold their godlines, that do so agree, I meane not of them all, but onely of those, with whome as with lightes it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assuredness of minde ought wee to submit vs to that doctrine which wee see stablished and witnessed with the bloud of so many holy men? They when they had but once receiued it, sticked not boldly without feare, yea and with great chearfulnes to die for it: howe should it then come to passe, that wee, hauing it conueyed to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and vnmoueable persuasion take holde of it? It is therefore no small confirmation of the Scripture, that it hath beene sealed with the bloud of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to beare witnesse of their faith: and not of a frantike distemperance of braine, as sometime the erronious spirites are wont to doe, but with a firme and constant, and yet sober zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not few nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maiestie, not only ascertained vnto godly hearts, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of cauellers, yet be they such as be not of themselues sufficiently auaylable to bring stedfast credite vnto it, vntill the heauenly father disclosing therein his maiestie, doeth bring the reuerence thereof out of al controuersie. Wherfore then only the scripture shal suffice to ỳ knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certeintie thereof shalbe grounded vpon the inward persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as seconde helpes of our weakneſſe they follow that cheefe and higheſt testimonie. But they do fondly that will haue it persuaded by proofe to the vnfaithfull, that the scripture is the worde of God, which cannot be knowen but by faith. For good reason therefore doeth Augustine giue warning, that godlineſſe & peace of minde ought to goe before, to make a man vnderstande somewhat of so great matters.

The ix. Chapter.

Nowe

NOw they that forsaking the Scripture doe imagine I wote not what way to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with errour, as to be carried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine giddie brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirite, both themselues doe forsake all reading, and also doe scorne their simplicitie which still follow the dead and slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine knowe of these men, what spirite that is, by whose inspiration they are carried vp so high, that they dare despise the doctrine of the scriptures as childish and base For if they answere that it is the spirite of Christ, then such careles nesse is worthie to be laughed at. For I think they wil grant, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitiue Church were lightned with none other spirite. But none of them did learne of that spirite to despise the worde of God: but rather euery one was mooued more to reuerence it, as their writings doe most plainly witnesse. And surely so was it foretolde by the mouth of Esaie. For where hee sayeth: My spirite that is vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doeth not binde the olde people to the outwarde doctrine, as though they were set to learne to spell, but rather he teacheth, that this shal be the true and perfect felicitie of the newe church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be led by the voice of God, than by the spirite of God. Whereby we gather, that these lewde men with wicked sacrilege doe seuer asunder those things that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inuiolable knot. Moreouer, Paul being rauished vp into the third heauen, yet ceassed not to goe forward in the doctrine of the lawe and the Prophets, euen so as he exhorteth Timothie, a doctour of singular excellencie to applie reading. And worthie is that commendation to be remembred, wherewith he setteth foorth the scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reproue, that the seruaunts of God may be made perfect. How diuelish a madnesse is is to faine, that the vse of Scripture is but transitorie, and lasteth but for a while: which in deede guideth the children of God euen to the last ende? Againe, I would haue them aunswere mee this: whether they haue tasted of another spirite than that, which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not carried with such giddinesse, that they dare so boast. But what manner of spirite did he speake of in his promise? euen that spirite which should not speake of it self, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those things, which he the Lorde him selfe had taught by his worde. It is not therefore the office of the spirite, which is promised vs, to faine newe and vnheard of reuelations, or to coyne a newe kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospel, but to seale in our mindes the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospel.

The spirite of Christ u giuë not to guide me vvith out the scripture, but according to the scripture.

Esa. 59. 21.

2. Tim. 3. 16.

Iohn. 16. 13.

By the scripture the spirit u tryed vvhether it be of God or no. Neither is it dishonorable for the spirit so to be tryed.

2. Pet. 1. 10.

2 Whereby we plainely vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reading and hearing of the Scripture, if we list to take any vse and fruite of the spirite of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are heedefull to the doctrine of the Prophets, which yet might seeme to haue giuen place after the rising of the light of the Gospel. On the other side, if any spirite leauing the wisedome of the worde of God doeth thrust vnto vs an other doctrine, that the same spirite ought rightfully to be suspected of vanitie and lying. For what? when Sathan transformeth himselfe into an angel of light, what credite shall the holy Ghost haue among vs, if it be not seuerally knowen by some assured marke? And truely it hath beene plainly pointed out vnto vs by the worde of the Lorde, but that these miserable men doe willingly couet to erre to their owne destruction, while they seeke a spirite rather from themselues than from him. But (saye they) it is dishonorable, that the spirite of God, whome all things ought to obey, shoulde be subiect to the Scripture. As if this were a dishonour to the holy Ghost to be euery where egall and like to it selfe, to agree with it selfe in all things, and no where to varie. In deede, if it were to be tryed by the rule either of men, or of Angels, or any others rule whatsoeuer, then it might wel be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if yee list so to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it selfe, when it is considered in it selfe, who can therefore saye, that there is any wrong done vnto it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleasure to haue his maiestie established. It ought to content vs so soone as he entreth into vs. But lest vnder his name the spirit of Satan should creepe in, hee will haue vs to knowe him by that image of himselfe, which hee hath printed in the Scriptures. Hee is the author of the Scriptures: hee cannot be diuers and vnlike himselfe. Therefore it must needes be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed himselfe therein. This is no dishonor vnto him, vnlesse perhaps we count it honorable to swarue and go out of kind from himselfe.

2. Cor. 3 6. As the scripture is a dead letter, when we read it hauing not the life of the spirite, so the spirite is a dangerous guide if we followe it, leauing the conduct of the scripture they must go hand in hand, eche assuring & warranting other. 2. Cor. 3. 8.

3 Whereas they cauil that we rest vpon the letter that slayeth, herein they suffer punishment for despising of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paul there contendeth against the false Apostles, which commending the lawe without Christ did call away the people from the benefite of the newe Testament, wherein the Lorde doeth couenant that he will graue his lawe within the bowels of the faithfull, & write it in their hearts. The letter therefore is dead, & the law of the Lorde killeth the readers of it, when it is seuered from the grace of Christ, and not touching the heart, onely soundeth in the eares. But if it be effectually printed in our hearts by the holy Ghost, if it present Christ vnto vs: then is it the worde of life, conuerting soules, giuing wisedome to litle ones, &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the ministerie of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so stick fast in his trueth which he hath expressed in the scriptures, that then onely he putteth foorth and displayeth his force, when the Scripture hath her due reuerence and dignitie. And it disagreeth not herewith which I before sayd, that the worde it selfe is not much assured vnto vs, vnlesse it be confirmed by the witnesse of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuall knot the Lorde hath coupled togither the assurance of his worde and of his spirit, so that perfect reuerence to the worde doth then settle in our mindes when the holy Ghost shineth vpon vs to make vs therein behold the face of God:

God: and on the other side without all feare of being deceiued wee doe embrace the holy Ghost, when we reknowledge him in his own image, that is, in his worde. Thus it is vndoubtedly: God brought not abroade his worde among men for a sodaine shewe, meaning at the comming of his spirit by & by to take it away againe, but he after sent the same spirite with whose power he had distributed his worde, to make an ende of his worke with effectuall confirmation of his worde. In this sort Christ opened the mindes of the two disciples, not that they should cast away the Scriptures and waxe wise of themselues, but that they should vnderstande the Scriptures. Likewise Paul when he exhorteth the Thessalonians not to extinguish the spirite, doth not carrie them vp on high to vaine speculations without the worde, but by and by sayeth further, that prophecies are not to be despised: whereby without doubt is meant, that the light of the spirite is choked vp so soone as prophecies come to be despised. What say these proudly swelling men, rauished with the spirite, to these things, which recken this onely to be an excellent illumination, when carelesly forsaking and saying farewell to the worde of God, they both boldly and rashly doe take holde of all that they haue conceiued in their sleepe? Truely, a farre other sobrietie becommeth the children of God: which as they see that without the spirite of God they are voide of all light of trueth, so doe they knowe that the worde is the instrument wherewith the Lorde distributeth to the faithfull the light of his spirite. For they knowe none other spirite but that which dwelt and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the worde.

Luke. 24. 27.

1. Thes. 5. 19.

The x. Chapter.

That the Scripture, to correct all superstition, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckoning him for none of them.

BVT becausе we haue shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is somewhat plainly set foorth, is yet more familiarly and plainly declared in the worde: now is it good to consider, whether the Lorde shewe himselfe such in the Scripture as he pleased him first to be represented in his workes. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point vnto it, whereby the godly mindes being admonished, may know what is chiefly to be searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seeking. I doe not yet touch the peculiar couenant, whereby God seuered the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For euen then he appeared the redeemer in receiuing to his children by free adoption those that before were enemies. But wee are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creation of the worlde, and ascendeth not to Christ the mediatour. And although by and by it shal be good to alleage certaine places out of the newe Testament, forasmuch as euen out of it both the power of God the Creator and his prouidence in preseruing of the first nature is approued, yet I warne the readers before, what is now my purpose to doe, to the end that they passe not the appointed bounds.

The same powver, prouidence, mercy, and iustice of God vvhich shineth in the creatures of the vvorld, is also taught in holy scripture.

So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, howe God the maker of heauen and earth doeth gouerne the worlde by him created. Euery where is renoumed both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to doe good, and there are also examples rehearsed of his seueritie, which shewe him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doings, specially where his sufferance nothing preuaileth with the obstinate.

Moses, Dauid, & Ieremie teach the same vvhich heauen and earth doe teach concerning God, namely his power, goodnesse, mercie, holinesse, iustice, iudgement and trueth, and they teach to the same end, that vve might yeld him obedience, and put confidence in him.

2 In certaine places are set foorth more plaine descriptions, wherein his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seene. For in the place where Moses describeth it, it seemeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehende all that was lawfull for men to vnderstand of God. The Lorde (sayeth he) the Lorde, a mercifull God, and gratious, patient and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercie vnto thousandes, which takest away iniquitie & wicked doings, before whome the innocent shall not be innocent, which rendrest the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie and being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeting of that honorable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is toward vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feeling, than in an emptie & supernaturall speculation. And here we do heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercy, iustice, iudgement and trueth. For might and power are conteined vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the Prophets set him forth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heap vp too many examples together, at this present let one Psalme suffice vs, wherein the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened vs, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there rehearsed, but that which we may behold in his creatures. So plainly do we perceiue God by information of experience, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde.

Iere.9.2

In Ieremie where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs knowe him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether so full, but yet comming all to one effect. He that glorieth, sayeth he, let him glorie in this that he knoweth me to be the Lorde that doth mercy, iustice, & iudgement on the earth. Surely, these three things are verie necessarie for vs to know: mercy, in which alone consisteth all our saluation: Iudgement, which is daily executed vpon euil doers, & more greeuous is prepared for them to eternal destruction: Iustice, whereby the faithfull are preserued & most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophecie saith, thou hast sufficiently enough whereof thou maist glorie in God. And yet here are not omitted either his trueth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is here required of his iustice, mercy and iudgement, vnlesse it did rest vpon his vnmoueable trueth? And how shoulde we beleeue that he doth gouerne the earth with iustice and iudgement, but vnderstanding his power? And whence commeth his mercy but of his goodnesse? If then all his waies be mercie, iudgement and iustice, in them must holinesse also needes be seene. And to none other end is directed that knowledge ledge of God that is set foorth vnto vs in the Scriptures, than is that knowledge also which appeareth emprinted in his creatures, that is to saye: it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the end wee may learne first to honour him with perfect innocencie of life and vnfained obedience, and then to hang altogether vpon his goodnesse.

3 But here I meane to gather a summe of general doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the ende to direct vs to the true God, doth expresly exclude and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religion hath beene corrupted. True it is in deede that the name of one God was euery where knowen & renoumed. For euen they that worshipped a great number of Gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God, as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iustine the Martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the Monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engrauen in the hearts of al men. The same thing also doth Tertullian proue by the common phrase of speach. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawen or fallen to false forged deuises, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that euer they naturally vnderstoode of the being but one God, auayled no further, but to make them inexcusable. For euen the wisest of them doe plainly shewe the wandering error of their minde, when they wish some god to assist them, and so in their prayers do call vpon vncertaine gods. Moreouer in this that they imagined God to haue many natures, although they thought somewhat lesse absurdly than the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercurie, Venus, Minerua and other: yet were they not free from the deceites of Satan, and as wee haue alreadie sayde elsewhere, whatsoeuer wayes of escape the Philosophers haue suttlely inuented, they cannot purge themselues of rebellion, but that they all haue corrupted the trueth of God. For this reason Habacuc after he had condemned all idols, biddeth to seeke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admitte him to be any other than such as he had disclosed himselfe by his worde.

Howsoeuer the name of one God was knowen amongst the Gentiles, their knowledge of him hath beene alwayes so corrupted, that the scripture directing to the true God, geueth special warning of theirs as false.

The xi. Chapter.

That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a visible forme, and that generally they forsake God, so many as do erect to themselues any images.

BVT as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and grosse wit of man, vseth to speake after the common manner: so when it meaneth to make seuerally knowen the true God from the false gods, it chiefly compareth him with idoles: not that it doth allowe these inuentions that are more suttlely and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlier to disclose the foolishnesse of the worlde, yea rather their madnesse in seeking God so long as they cleaue euery one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusiue definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought al that maner of of godhead, that men frame to themselues by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the only conuenient witnesse of himself. In the meane time, sith this brutish grossenesse hath possessed the whole worlde, to couet visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselues gods of timber, stone, gold, siluer, & other dead and corruptible matter, wee ought to holde this principle, that with wicked falshod the glorie of God is corrupted, so oft as any shape is fained to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once challenged the glorie of his deitie to himself alone, meaning to teach vs what maner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediatly: Thou shalt make thee no grauen image, nor any similitude, in which wordes he restraineth our libertie, that we attẽpt not to represent him with any visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the formes wherewith of long time before, superstition had begun to turne his truth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the Sunne, yea, and so many starres as the foolish nations sawe in the skie, so many gods they fained them. And scarce was there any liuing creature which was not among the Ægyptians a figure of god. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser then the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a man. But God compareth not images one with another, as though one were more and another lesse meete to be vsed, but without any exception he reiecteth all images, pictures and other signes, whereby the superstitious thought to haue God neere vnto them.

Maximus Tirius Platonicus sermone.38.

2 This is easie to be gathered by the reasons which he ioyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses: Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou heardest a voice, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take heede to thy selfe, least peraduenture thou be deceiued and make to thy selfe any likenesse, &c. We see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfait shapes, that wee may knowe that they forsake God whosoeuer doe couet to haue visible formes of him. Of the Prophets only Esay shall be enough, which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teach that the maiestie of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish counterfaiting, when he beeing without bodie, is likened to bodily matter: being inuisible, to a visible image: being a spirit, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lumpe of timber, stone or golde. In like maner reasoneth Paul: For asmuch as we are the generation of GOD, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto gold, or siluer, or stone grauen by art and the inuention of man. Whereby it certainely appeareth, whatsoeuer Images are erected, or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simplie displease him as certaine dishonours of his maiestie. And what maruell is it if the holie Ghost do thunder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blinde Idolaters themselues to confesse this in earth? It is knowen how Seneca complained as it is to read in Augustine. They dedicate (saith he) the holy immortal and inuiolable Gods in most vile & base stuffe, and put vpon them the shapes of men and beastes, and some of them with kind of man & woman mingled together, and with sundrie shapen bodies, and such they call Gods, which if they should receiue breath & meete them, would be reckened monsters. Whereby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fond cauillation wherewith the defenders of images seeke to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstition. As though that thing perteined to one nation only which God bringeth forth of his eternal being and the continuall order of nature. And Paul spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenienses when he confuted their error in counterfaiting a shape of God.

3 God in deede, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath giuen a presence of his godhead, so as he was saide to be beholden face to face, but all these signes that euer he shewed, did aptly serue for meanes to teache, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloude and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heauenly glorie, yet did they as it were bridle and restraine the mindes of men, that they shoulde not attempt to passe any further. Wherefore, not Moses himselfe, to whome God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obteined by prayer to see that face, but receiued this aunswere, that man is not able to sustaine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared vnder the likenesse of a Doue, but sith he immediatly vanished away, who doeth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment, the faithfull are put in minde, that they ought to beleeue him to be an inuisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a man, was a foreshewing of the reueiling that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretence to erect to themselues a representation of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercy seate wherein God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the lawe, was so made, as it might teache that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens mindes are carried beyond themselues with admiration of it. For the Cherubins with their winges stretched abroad did couer it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set farre inwarde, did of it selfe sufficiently keepe it secret. Therefore it is verie plaine that they be verie madde, that goe about to defende the images of God and of Saints with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these little images, but to shewe that images are not meete to represent the mysteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpose, that hyding the mercy seat with their wings, they should not onely keepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it, that the Prophets described the Seraphins shewed them in a vision, with their face vncouered: whereby they signifie, that so great is the brightnesse of the glorie of God, that the Angels themselues are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes thereof that shine in the Angels are withdrawen from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly iudge, doe acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom wee now speake, perteined onely to the olde manner of introduction, as it were of children, vsed in the lawe. So to drawe them nowe for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudiments were appointed. And it is much shame,

Although God haue vsed to declare the presence of his godhead by corporall signes, yet euen therein he hath still giuen som note to shewe that hereupō wee should not presume to erect vnto our selues a representation of that deitie which wee cannot comprehend. The Iewes hauing such rudiments, in no argumēt why we should haue them because they had, much lesse worship them, which they did not.

shame, that the painime writers are better expounders of the lawe of God than the Papistes are. Iuuenal reprocheth the Iewes, as it were in scorne, that they honour the white clouds and the deitie of heauen. I grant he speaketh peruersly & wickedly: and yet he speaketh more truely in saying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papists doe which prate that they had a visible image of God. And whereas that people with a certaine hote hastinesse, brake out oftentimes to seeke them idols, euen as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatrie, lest throwing vpon the Iewes the blame of that fault which is common to all, wee sleepe a deadly sleepe vnder vaine allurements to sinne.

Psal.115.4.& 135.15.

The matter vvher of idols are made, their makers, their measure, doeth make them seeme vvorse than mad, vvhich allovve the graving or painting, or hovering of such things as the figures of God.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying: The idols of the Gentiles are gold and siluer, euen the workes of mens hands. Because the Prophet doeth gather of the stuffe it selfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or siluer image: and he taketh it for confessed trueth, that it is a foolish fained inuention whatsoeuer we conceiue of our owne sense concerning God. Hee nameth rather gold and siluer, than clay or stone, that the beautie or the price should not serue to bring a reuerence to idols. But he concludeth generally, that nothing is lesse allowable, than gods to be made of dead stuffe. And in the meane while he standeth as much vpon this point, that men are carried away with too mad a rashnesse, which themselues bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, readie to vanish away at euery moment, yet dare giue the honor of God to idols. Man must needes confesse that himselfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he will haue a peece of mettall to be counted God, to which himselfe gaue the beginning to be a God. For whence came the beginning of idols but from the will of men? Verie iustly doth the heathen Poet giue them this taunt:

Horat.serm.1. sat.8.

I was sometime a fig tree log, a blocke that serued for nought:
The workeman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A fourme to sit vpon, or els a Priap God to be.
At length he thought the better was a God to make of me.

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in manner euery moment, by his workmanship shall conuey the name and honour of God to a dead stock. But forasmuch as Epicure in scoffingly iesting hath cared for no religion, let vs leaue the tauntes of him and such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophet pricke vs, or rather thrust vs through where he saith, that they are too much beastly witted that with one self peece of wood do make a fire and warme themselues, doe heat the ouen to bake bread, doe rost or seeth flesh, & do make them a God before which they fall down humbly to pray. Therefore in another place he doth not only accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they haue not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse conuenient than to bring god to the measure of fiue foote, which is aboue al measure & incomprehensible.

And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custome sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreouer hold in mind, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speach, that they are the workes of mens hand which want the authoritie of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men do deuise of themselues are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are endued with vnderstanding, that they should know that all things are moued with the onely power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to things dead & senceless. But because the corruption of nature carieth as wel all nations, as ech man priuately to so great madnes, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them, saying: Let them that make them become like to them, and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond subtletie of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God, while in painting they doe more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not onely to be made by the grauer, but also to be counterfaited by any other workeman, because such counterfaiting is euil and to the dishonor of his maiestie.

Ose.14.4. Mic.5.14. Psa.115.8.

5 I knowe that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregorie so said, but the spirit of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregorie had beene taught, he would neuer so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremie plainly saith, that the stocke is a doctrine of vanitie: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoeuer men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, & say that the Prophets reproue them onely which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholy which the Papistes take for an assured principle, that images are in steede of bookes. For they doe in comparison set images against God as things directly contrarie, and such as neuer can agree togither. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alleaged. Sith there is but one true God whome the Iewes did worship, it is amisse and falsly done to forge visible shapes to represent God, and men are miserably deceiued, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally, if it were not true that it is a deceitful and corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophets would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I winne of them when we shewe that it is vanitie and lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehearse worde for worde that which the Prophets haue taught.

They vvho seeke the knowledge of God in such bookes learne nothing but errors and lyes by them. Hier.10.8. Ha.2.18.

6 Let be read what Lactantius and Eusebius haue written of this matter, which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall, of whome images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without douting pronounceth that it is vnlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to set vp images to God. And yet sayeth he none other thing but the same which many yeres before was decreed by the Elibertine Councell, whereof this is the xxxvj Chapter. It is ordeined that no pictures be had in the Church, that the thing which is honoured and worshipped be not painted on the walles.

By Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine, the Elibertine Councel, & Varro himselfe, the counterfaiting of God by imagrie condemned as a thing vvhich diminisheth his feare, & bringeth his glory into contempt. Concil. Elibert. ca.6. & ca.31.

walles. But most notable is that which in another place Augustine alledgeth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both tooke away the feare of God, & brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peraduenture it should be but of small authoritie. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed, that a heathen man groping in darkenesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmeete for the maiestie of God, because they diminish the feare of God, and encrease errour in men. The proofe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truely than wisely spoken. But Augustine hauing borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it foorth as of his owne minde. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherewith men were entangled concerning God, began not of images, but as with new matter added, encreased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore minished or rather taken away thereby, because his maiestie may easily in the foolishnesse, and in the fond and absurd forging of images growe to contempt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by proofe finde to be so true. Whosoeuer therefore will couet to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learne than of images, what is meete to be knowen concerning God.

If the images which Papistes propose as bookes of holinesse, were not paternes of vncleannes as they are, yet are they no fit meanes to instruct the people of god, before whom Christ should rather be painted by teaching, than taught by painting.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes haue any shame, let them no more vse this shift to say that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I graunt them so much, yet should they not much get thereby for defense of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well knowen. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Saints, what are they but examples of extreme riot & vncleanesse, whereunto if any would fashion himselfe, he were worthie to be beaten with staues? Surely, the brothelhouses can shewe harlots more chastly and soberly attyred, than their temples shewe images of these whom they would haue called virgins. Euen as vncomely array giue they to the Martyrs. Let them therfore fashion their idols at least to some honest shew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lye in saying, that they are the bookes of some holinesse. But if it were so, yet then would we aunswere, that this is not the right way to teach ỹ faithful people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with farre other doctrine than with these trifles. God commaunded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to al men in preaching of his word and in his holy mysteries: wherunto they shew themselues to haue a minde not verie heedefull, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papists call ley and vnlearned men whose vnskilfulnes may beare to be taught onely by images? forsooth euen those whom the Lorde knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom he vouchsafeth to reueile the heauenly wisedome, whome he willeth to be instructed with the wholsome mysteries of his kingdom. I graunt in deede as the matter standeth, that there are at this day many which cannot be without such bookes. But whence I pray you groweth that dulnes, but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was meete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause, that they which had the cure of churches gaue ouer their office of teaching to idols, but because themselues were dumme. Paul testifieth

9 Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but do defer it to that place where we shal specially entreat of the redemption: yet because it ought to be certeinly holden without controuersie among all men, that Christ is the same Worde clad with flesh, in this place will be verie fit to recite all those testimonies that proue Christ to be God. When it is said in the xlv. Psalme, thy throne O God is for euer and euer: the Iewes do cauill and say, that the name Elohim is also applyed to the Angels and soueraigne powers. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternall throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternall Lord. Againe, this title is giuen to none but with an addition, as it is said: that Moses shalbe for a God to Pharao. Some read it in the Genitiue case which is verie fooliſh. I graunt in deede that often times a thing is called Diuine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the text it appeareth, that such a meaning were hard and forced, and wil not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not so yelde: In Esaie is verie plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the soueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (sayth he) is the name wherby they shall call him, the strong God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the Iewes barke againe, & turne the text thus: this is the name whereby the strong God the father of the world to come shall call him: so that they leaue this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose shoulde so many names of addition in this place be heaped vpon God the Father, seing it is the purpose of the Prophet to adorne Christ with such speciall notes as may buylde our faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of doubt that he is here in like sort called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be found plainer than that place of Hieremie where he sayeth, that this shall be the name whereby the seede of Dauid shall be called Iehouah our righteousnesse. For where the Iewes themselues do teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addition, and that this onely name Iehouah which they call vnspeakable is a substantiue name to expresse his essence: we gather that the Sonne is the onely and eternall God, which saith in another place that he will not giue his glorie to another. But here also they seeke to scape away because that Moses gaue that name to the Altar that he builded: and Ezechiel gaue it to the new citie Hierusalem. But who doeth not see that the Altar was builded for a monument that God was the auancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but only to testifie the presence of God? For thus sayeth the Prophet: The name of the citie from that day shalbe Iehouah there. And Moses saith thus: He builded an altar and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltation. But more businesse ariseth by an other place of Hieremie, where the same title is applyed to Hierusalem in these wordes: this is the name whereby they shall call her Iehouah our righteousnesse. But this testimonie is so farre from making against the trueth which we defende, that it rather confirmeth it. For whereas he had before testified that Christ is the true Iehouah from whome floweth righteousnesse, nowe hee pronounceth that the Church shall so verily feele the same, same, that shee may gloriously vse the verie name it selfe. And so in the first place is set the fountaine and cause of righteousnesse, in the other the effect.

The word communicating it self with men, tooke the office & name of an Angel, yet still shewed it selfe to be the God of vnspeakable glorie.

10 Nowe if this doe not satisfie the Iewes, that Iehouah is so often presented in the person of an Angel, I see not with what cauillations they can mock it out. It is said, that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell challengeth to himselfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and saye, that this is spoken in respect of the Person that hee representeth: this knott is not thus loosed. For being a seruant he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing to eate breade, commaundeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then hee prooueth that himselfe in deede was the same Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seene not onely an Angell but God. And thence came it that he sayde wee shall die because wee haue seene God. And when his wife aunswereth, if Iehouah woulde haue slaine vs, hee woulde not haue receiued Sacrifice at our handes: in this shee doth confesse that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the aunswere of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why doest thou aske mee of my name, which is maruellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Seruetto, when hee affirmed that God neuer appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctours of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the Worde of God, which then as aforehande began to execute the office of mediatour. For though hee was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betweene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nye communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time hee reteined that which was his owne, to be the God of vnspeakeable glorie. The same thing meaneth Osea, which after he had recited the wrastling of Iacob with the Angell, saith: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthie of memorie is his name. Here againe Seruetto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophet did not confirme that which Moses had said: why doest thou aske me of my name? And the confession of the Holy Patriarch doth sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whome the full godhead was resident, when he saide: I haue seene God face to face. And for this cause Paul saith, that Christ was guyde of the people in the wilderneſſe. For though the time was not yet come of his abasement: yet that eternall word shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the second Chapter of Zacharie be wayed without contention, the Angel that sent an other Angel was by and by pronounced to be the God of hostes, and to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omitte innumerable testimonies on the which our faith safely resteth, although they doe not much moue the Iewes. For when it is said in Esaie: Beholde, this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shall waite vpon him, and he shall saue vs, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is ment God which raiseth vp for the saluation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeated suffer it to be drawen no otherwhere but to Christ. And yet plainer & fuller is the place of Malachie, where he promiseth that he shall come, the Lorde that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the only soueraigne God was the temple dedicate, which temple yet the Prophet doeth claime for Christ. Whereupon followeth that Christ is the same God that was euer honored among the Iewes. Mal.3.1.

11 As for the Newe Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauell rather shortly to choose out fewe, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediator in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth shal aptly serue to proue his godhead. First, this is worthy to be singularly marked, that those things which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles doe shewe that they are either alreadie performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where Esaie propheciethe that the Lord of hostes shal be to the Iewes and Israelites a stumbling stone and a rock to fall vpon: Paul affirmeth that the same is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore he declareth him to be the Lord of hostes. Likewise in an other place, We must all (saith he) once be brought to appeare before the iudgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all tongues sweare. Seeing God in Esaie speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in deede performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe same God, whose glory may not be withdrawen to another. And that thing which writing to the Ephesians he allegeth out of the Psalmes, is euident that it can be applyed to none but to God alone. Ascending on hie hee hath carried captiuitie captiue, meaning that such ascending was in shadowe shewed, when God in notable victorie against foreine nations did shewe forth his power, but hee declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glorie of the Sonne that was reueiled to Esai by a vision, whereas in deede the Prophet himselfe writeth that the maiestie of God appeared vnto him. And it is euident that those things which the Apostle writing to the Hebrues applyeth to the Sonne, are the plaine titles of God: as, Thou Lord in the beginning didst laie the foundations of heauen and earth, &c. Againe, worship him all ye his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those things that are spoken of in those Psalmes, he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercie of Sion. It was hee that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations and ilandes. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the maiestie of God to Christ, which in his preface had said that the worde was alway God? Why should Paul feare to set Christ in the iudgement throne of God, hauing before with so open proclamation declared his Godhead, where he sayed that hee was God blessed to the ende of worldes? And to make appeare, howe well he agreeth in this point with himselfe, in another place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be praised to the ende of worldes, then he is the same to whome in another place hee affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but playnly cryeth out, that he would haue counted it no robberie, if he had shewed himselfe equall with God, but that he willingly abased himselfe. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, Iohn goeth further and saith: He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought aboundantly to satisfie vs, that he is called God, specially of that witnesse which expressely affirmeth vnto vs, that there are no more Gods but one. That same witnesse is Paul, which sayth thus: How many soeuer be called gods, either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whome are all things. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne bloud purchased the church vnto himselfe: why should we imagine a second God which he himselfe acknowlegeth not? And it is no doubt that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lord and his God, doeth professe that he is that onely one God whome he had alwayes worshipped.

His working with the father, his gouerning of the world, his pardoning of sins, his perceiuing the verie thoughts of the hearts proueth him to be verie God. Iohn.5.17.

12 Nowe if wee esteeme his Godhead by the workes that in the Scripture are ascribed vnto him, it shall thereby more euidently appeare. For when he saide that from the beginning he was thitherto working with his Father: the Iewes which were most dull in vnderstanding of all his other sayings, yet then perceiued that he tooke vpon him the power of God. And therefore as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he did not only breake the Sabboth, but also did call God his father, making himselfe equall with God. How dull shall wee be then, if we do not perceiue that his Godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truely to order the world with prouidence and power, and to gouerne all things with the authoritie of his owne might, which the Apostle ascribeth vnto him, belongeth to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteneth the gouernement of the worlde with his Father, but also all other offices which cannot be made common to God with his creatures. The Lord cryeth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that do away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sentence, when the Iewes thought that wrong was done to God for that Christ did forgiue sinnes, Christ not onely affirmed in wordes but also proued by miracle that this power belonged vnto himselfe. We see therefore that he hath, not the ministration, but the power of forgiuenesse of sinnes, which the Lord saith he will not suffer to passe away from himselfe to any. What shal we say of searching, & pearsing the secrete thoughts of harts? is it not the propertie of God alone? But the same had Christ: whereby is gathered that he is God.

Heb.1.3. Esa 43.25. Mat.9.6. Mat.9.4. That he wrought miracles by his owne power, & gaue power vnto others to worke: that he is author of life and saluation: that he is goodnes & iustice it selfe, that men are willed to beleeue and trust in him: that his name is called vpon, that we are taught to glory in the knowledge of him, that the same things are wished ioyntly from the father and from him, these are proofes of his godhead. Mat.10.8.

13 Nowe, in his miracles howe plainly and clearely doeth hee appeare? And though I graunt that as well the Prophets as the Apostles did equall & like miracles to these that he did: yet this great difference is there, that they by their ministration disposed the giftes of God, he shewed foorth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the ende to giue glorie vnto his Father. But we see for the most parte his owne power shewed vnto vs. And howe could it otherwise be but that he was the verie author of miracles that by his owne authoritie gaue power to othet to deale miracles abrode? For the Euangelist declareth that he gaue power to the Apostles to raise vp the dead, to heale the leprous, to cast out deuils. &c. And they so vsed the

miniſtration thereof, that they ſufficiently ſhewed that this power came not from els where but from Chriſt. In the name of Ieſus Chriſt (ſaith Peter) riſe and walke. It is therefore no marueile if Chriſt alledged his miracles to confound the vnbeleeuingneſſe of the Iewes: forasmuch as they were ſuch as being done by his owne power did giue a moſt plaine teſtimonie of his godhead. If elſe where then in God there is no ſaluation, no righteouſneſſe, no life; and Chriſt conteineth all theſe things in him, ſurely he is therby declared to be God. And no man can obiect againſt mee and ſaye, that life and ſaluation is powred into him by God: for it is not ſayed that hee receiued ſaluation, but that he is ſaluation himſelfe. And if none be good but onely God: how can hee be onely man, being I will not ſay good and iuſt, but ſelfe goodneſſe and iuſtice? Yea, from the firſt beginning of the creation as the Euangeliſt witneſſeth, in him was life: and he euen then being life was the light of men. Wherefore being ſupported with ſuch prooues we are bolde to repoſe our faith and hope in him: when yet wee knowe that it is an vngodlineſſe that robbeth God for any man to faſten his confidence in creatures. Beleeue ye in God? ſaith he. Beleeue then alſo in mee. And ſo doeth Paul expound thoſe two places of Eſay, Whoſoeuer truſteth in him, ſhall not be put to ſhame. Againe, Out of the roote of Iſay ſhall hee come that ſhall riſe to rule peoples, in him the nations ſhall truſt. And why ſhould wee ſeeke out more teſtimonies of Scripture for this matter, when wee ſo often meete with this ſentence? He that beleeueth in me hath eternall life. Moreouer the inuocation which hangeth vpon Faith belongeth alſo to him, which yet is proper to the maieſtie of God, if he haue any thing at all proper to himſelfe. For one Prophet ſayeth: Whoſoeuer calleth vppon the name of Iehouah ſhalbe ſaued: and another ſayeth, a moſt ſtrong toure is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous ſhall flee and hee ſhalbe ſaued, but the name of Chriſt is called vppon for ſaluation: it followeth therefore that hee is Iehouah. As for inuocation, wee haue an example of it in Stephen, when hee ſayeth, Lorde Ieſu receiue my ſpirite. Againe, in the whole Church, as Ananias teſtifyeth in the ſame booke. Lorde (ſayeth he) thou knoweſt howe great euils this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vppon thy name.

And that it may be more plainly vnderſtanded, that the whole fulneſſe of the Godhead doeth corporally dwell in Chriſt, the Apoſtle doeth confeſſe that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that hee preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I praye you, and howe great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs, whome hee willeth to glorie in the knowledge of himſelfe alone? Who dare ſaye, that he is but a creature, of whome the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Beſide that, the ſalutations ſet before the Epiſtles of Paul, wiſh the ſame benefites from the Sonne which they do from the Father: whereby we are taught not only that thoſe things which the Father giueth vs do come vnto vs by his interceſſion, but alſo by communitie of power, he is the authour of them. maner handle him, where it feeleth it selfe to be quickened, lightned, saued, iustified and sanctified.

Gen.1.2. Reasons prouing the godhead of the holy Ghost, as it preserued the vvorld in that ori ginall confusion, it regenerateth, it sent the Prophets, it giueth life, the offices are attributed vnto it vvhich are proper vnto God, as to search the secrets of God, &c. Esa.48 16.

14 Wherefore out of the same fountaines wee must fetch our meane of prouing to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghost. Verie plaine is the testimonie of Moses in the historie of the creation, that the spirite of God was vpon the depthes, or vpon the vnfashioned heape: because he sheweth that not only the beautie of the world that is now to be seene is preserued by the power of the Spirite, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirite was then busied in preseruing that confused lumpe of things. And that saying of Esai cannot be cauilled against, And nowe Iehouah and his Spirite hath sent mee. For he communicateth with the Holy ghost his chiefe power in sending of Prophets. Whereby appeareth the diuine maiestie of the Holy ghost. But our best proofe, as I haue said, shalbe by familiar vse. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and such a thing as we our selues doe learne by assured experience of godlinesse. For he it is that being eche where poured abroad, doth sustaine and giueth growing and life to all things in heauen and in earth. And by this point he is prooued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his liuely force into all things to breath into them life and motion, this is the verie worke of God. Moreouer, if regeneration into an incorruptible life be better and more excellent than any present quickening: what shall we iudge of him from whose power the same proceedeth? And that he is the author of regeneration, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, so vnto him also are applyed all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the Godhead. For hee searcheth the deepe secretes of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsell. He giueth wisedome and skill to speake, whereas yet the Lord pronounceth to Moses that it is only his worke to do it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that wee may feele his power as it were working life in vs. Our iustification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, trueth, grace, and what good thing soeuer may be thought of, because it is the Holy ghost only from whom proceedeth all kind of giftes. For that sentence of Paul is right worthie to bee noted. Although there be diuerse gifts, and manifold and sundrie is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirite: because he maketh him not only the originall or beginning, but also the author. Which a little after is more plainly expressed in these wordes. One and the same Spirite distributeth all things as he will. For if he were not somthing subsisting in God, he woul I not attribute vnto him choise of minde and will. Therefore most euidently doth Paul giue to the Holy ghost diuine power, & sheweth that hee is substantially resident in God.

The holy ghost in Scripture plainly termed God. 1.Cor.3.17. & 6.19. 2.Cor.6.16.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paul hereby gathereth that wee are the temple of God, because his spirite dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed ouer. For whereas God so often promiseth that he will choose vs for a temple

to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirite dwelling in vs. Surely, as Augustine verie well saieth: if we were commanded to make vnto the Holy ghost a temple of timber & stone because such worship is due to God only, it were a cleare argument that he is God: nowe therefore howe much clearer is this, that wee ought not to make a temple, but our selues to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the Holy ghost, both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lyed to the Holy ghost, said that he lyed not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paul teacheth that it is the Holy ghost that speaketh Yea, where commonly the Prophets say, that the words which they vtter are the words of the Lord of hostes, Christ & the Apostles do referre them to the Holy ghost. Whereby it followeth that he is the true Iehouah, that is, the chiefe author of prophecies. Againe, where God complaineth that hee was prouoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people, in steede of that Esay saith that his Holy spirite was grieued. Last of all, if blasphemie against the Holy ghost be not forgiuen in this world nor in the world to come, whereas he may obtaine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his diuine maiestie is here plainly proued, the offence or diminishment whereof is an vnpardonable crime. I do wittingly & of purpose omit many testimonies that the auncient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a maruellous meete place to alleage out of Dauid: with the word of the Lord the heauens were stablished, & al the power of them with the spirit of his mouth, to proue that the worlde was no lesse the worke of the Holy ghost than of the Sonne. But for as much as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repete one thing twise: and in Esay, the spirite of his mouth is as much to say as his word, that reason is verie weake. Therefore I thought good to touch a fewe such things as godly mindes might soundly rest vpon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the comming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly knowen. But of all the testimonies let this one suffice vs for this present. Paul so knitteth these three together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he thereby prooueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must needes thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised. And it is not to be douted, but that in this solemne protestation, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was alreadie deliuered, when he sayd: Baptise them in y name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of one God, which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost. Whereby is euident that in the essence of God abide three Persons in which the one God is knowen. And surely, forasmuch as our faith ought not to looke hither & thither, nor diuersly to wander about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, & to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily proued, that if there be diuerſe kindes of faith, there muſt alſo be many gods. Nowe whereas baptiſme is a Sacrament of faith: it prooueth vnto vs the vnitie of God, becauſe it is but one. And hereof alſo followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptiſed but into one God, becauſe wee embrace the faith of him, into whoſe name we are baptiſed. What meant Chriſt then, when he commanded to be baptiſed, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, & the Holy ghoſt, but that we ought with one Faith to beleeue in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy ghoſt? Therfore ſith this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Worde and the Spirite are nothing els but the verie ſelfe eſſence of God. And verie fooliſhly did the Arrians prate, which confeſſing the godhead of the Sonne, did take from him the ſubſtance of God. And ſuch a like rage vexed the Macedonians, which would haue to be vnderſtanded by the Spirite, onely the giftes of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wiſedome, vnderſtanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God do proceede from him: ſo he onely is the ſpirite of wiſedome, prudence, forritude, and godlineſſe. Yet is not he deuided according to the diſtribution of his graces: but how ſoeuer they be diuerſely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the ſame, as the Apoſtle ſaith.

1.Cor.12.11.

The ſonne diſtinguished from the father, and the ſpirite from them both.

17 Againe, there is ſhewed in the Scriptures a certaine diſtinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirite. In diſcuſſing whereof, how great religiouſnes and ſobrietie we ought to vſe, the greatneſſe of the myſterie it ſelfe doth admoniſh vs. And I verie well like that ſaying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I can not thinke vpon the one, but by & by I am compaſſed about with the brightneſſe of the three: And I cannot ſeuerally diſcerne the three, but I am ſodeinly driuen backe to one. Wherefore let it not come in our mindes once to imagine ſuch a Trinitie of Perſons as may holde our thought withdrawen into ſeueralties, and doeth not foorthwith bring vs againe to that vnitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and Holy ghoſt, do proue a true diſtinction, that no man ſhould think them to be bare names of addition, whereby God according to his workes is diuerſly entitled: but yet it is a diſtinction, not a diuiſion. The places that wee haue alredie cited, do ſhewe that the Sonne hath a propertie diſtinct from the Father, becauſe the Worde had not beene with God, if he had not been another thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being diſtinct from him. Likewiſe he doth diſtinguiſh himſelfe from the Father, when he ſaith, that there is an other which beareth him witneſſe. And for this purpoſe maketh that which in another place is ſaid, that the Father created all things by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certaine manner diſtinct from him. Moreouer, the Father came not downe into the earth, but he that came out from the Father. The Father dyed not, nor roſe again, but he that was ſent by him. Neither yet did this diſtinction begin at the taking of fleſh: but it is manifeſt that he was alſo before, the onely begotten in the boſome of the Father. For who can abyde to ſay, that then the Sonne entred into the boſome of the Father, when hee diſcended from heauen to take manhode vpon him? He was therefore before in the boſome of the Father, and enioyed his glorie with the Father. As for the diſtinction of the Holy ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he saith, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shewe it to be an other beside himselfe? as when he promiseth that he will sende an other comforter, and often in other places. Iohn. 14. 16.

18 But to borow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I knowe not whether it be expedient. In deede the olde fathers are wont so to doe sometime: but withall they do confesse, that whatsoeuer they bring forth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold, least if I bring foorth any thing vnfitly, it should giue occasion either to the malicious to cauill, or to the vnskilfull to be deceiued. Yet such distinction as we haue marked to be set out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giuen the beginning of working, the fountaine and spring of all things: to the Sonne wisedome, counsell, and the verie disposition in the doing of things: to the Holy ghost is assigned power and effectuall working. And although eternitie belong vnto the Father, and eternitie to the Sonne and to the Holy ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue been without his wisedom and power, and in eternitie is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this obseruation of order is not vaine or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckned first, and then of him the Sonne, and after of them both the Holy ghost. For euery mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisedome rising out of him, and last of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sort the Sonne is said to be of the Father only, & the Holy ghost both of the Father & the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viij. Chapter to the Romanes, where the same spirite is without difference sometime called the Spirit of Christ, & somtime of him that raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testifie that it was the Spirit of Christ wherewith the Prophets did prophecie, whereas the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirite of God the Father.

That the father is of none, the sonne is of the father, and the spirite is of both.

19 Now this distinction is so far off from standing against the single vnitie of God, that thereby wee may proue that the Sonne is one God with the Father, because he hath one spirite with him, & that the Holy Spirite is not a thing diuers from the Father & the Sonne. For in ech Hypostasis is vnderstanded the whole substance, with this, that euery one hath his owne propertie. The Father is whole in the Sonne, & the Sonne is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth. I am in the Father, & the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiastical writers do not graunt the one to be seuered from the other by any difference of essence. By these names that betoken distinction (saith Augustine) that is ment whereby they haue relation one to another, & not the verie substance whereby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayings of the old writers to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, & somtime that the Sonne hath both godhead & essence of himselfe, & is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this diuersitie Augustine doth in an other place wel & plainly declare, when he saith: Christ hauing

That the Trinitie of persons is an argument to proue the vnitie of God: and in what sence the father is the beginning of the sonne.

Iohn. 14. 10.

respect to himself, is called God, & to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himself is called God, as to his sonne is called the Father, where hauing respect to the Sonne he is called the Father, hee is not the Sonne. & where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: & where he is called as to himself the Father, & as to himselfe the Son:
it is al one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne: without hauing respect to the Father, we do wel & properly say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mention of the relation betweene him & his Father, then wee rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinitie doth nothing but set forth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in too suttlely pearsing vnto the hie mysterie, to wander abroad by many vaine speculations.

De trinitate & coll. ad Pascentium epi. 174. Cyrillus de trin. li. 6. idem li. 3. dialog. August. in Psal. 109. & tract. in Io. 39. & Psa. 68.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with soberneſſe, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be knowen:
that is, when wee professe that wee beleeue in one God, vnder the name of God, wee vnderstande the one onely and single essence in which wee comprehend three Persons or Hypostases. And therefore so oft as wee do indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no lesse the Sonne & the holy Ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is ioyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinction betweene the Persons.
And because the properties in the Persons bring an order with them, so as the beginning & originall is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father & the Sonne, or the Holy ghost together, the name of God is pecuiliarly giuen to the Father. By this meane is reteined the vnitie of the essence, & regard is had to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne & of the Holy ghost. And whereas we haue alreadie seene that the Apostles do affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whome Moses and the Prophets doe testifie to be Iehouah the Lorde, wee must of necessitie alway come to the vnitie of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacriledge for vs to call the Sonne a seuerall God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admit no relation, and God in respect of himselfe cannot be said to be this or that. Now, that the name of Iehouah the Lord indefinitely taken is applyed to Christ, appeareth by the words of Paul, where he saith: Therefore I haue thrise prayde the Lord, because that after he had re-ceiued the aunsweare of Christ, My grace is sufficient for thee: he saith by and by, that the power of Christ may dwell in mee. It is certaine that the name Lorde is there set for Iehouah, and therefore to restraine it to the person of the Mediatour were verie fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentence that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we knowe that after the accustomed manner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly set the worde Kyrios, Lord, in steede of Iehouah. And not to fetch an example farre off, Paul did in no other sense praye to the Lorde, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the place of Joell: Whosoeuer calleth vppon the name of the Lorde shall be saued. But where this name is peculiarly giuen to the Sonne, wee shall see that there is an other reason thereof,

The diuersitie of persons, & the order of them standeth vvel enough vvith one single diuine essence, vvhereunto vve must haue recourse vvhen the father, the sonne, or the spirit seuerally is called God, & not imagine ech to be a seuerall God from other.

2. Cor. 12. 9.

Act. 2. 16. Ioel. 2. 28.

when wee come to a place fit for it. Nowe it is enough to haue in minde, when Paul had absolutely prayed to God, he by & by bringeth in the name of Christ. Euen so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirite. For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost be comprehended. Which is verie plaine by the Scripture. For euen as there wee heare God to be made a Spirite: so we do heare the Holy ghost, for so much as it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

21 But for as much as Sathan, to the ende to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the diuine essence of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost, and partly concerning their distinction of Persons: And as in a maner in all ages he hath stirred vp wicked spirites to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he trauaileth out of the old embers to kindle a newe fire: therefore here it is good to answere the peruerse fooliſh errours of some. Hitherto it hath bene our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to striue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the trueth which wee haue alreadie peaceably shewed, must be rescued from the cauillations of the wicked: Albeit my chiefe trauaile shall yet be applyed to this ende, that they which giue gentle and open eares to the worde of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secrete mysteries of Scripture, wee ought to dispute soberly, & with great moderation, and to take great heede that neither our thought nor our toung proceede any further than the boundes of Gods worde doe extende. For how may the minde of man by his capacitie define the immeasurable essence of God, which neuer yet could certeinly determine howe great is the body of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea, how may she by her own guiding attaine to discusse the substance of God, that cannot reach to know her own substance? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he onely, as Hilarie sayeth, is a conuenient witnesse to himself, which is not knowen but by himself. Wee shall giue it ouer vnto him, if we shall both conceiue him to be such as he hath opened himselfe vnto vs, & shal not elswhere search to know of him, than by his own word. There are to this ende written fiue homilies of Chrysostome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrained by them from babbling vnbridledly. For they haue behaued themselues in this behalfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the vnhappie successe of which vndiscretion, wee ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selues to trauaile in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of wit, and neuer haue in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thing but that which is taken out of the same Worde: The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is verie harde to know, so doeth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wittes than is expedient. Let them remember that the mindes of men do enter into a maze when they followe their owne curiositie, and so let them suffer themselues to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, howsoeuer they cannot attaine the height of the mysterie.

The monstrous impietie of Seruetus.

22 To make a register of the errours, wherewith the pureneſſe of Faith in this point of doctrine hath in times past beene assailed, were too long & full of vnprofitable tediousneſſe: and the most parte of heretikes haue so attempted to ouerwhelme the glorie of God with grosse doting errours, that they haue thought it enough for them to shake and trouble the vnskilfull. And from a fewe men haue sprong vp many sectes, whereof some doe teare in sunder the essence of God, some doe confounde the distinction that is betweene the Persons. But if wee holde fast that which is alreadie sufficiently shewed by the Scripture, that the essence of the one God which belongeth to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, is single and vndiuided: Againe, that the Father by a certaine propertie differeth frō the Sonne, & the Sonne from the Holy ghost: we shall stop vp the gate not onely against Arrius & Sabellius, but also the other old authors of errours. But because in our time there be risen vp certaine phrentike men, as Seruetto & other like, which haue encombred all things with new deceits: It is good in few words to discusse their falshodes. The name of the Trinitie was so hatefull, yea, so detestable to Seruetto, that hee saide, that all the Trinitaries, as hee called them, were vtterly godlesse. I omit the foolish wordes that he had deuised to raile withall. But of his opinions this was the summe. That God is made Tripartite, when it is said, that there abide three persons in his essence, and that this Trinitie is but a thing imagined, because it disagreeth with the vnitie of God. In the meane time the Persons he would haue to be certaine outward conceptions of Forme, which are not truely subsisting in the essence of God, but do represent God vnto vs in this or that fashion. And at the beginning that there was in God nothing distinct, because once the Word and the Spirit were all one: but since that Christ arose God out of God, the holy ghost sprong also an other God out of him. And though sometime he colour his follies with allegories, as when he saith, that the eternall Worde of God was the spirit of Christ with God, & the bright shining of his forme: Againe, that the Holy ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distribution, there is both in the Sonne & in the holy Spirit a part of God, euen as the same spirit in vs, & also in wood & stones is substantially a portion of god. What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediatour, wee shall hereafter see in place conuenient. But this monstrous forged deuise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glorie of God, needeth no long confutation.

Iohn. 1, 1. For where as Iohn pronounceth, that the Worde was God before the worlde was yet creat, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea, & from farthest Eternitie of time, that Worde which was God was with the Father, and had his owne proper glorie with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily foloweth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirite, but in the hiſtorie of the creation of the worlde, yet he is not there brought in as a ſhadowe, but an eſſentiall power of God, when Moſes ſheweth that the verie vnfaſhioned lumpe was ſuſteined in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternal Spirite was alwayes in God, when hee preſerued and ſuſtained the confuſed matter of heauen and earth, vntill beautie and order were added vnto it. Surely hee could not yet be an image or repreſentation of God as Seruetto dreameth. Gen. 1.2.

But in other points he is compelled more openly to diſcloſe his wickedneſſe, in ſaying that God by his eternall purpoſe, appointing to himſelfe a viſible Sonne, did by this meane ſhewe himſelfe viſible. For if that be true, there is no other godhead left vnto Chriſt, but ſo farre as hee is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his Sonne. Moreouer, hee ſo transformeth thoſe imagined ſhapes, that he ſticketh not to faine newe accidents in God. But this of all other is moſt abhominable, that he confuſely mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the holy ghoſt, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be part, and partitions in the eſſence of God, of which euery portion is God. And namely he ſayeth, that the Spirites of the faithfull are coeternall aud conſubſtantial with God: albeit in an other place he aſſigneth the ſubſtantiall Deitie, not onely to the ſoule of man, but alſo to other creatures.

That the eſſence of God doth not belong to the father onely.

23 Out of this ſinke came forth another like monſter. For certeine leud men meaning to eſcape the hatred and ſhame of the wickedneſſe of Seruetto, haue in deede confeſſed, that there are three Perſons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which truely and properly is the one onely God, informing the Sonne and the holy ghoſt, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea, they forbeare not this horrible manner of ſpeech, that the Father is by this marke diſtinguiſhed from the Sonne and the Holy ghoſt, that he is the onely eſſentiator or maker of the eſſence. Firſt they pretend this colour, that Chriſt is ech where called the Sonne of God: whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be alſo common to the Sonne, yet by reaſon of preeminence it is ſometime giuen to the Father onely, becauſe he is the fountaine and originall of the Deitie, and that for this purpoſe, to make the ſingle vnitie of the eſſence to be thereby noted. They take exception & ſay: If he be truely the Sonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckned the Sonne of a Perſon. I aunſwere that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, becauſe he is the Worde begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to ſpeake of the Perſon of the Mediatour) and yet for explications ſake we ought to haue regarde of the Perſon, that the name of God be not taken ſimply but for the Father onely. For if wee meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throwe downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore ſo oft as mention is made of the godhead, we muſt not admit a compariſon betweene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truely the God that appeared to Eſaie was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the ſame was Chriſt. And he that by the mouth of Eſay teſtified, Eſay. 6.1. Iohn. 12.41. stified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Iewes, was the onely God: and yet Paul pronounceth that the same was Christ. He that cryeth out by Esaie, I liue, and to mee all knees shall bowe, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose serue the testimonies that the Apostle reciteth. Thou O God hast layde the foundations of heauen and earth. Againe, let all the Angels of God worship him, which things belong to none, but to the onely God And yet he sayeth, that they are the proper titles of Christ. And this cauillation is nothing worth, that that is giuen to Christ, which is proper to God, because Christ is the shining brightnesse of his glorie. For because in ech of these places is set the name of Iehouah, it followeth, that it is so sayd in respect that hee is God of himselfe. For if he be Iehouah, it cannot be denyed that he is the same God that in an other place cryeth out by Esaie: I, I am, and beside mee there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremie: The gods that haue not made the heauen and earth, let them perish out of the earth that is vnder the heauen. Whereas on the other side wee must needes confesse, that the Sonne of God is hee, whose Godhead is oft proued in Esaie by the creation of the worlde. And howe can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borowe his being of an other? For whosoeuer saith that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denyeth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy ghost sayeth the contrarie, naming him Iehouah. Nowe if wee graunt that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoyled of his essence, and be a God onely in name and title. The essence of God, if wee beleeue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essencemaker of the Sonne. And so shall the godhead of the Sonne bee an abstract from the essence of God, or a deriuation of a part out of the whole. Nowe must they needes graunt by their owne principle, that the Holy Ghost is the Spirite of the Father onely. For if hee be a deriuation from the first essence, which is onely proper to the Father, of right he cannot be accounted the Spirite of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimonie of Paul, where hee maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreouer, if the person of the Father be wiped out of the Trinitie, wherein shall he differ from the Sonne and the holy Ghost, but in this, that hee onely is God? They confesse Christ to be God, amd yet they saye, hee differeth from the Father. Againe, there must be some marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, doe manifestly bring the true Godhead of Christ to nothing, which cannot be without essence, yea, and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnlesse hee haue something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What nowe will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them answere if he haue not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not be in part, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meane they doe foulie teare in sunder the essence of God.

It

It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father and the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the essence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say, that the Father in giuing his essence, remaineth neuertheless the onely God, with whome the essence abideth: then Christ shal be a figuratiue God, and a God onely in shewe and in name but not in deede: because nothing is more proper to God than to be, according to this saying: He that is hath sent me vnto you. Exo. 3. 13.

24 It is easie by many places to proue that it is false which they holde, that so oft as there is in scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is meant thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselues do alleage, they fouly bewraye their owne want of consideration, because there is also set the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatiuely taken, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And their obiection where they say, If the Father were not onely the true God, hee shoulde himselfe be his owne Father, is aunswered with on: worde It is not inconuenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisedom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fit for it, I will more largely declare. For sith Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, hee is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respect that he was the eternall Worde before all worldes begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke vpon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to ioyne vs vnto God. And because they doe so boldly exclude the Sonne from the honour of God, I woulde faine knowe whether the Sonne when hee pronounceth, that none is good but God, doe take goodnesse from him selfe? I doe not speake of his humaine nature, least perhappes they should take exception, and say, that whatsoeuer goodnesse was in it, it came of free gifte. I aske whether the eternall Worde of God be good or no? If they saye nay, then wee holde their vngodlinesse sufficiently conuinced: in saying yea, they confounde themselues. But whereas at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of Good, that doeth the more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common maner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honour, he did admonishe them, that the goodnesse wherein hee excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath I aske also, where Paul affirmeth that onely God is immortall, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish, and false? Shall not hee then be immortall, that from the beginning was life to giue immortalitie to Angels? Shall not hee be wise, that is the eternall wisedome of God? Shal not the trueth it selfe be true? I aske further more, whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For hee claimeth this vnto himselfe, to haue all knees bow before him: it followeth that hee is the God which did in the lawe forbid any other to be worshipped but himself. If they wil haue that meant of the Father onely which is spoken in Esay: I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against them selues, forasmuch as wee see, that whatsoeuer ſoeuer pertaineth to God is giuen to Chriſt. And their cauillation hath no place, that Chriſt was exalted in the fleſh, wherein he had beene abaſed, and that in reſpect of the fleſh, all authoritie is giuen him in heauen & in earth: becauſe although the maieſtie of king and iudge extende to the whole Perſon of the Mediatour, yet if he had not beene God openly ſhewed in fleſh, he could not haue beene aduaunced to ſuch height, but that God ſhould haue diſagreed with himſelfe. But this controuerſie Paul doeth well take away, teaching that he was equall with God before he did abaſe himſelfe vnder the ſhape of a ſeruaunt. Nowe howe could this equalitie haue ſtande togither, vnleſſe he had beene the ſame God whoſe name is Iah and Iehouah: that rideth vpon the Cherubin, that is king of all the earth and Lord of the worlds? Now howſoeuer they babble againſt it, it cannot be taken from Chriſt which Eſaie ſaieth in another place: He, he, is our God, for him we haue wayted, whereas in theſe wordes he deſcribeth the comming of God the Redeemer, not onely that ſhould bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but alſo fully in all points reſtore the Church. And with their other cauillation they nothing preuaile, in ſaying, that Chriſt was God in his Father. For though we confeſſe that in reſpect of order and degree the beginning of the godhead is in the Father, yet we ſay that it is a deteſtable inuention to ſaye, that the eſſence is onely proper to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes either he ſhould haue mo eſſences than one, or elſe they call Chriſt God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Chriſt is God, but next after the Father, then ſhall the eſſence be in him begotten and faſhioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfaſhioned. I knowe that many quicke noſed men doe laugh at this that wee gather the diſtinction of Perſons out of the wordes of Moſes, where hee bringeth in God ſpeaking thus: Let vs make man after our image. But yet the godly readers doe ſee howe vainly and fondly Moſes ſhould bring in this as a talke of diuerſe together, if there were not in God mo Perſons than one. Nowe certaine is it, that they whome the Father ſpake vnto, were vncreate: but nothing is vncreate but God himſelfe, yea the one onely God. Nowe therefore vnleſſe they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authoritie of commaunding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghoſt: it ſhall followe that God did not inwardly thus ſpeake to himſelfe, but directed his ſpeach to other foreine workmen. Finally one place ſhall eaſily anſwere two of their obiections. For whereas Chriſt himſelfe pronounceth that God is a ſpirite, this were not conuenient to bee reſtrained to the Father onely, as if the Word himſelfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirite doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is alſo comprehended vnder the indefinite name of God. But he addeth by and by after that, none are allowed for good worſhippers of the Father, but they that worſhip him in ſpirite and trueth, wherevpon followeth an other thing, becauſe Chriſt doth vnder a head execute the office of a teacher, he doeth giue the name of God to the Father, not to the entent to deſtroy his owne godhead, but by degrees to lift vs vp vnto it.

Iohn.4.24.

25 But in this they are deceiued, that they dreame of certaine vndiuided singular things, whereof eth haue a part of the essence. But by the Scriptures, we teach, that there is but one essentiall God, and therefore that the essence as wel of the Sonne as of the Holy ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first and hath of himselfe begotten his wisedome, therefore rightfully as is aboue said, he is counted the originall and fountaine of all the godhead: So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternitie, because falsely and cauillously they ascribe vnto vs a deuise of their owne braine, as though we did faine that by deriuation there come three persons out of one essence: whereas it is euident by our writings, that we do not drawe the persons out of the essence, but although they be abyding in the essence we make a distinction betweene them. If the Persons were seuered from the essence, then peraduenture their reason were like to be true. But by that meane it should be a Trinitie of gods and not of Persons, which one God contemneth in him. So is their fond question answered, whether the essence doe meete to make vp the Trinitie, as though we did imagine that there descend three gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnesse where they say, that then the Trinitie, should be without God. For though it meete not to make vp the distinction as a part or a member, yet neither are the Persons without it, nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. Wee say therefore, that the godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby wee graunt that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respect of his person, but in so much as hee is the Sonne, wee say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his person is God himselfe. And the true teaching writers that in olde time haue spoken of the Trinitie, haue only applyed this name to the Persons, forsomuch as it were not onely an absurde errour but also a grosse vngodlinesse, to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will haue these three to meete, the essence, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, it is plaine that they doe destroy the essence of the Sonne and the Holy ghost, for else the partes ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in euery distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker, and nothing shoulde remaine in the Sonne but a shadowe, and the Trinitie should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

There is one indiuisible diuine essence, vvhich is vnbegotten, absolutely of it selfe and vvithout beginning.

26 Whereas they obiect, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Sonne: to that wee haue alreadie aunswered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrained to the Father onely, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godhead, not in making of essence as the madde men doe fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the Christ though the sonne of God, yet properly God not by a certaine deriued deitie, but by the same Godhead vvhereby his father is God.

Iohn.17.3. eternall life, that men beleeue in thee the one true God, and Iesus Christ whome thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediatour, he keepeth the degree that is meane betweene God and men: and yet is not his maiestie thereby diminished. For though he abased himself, yet he left not with the Father his glorie that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confesseth that Christ for a short time was abased beneath the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternall God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the person of the Mediatour speaketh to the Father, vnder this name of God is comprehended the Godhead
Iohn.16.7. which is his also. So when hee sayd to the Apostles: It is profitable that I goe vp to the Father, because the Father is greater: Hee giueth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of godhead to be as touching his eternal essence inferiour to the Father, but because hauing obtained the heauenly glorie, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He setteth his father in the higher degree, insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightnes that appeareth in heauen, differeth from that measure of glorie that was seene in him being clothed with flesh. After like maner in another
1.Cor.15.24. place Paul saith: that Christ shall yeeld vp the kingdome to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurde than to take away eternall continuance from the godhead of Christ. If he shall neuer cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remaine the same that he was frō the beginning, it followeth that vnder the name of the Father is cōprehended the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descend vnto vs, that lifting vs vp vnto his Father, he might also lift vs vp vnto himselfe, inasmuch as he is all one with his Father. It is therfore neither lawful nor right so exclusiuely to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, Iohn doeth for this cause af-
Iohn.1.1. firme that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he resteth in a second degree of Godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of newe Gods doe meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they foorthwith exclude him from the godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but hee that is the one God: or as though the godhead powred from one to another, be not a certaine newe forged imagination.

Irænew farre frō thinking the father only and not the sonne to be properly eternall God.

27 Whereas they heap vp many places out of Irenæus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignorance, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to haue considered, that then the holy man had to doe in disputation with those frantike men, that denyed that the Father of Christ was the same God that in olde time spake by Moses and the Prophets, but that hee was I wot not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the worlde. Therefore he altogether trauaileth in this point, to make it plaine that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to deuise any other, & therefore it is no maruell if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was

ſpoken of by Chriſt and the Apoſtles. And in like manner nowe, whereas we are to ſtand againſt another ſort of errour, we may truely ſay that the God which in olde time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Chriſt. But if any man obiect that it was the Father, our aunſwere is in readineſſe, that when we ſtriue to defend the godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heede to this purpoſe of Irenæus, all that contention ſhall ceaſe. And alſo by the ſixt Chapter of the thirde booke, this whole ſtriſe is ended, where the good man ſtandeth all vpō this point, to proue that he which is in Scripture abſolutely and indefinitely called God: is verily the one onely God, and that Chriſt is abſolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principall point whereupon ſtoode all his diſputation, as by the whole proceſſe thereof doeth appeare: and ſpecially the 46. Chapter of the ſecond booke, that he is not called the Father by darke ſimilitude or parable, which is not verie God in deed. Moreouer in another place he ſaith, that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioyntly called God by ỹ Prophets and Apoſtles. Afterward he defineth how Chriſt which is Lorde of all, and King, and God, and iudge, receiued power from him which is the God of all, that is to ſay in reſpect of his ſubiection, becauſe he was humbled euen to the death of the croſſe. And a little after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gaue the Lawe by the hand of Moſes, and appeared to the Fathers. Nowe if any man doe prate that with Irenæus onely the Father is the God of Iſrael, I will turne againe vpon him that which the ſame writer plainly teacheth, that Chriſt is all one and the ſame: as alſo he applyeth vnto him the Prophecie of Habacuc. God ſhall come out of the South. To the ſame purpoſe ſerueth that which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Chriſt himſelfe therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing. And in the twelfe Chapter of the ſame booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleeued God, becauſe Chriſt is the maker of heauen & earth and the onely God.

28 And with no more trueth doe they bring in Tertullian for their defender. For though hee be rough ſometime and crabbed in his manner of ſpeach, yet doeth he plainly teach the ſumme of that doctrine that wee defende. That is to ſay, whereas he is the one God, yet by diſpoſition and order he is his Word: that there is but one God in vnitie of ſubſtance, and yet that the ſame vnitie by myſterie of orderly diſtribution is diſpoſed into Trinitie, that there are three, not in ſtate, but in degree, not in ſubſtance, but in forme, not in power, but in order. He ſaith that hee defendeth the Sonne to be a ſeconde next to the Father, but hee meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of diſtinction. In ſome places hee ſayeth that the Sonne is viſible. But when hee hath reaſoned on both partes he defineth that he is inuiſible in ſo much as hee is the Worde. Finallie where he affirmeth, that the Father is determined in his owne perſon, he proueth himſelfe farre from that errour which we confute. And though he doeth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the nexte peece of his writing expounding himſelfe, he ſaieth, that he ſpeaketh not excluſiuely in reſpect of the Sonne, becauſe hee denyeth that the Sonne is any other God beside the Father, & that therefore their sole gouernement is not broken by distinction of Person. And by the perpetuall course of his purpose it is easie to gather the meaning of his wordes. For he disputeth against Praxeas, that though God be distinguished into three persons, yet are there not made many gods nor the vnitie torne in sunder. And because by the imagination of Praxeas Christ could not be God, but hee must also be the Father, therefore he so much labour eth about the distinction. Whereas he calleth the Worde and the Spirite a portion of the whole, although it be a hard kind of speech, yet is it excusable, because it is not referred to the substance, but onely sheweth the disposition and order that belongeth onely to the Persons, as Tertullian himselfe witnesseth, And hereof hangeth that: How many persons thinkest thou there are, O most froward Praxeas, but euen so many as there be names? And so a little after that, they may beleeue the Father and the Sonne ech in their names and Persons. Hereby I thinke may be sufficiently confuted their impudencie, that seeke to beguile the simple with colour of Tertullians authoritie.

The fathers vvith generall consent teach Christ to be the same God vvith the father.

29 And surely whosoeuer shall diligently compare togither the writings of the old authors, shal find no other thing in Irenæus, than that which hath beene taught by other that came after. Iustine is one of the auncientest, and he in all things doeth agree with vs. Yet let them obiect that hee as the rest doe, calleth the Father of Christ the onely God. The same thing doth Hilarie teach, yea, and speaketh more hardly, that the eternitie is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the essence of God from the Sonne? And yet is he altogether in defence of the same Faith that wee followe. Yet are they not ashamed to picke out certaine mangled sentences whereby they would perswade that Hilarie is a Patrone of their errour. Where they bring in Ignatius; if they will haue that to be of any authorie, let them proue that the Apostles made a lawe for lent and such like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnsauourie than those fonde trifles that are published vnder the name of Ignatius. Wherefore their impudencie is so much lesse tollerable, that disguise themselues with such visors to deceiue. Moreouer the consent of the auncient Fathers is plainly perceiued by this, that at the councel of Nice, Arrius neuer durst alledge for himselfe the authoritie of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greekes or Latines doth excuse himself and say, that he dissenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken howe Augustine whome these loselles doe most hate, hath diligently searched the writings of them all, and howe reuerently hee did embrace them. Truely euen in matters of least weight he vseth to shewe what compelleth him to dissent from them. And in this matter, if he had read any thing doubtfull or darke in other, he hideth it not. But the doctrine that these men striue against, he taketh it as confessed, that from the farthest time of antiquitie it hath beene without controuersie receiued. And by one worde it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where he sayth that in the Father is vnitie, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that he then forgate himselfe? But in another place he purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole Godhead, because he is of none: considering in deede wisely, that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if ỹ beginning should not be reckened at him, the single vnitie of God cannot be conceiued. By this I trust the godly reader will perceiue that all the cauillations are confuted, wherewith Sathan hath hitherto attempted to peruert or darken the pure trueth of doctrine. Finally, I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiositie, and not more greedily than meete is, seeke for combersome and entangled disputations. For I take not in hande to please them, that do delight in an vntemperate desire of speculation. Truely I haue omitted nothing of suttle purpose that I thought to make against mee. But while I studie to edifie the Church, I thought it best to leaue many thinges vntouched which both smally profited, and would greeue the readers with superfluous tediousnesse. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the Father do alwayes beget? For as much as it is follie to faine a continuall act of begetting, sith it is euident that from eternitie there haue been three Persons in God.

The xiiii. Chapter.

That the Scripture euen in the creation of the vvorld & of all things: doth by certaine markes put difference betvvene the true God, and fained gods.

ALthough Esay doeth worthily reproch the worshippers of false gods with slouthfulnesse, for that they haue not learned by the verie foundations of the earth, and round compasse of the heauens, which is the true God: yet such is the dulnesse and grossenes of our wit, that least the faithfull shoulde fall away to the inuentions of the Gentiles, it was necessarie to haue God more expressely painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the mind of the world, which is compted the most tollerable description that is found among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behoueth vs more familiarly to knowe him, least we alwayes wauer in doubtfulnesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to haue a historie of the creation remaining, whereupon the Faith of the Church might rest, and seeke for none other God but him, whome Moses hath declared to be the maker and buylder of the worlde. There is first set foorth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeares the faithfull might come to the first originall of mankinde, and of all things. Which knowledge is verie necessarie, not onely to confute those monsterous fables that sometime were spred in Ægypt and other partes of the worlde, but also, that the beginning of the worlde once being knowen, the eternitie of God may more clearely shine foorth and rauish vs in admiration of it. Neither ought wee to be any thing moued with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no sooner in the minde of God to make the heauen and the earth, and why he sitting idle did suffer so immeasurable a space to passe away, sith he might haue made it many thousand ages before: whereas the whole continuance of the worlde that nowe draweth to an ende, is not yet come to sixe thousand yeares. For why God so long deferred it, is neither lawfull nor expedient for vs to enquire. Because if mans minde wil trauaile

Esay. 40. 21.

The creation of the vvorld taught by Moses, that men might knovv the God vvhich made it, and not enquire vvhy he made it no sooner.

to attaine therevnto, it shal faile an hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himselfe to proue the modestie of our faith, hath of purpose willed to be hidden. And well did that godly old man speake, which when a wanton fellowe did in scorne demaund of him, what God had done before the creation of the world, answered, that he buylded Hell for curious fooles. Let this graue and seuere warning represse the wantonnesse that tickleth many, yea, and driueth them to euill and hurtfull speculations. Finally, let vs remember that the same inuisible God whose wisedome, power and iustice is incomprehensible, doth set before vs the historie of Moses as a looking glasse, wherein his liuely image appeareth. For, as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age, or dulled with any disease, doe not discerne any thing plainly, vnlesse they be holpen with spectacles: so, such is our weakenesse, that vnlesse the Scripture direct vs in seeking of God, wee doe foorthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that followe their owne wantonnesse, because they be nowe warned in vaine, shall all too late feele with horrible destruction, how much it had beene better for them reuerently to receiue the secrete counsels of God, than to vomite out blasphemies, to obscure the heauen withall. And rightly doth Augustine complaine, that wrong is don to God when further cause of things is sought for, than his onely will. The same man in another place doeth wisely warne vs, that it is no lesse euill to moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For howe broad soeuer the circuite of the heauen is, yet is there some measure of it. Nowe, if one should quarel with God for that the emptinesse wherein nothing is contained, is an hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wantonnesse? Into like madnesse runne they that busie themselues about Gods sitting still, because at their appointment he made not the worlde innumerable ages sooner. To satisfie their owne greedinesse of minde, they couet to passe without the compasse of the worlde, as though in so large a circuit of heauen, and earth, they could not finde things enough that with their inestimable brightnesse may ouerwhelme all our senses: as though in sixe thousande yeares, God hath not shewed examples, in continual consideration whereof, our mindes may be exercised. Let vs therefore willingly abyde enclosed within those boundes wherewith it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes, that they shoulde not straye abroade with libertie of wandring.

lib. de gen. contra Ma. De ciuit. dei. lib. 40.

The deuiding of the creation into sixe dayes, the order of creating, & the maner vvhich Moses vsed in speaking of God, do shevv vvhat vve ought especially to learne by that historie.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in sixe dayes. For by this circumstance we are withdrawen from forged inuentions to the one only God that deuided his worke into sixe dayes, that it should not greeue vs to be occupyed all the tyme of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soeuer wee turne them, are compelled to looke vppon the workes of God, yet see wee howe fickle our head is, and if any godly thoughtes doe touch vs, how soone they passe away. Here againe mans reason murmureth, as though such proceedings were disagreeing frō the power of God, vntil such time as being made subiect to the obedience of faith, she learne to keepe that rest whereunto the hallowing of the seuenth day calleth vs. But in the verie order of things, is diligently to be considered, the fatherly loue of God toward mankinde, in this: that he did not creat Adam vntil he had stored the worlde with all plentie of good things. For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren & emptie, if he had giuen him life before that there was any light, hee shoulde haue seemed not so wel to prouide for his commoditie. But nowe where hee first disposed the motions of the Sunne & the Planets for the vse of man, and furnished the earth, the waters and the aire with liuing creatures, & brought foorth abundance of fruites to suffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent and prouident housholder, he shewed his marueilous bountie toward vs. If a man doe more heedefully wey with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse & publisher of the one God the creator. I omit here that which I haue alreadie declared, that he speaketh not there only of the bare essence of God, but also setteth foorth vnto vs his eternall Wisdome & Spirite, to the ende wee should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be knowen by the image that he hath there expressed.

The creation of Angels is a thing necessarie to be knowen, both because they are the most noble part of Gods vvorkes, & also for that there are sundrie errors concerning Angels, vvhich cannot vvithout such knowledge be refuted.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because, though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenesse of the common people, reciteth in his historie of the creation no other workes of God but such as are seene with our eyes, yet whereas afterward he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, wee may easily gather, that he was the creator of them in whose seruice they employ their trauell and offices. Though therefore Moses speaking after the capacitie of the people, doeth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrarie, but that we may plainly & expresly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his workes, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that, this point of doctrine is verie necessarie for the confuting of many errors. The excellencie of the nature of Angels hath so daseled the mindes of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offered them, if they should be made subiect to the authoritie of one God, and brought as it were in obedience. And here vpon were they fained to be gods. There rose vp also one Manichæus with his sect, which made themselues two originall beginnings of things, God, & the Diuel, and to God he assigned the beginning of good things, & of things of euil nature he determined the diuel to be the author. If our minds should be entangled with this errour, God should not keepe whole his glorie in the creation of the world. For, whereas nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which giue that vnto the diuel, do they not in a manner giue him the title of godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authoritie be graunted to the diuel, that he may put in execution what he will though God say nay & withstand it? As for the onely foundation that the Manichees haue, that it is vnlawful to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euil: that nothing hurteth the true Faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euil in the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man & the diuel, nor the sins that proceede thereof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherin God hath not shewed an example both of his wisedomn and iustice. Therefore to aunswere these peruerse deuises: it behoueth vs to lift vp our mindes higher than our eyes can attaine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene creed God is called the creator of all things, things inuisible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to keepe the measure that the rule of godlinesse appointeth, least the readers with searching to vnderstand further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being led away from the simplicitie of faith. And surely, forasmuch as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alwaye for our profit, and such things as are smally auailable to edifie, hee doeth either leaue wholely vnspoken, or but lightly, and as it were ouerrunningly touch them: it shalbe also our duetie to be content not to knowe those things that do not profit vs.

4 That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commaundements, are also his creatures, it ought to be certeinly out of all question. To moue dout of the time and order that they were created in, should it not rather be a busie waiwardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose than is it, curiously to searche, what day the other more secret armies of heauen beside the starres and planets first began to be? But, because I will not be long, let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remember that wee ought to keepe one rule of modestie & sobrietie, that of obscure things we neither speake, nor think, nor yet desire to knowe any other things than that hath beene taught vs by the word of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture wee continually rest vpon the searching and studying of such things as perteine to edification, & not giue our selues to curiosity or study of things vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in trifling questions, but in sound godlinesse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holines: let vs rest vpon such knowledge. Wherefore, if wee will be rightly wise, wee must leaue those vanities that idle men haue taught without warrant of the worde of God, concerning the nature, degrees, and multitude of Angels. I knowe that such matters as this, are by many more greedily taken hold of, & are more pleasant vnto them than such things as lie in daily vse. But if it greeue vs not to be the scholers of Christ, let it not greeue vs to followe that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shal it so come to passe, ỹ being contented with his scholing, we shal not onely forbeare, but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Denyse, whatsoeuer man he was, hath disputed many thinges both subtlely & wittily in his Hierarchie of heauen: but if a man examine it more nerely, he shal finde that for the most part it is but meere babbling. But the dutifull purpose of a diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to stablish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable.

Gen. 1. 2.

If one shoulde read that booke, hee would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heauen, & did tel of things not that he had learned by hearsay, but that he had seene with his eyes. But Paul which was rauished aboue the third heauen, hath vttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawful for man to speake the secretes that he had seene. Therefore bidding farewell to that triflyng wisedome, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs know concerning his Angels. 1. Cor. 12. 2.

5 It is commonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heauenly Spirites, whose ministration and seruice God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreede. For which reason that name is giuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shewe himselfe vnto men. And vpon like reason are deriued the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a gard enuiron their Prince, & do adorne and set forth the honorable shew of his maiestie, and like souldiers they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their captaine, and are euer so prepared & in readines to do his commandements, that so soone as he doth but becken to them, they prepare themselues to worke, or rather be at their worke alreadie. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his royaltie, the other Prophets do describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God sate him down in his throne of iudgement, there stood by a thousand thousand, & ten thousand companies of ten thousands of Angels. And because God doth by them marueilously shewe foorth & declare the might & strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because hee exerciseth & vseth his authoritie in the world by them, therefore they are sometime called principalities, sometime powers, sometime Dominions. Finally, because in them as it were sitteth the glorie of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the Holy ghost often vseth those other former names to aduance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels. For it were not reason ỹ those instruments should be let passe without honour, by whome God doeth specially shewe the presence of his maiestie. Yea, for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministerie, as in a looking glasse, they partly represent vnto vs the godhead. Although in deede I mislike not this that the old writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, where the scripture saith, that the Angel of God appeared vnto Abraham, Iacob, Moses, and other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of al the Angels in deede, this name is giuen vnto them. And that ought to seeme no meruaile. For if this honour be giuen to princes & gouernours, that in their office they stande in the steede of God that is soueraigne king & iudge, much greater cause there is why it should be giuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnes of the glorie of God much more abundantly shineth. Angels in Scripture, termed armies, strengthes, principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, gods. Dan. 7. 10. Coloss. 1. 16. Ephe. 1. 21. Gen. 18. 1. 32. Ios. 5. 14. Iudi. 6. 14. & 13. 22. Psa. 82. 6.

6 But the scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comfort and confirmation of Faith: that is to wit, that the Angels are the distributers & administratours of Gods bountie towarde vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetie: The seruice which Angels do vnto men.

they take vpon them the defence of vs, they direct our wayes, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vniuersall, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath giuen his Angels charge of thee, to keepe thee in all thy waies. They shall beare thee vp in their handes, least thou chaunce to hit thy feete against a stone. Againe, The Angel of the Lorde standeth rounde about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Wherby God sheweth that he appointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to keepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her maistres. God promiseth to Abraham his seruant an Angel to be the guide of his iourney. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim & Manasses prayeth, that the Angel of the Lord by whom he himselfe had bin deliuered from all euill, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defende the rentes of the people of Israel. And so oft as it pleased God to reskue Israel out of the handes of their enemies, he raised vp reuengers by the ministerie of Angels. So finally (to ỹ end I needе not to rehearse many mo) the Angels ministred to Christ and were readie assistent to him in all necessities. They brought tidinges to the women of his resurrection, & to ỹ disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the deuill and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vppon them, that are bent against vs. As we reade that the Angell of God to deliuer Hierusalem from the siege, slewe in one night a hundred fowerscore and fiue thousande in the campe of the king of Assyria.

Whether euery man haue his peculiar Angel to attend vpon him, a vaine idle and needeles question.

7 But whether to euerie of the faithfull be a seueral Angell assigned for their defence, I dare not certainely affirme. Surely when Daniel bringeth in the Angel of the Persians, and the Angel of the Grecians, hee sheweth that he ment, that there are to kingdoms and prouinces certaine Angelles appointed as gouernours. And when Christ saith that the Angels of children do alway beholde the face of the Father, he seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whome the preseruation of them is giuen in charge. But I can not tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euerie one hath his Angell set ouer him. But this is to be holden for certaintie, that not one Angel only hath care of euery one of vs, but that they all by one consent do watch for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more reioyce of one sinner conuerted to repentance, than of nintie & nine iust that haue stand still in their righteousnes. And it is saide of mo Angels than one, that they conueyed the soule of Lazarus into the bosome of Abraham. And not without cause did Elizeus shewe to his seruant so many fierie chariots that were peculiarly appointed for him. But one place there is that seemeth more plaine than the rest to proue this point. For when Peter being brought out of prison knocked at the doores of the house where the brethren were assembled, when they could not imagine that it was he, they said it was his Angell. It should seeme that this came in their minde by the common opinion, that to euerie of the faithfull are assigned their Angels for gouernours. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may well be, notwithstanding ſtanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had giuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his continuall keeper: as the common people doe imagine that there are appointed to euery one two Angels, as it were diuerſe ghoſtes, a good Angel and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiouſly to ſearch for that which doth not much import vs to knowe. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heauen do watch for his ſafetie, I do not ſee what he can be the better, if he vnderſtand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to keepe him. And they which reſtraine vnto one Angel the care that God hath to euery one of vs, do great wrong to themſelues, and to all the members of the Church: as if that power to ſuccour vs had bin vainely promiſed vs, wherewith being enuironed and defended, we ſhould fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I grant Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, & with Iude, the Archangel. And Paul ſaith, it ſhall be an Archangel that ſhal with ſound of trũpet call men to the iudgement. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours betweene Angels, or diſcerne one from another by ſpeciall markes, and appoint euery one his place & ſtanding? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michael, & Gabriel: and if you liſt to adde the third out of the hiſtorie of Tobie, may by their ſignification ſeeme to be giuen to the Angels, according to the capacitie of our weakeneſſe, although I had rather leaue that expoſition at large. As for the number of them, we heare by Chriſtes mouth of many Legions, by Daniel many companies of ten thouſandes, the ſeruant of Elizeus ſaw many chariots full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is ſaid, that do camp round about them that feare God. As for ſhape, it is certaine, that Spirites haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacitie of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs out Angels with winges, to the intent we ſhould not doubt that they will be euer with incredible ſwifteneſſe, readie to ſuccour vs, ſo ſoone as neede ſhall require, as if the lightning ſent from heauen ſhould flie vnto vs with ſuch ſwiftneſſe as it is wonted. Whatſoeuer more than this may bee ſought of both theſe points, let vs beleeue it to be of that ſort of myſteries, whereof the full reuelation is deferred to the laſt day. Wherefore let vs remember to take heed both of too much curioſitie in ſerching & too much boldnes in ſpeking.

The different degrees of honour amongſt Angels, & the certeintie of their number are things vnknowen.

9 But this one thing which manie troubleſome do call in doubt, is to be holden for certaintie, that Angels are miniſtring ſpirits, whoſe ſeruice God vſeth for the defence of his, and by whom he both diſtributeth his benefits among men, and alſo putteth his other workes in execution. It was in the olde time the opinion of the Sadducs, that by Angels is meant nothing els, but either the motions that God doth inſpire in men, or the tokens that he ſheweth of his power. But againſt this errour crie out ſo manie teſtimonies of Scripture, that it is marueile that ſo groſſe ignorance could be ſuffred in that people. For to omit theſe places that I haue before alleaged, where are recited thouſands & Legions of Angels: where ioy is giuen vnto them: where it is ſaid that they vpholde the faithfull with their hands, & cary their ſoules into reſt: that they ſee the face of the Father, & ſuch like: there are other places whereby is clearely proued, that they are in deede ſpirits of a nature that hath ſubſtance. For whereas Stephen & Paul do ſay, that the law was giuen by the hand of Angels, & Chriſt ſaith, that the elect after the reſurrection ſhalbe like vnto Angels: that the day of iudgement is not knowen to the verie Angels: that he ſhall then come with his holy Angels: howſoeuer they be writhed, yet muſt they ſo be vnderſtanded. Likewiſe, when Paul charged Timothie before Chriſt & his choſen Angels, to keepe his commaundementes, he meaneth not qualities or inſpirations without ſubſtance, but verie ſpirites. And otherwiſe it ſtandeth not together that is written in the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, that Chriſt is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made ſubiect vnto them: that Chriſt tooke vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the bleſſed ſpirites, to whome may theſe compariſons agree? And the author of that Epiſtle expoundeth himſelfe, where he placeth in the kingdome of heauen the ſoules of the faithfull & the holy Angels together. Alſo the ſame that we haue alreadie alleged, that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our ſafetie, that they maruel at the manifolde grace of God in the Church, that they are ſubiect to Chriſt, the head. To the ſame purpoſe ſerueth this, that they ſo oft appeared to the holy Fathers in the forme of men, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Chriſt himſelfe for the principall preeminence that he hath in the perſon of the Mediatour, is called an Angel. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furniſh the ſimple with defence againſt thoſe fooliſh & reaſonles opinions, that many ages agoe raiſed by Sathan do now and then ſpring vp againe.

Againſt the opinion of the Sadducs, who denyed that there are any ſuch ſpirites as wee call Angels.

That vvhich Angels do for vs, muſt not cauſe vs to do the honour vnto them that vve owe to God.

10 Now it reſteth, that we ſeeke to meete with that ſuperſtition which is commonly wont to creepe in, where it is ſaid: that Angels are the miniſters and deliuerers of all good things vnto vs. For by and by mans reaſon falleth to this point, to think that therefore al honour ought to be giuen them. So commeth it to paſſe that thoſe things which belong only to God and Chriſt, are conueyed away to Angels. By this meane wee ſee that in certaine ages paſt, the glorie of Chriſt hath bin many wayes obſcured, when Angels without warrant of Gods worde were loden with immeaſurable titles of honour. And of all the vices that we ſpeake againſt, there is almoſt none more auncient than this. For it appeareth, that Paul himſelf had much to doe with ſome which ſo aduanced Angels, that they in manner would haue brought Chriſt vnder ſubiection. And therefore he doth ſo carefully preſſe this point in his Epiſtle to the Colloſsians, that Chriſt is not onely to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is alſo the authour of all the good things that they haue: to the ende wee ſhould not forſake him and turne vnto them, which can not ſufficiently helpe themſelues, but are faine to drawe out of the ſame fountaine that we do. Surely foraſmuch as there ſhineth in them a certain brightnes of the maieſtie of God, there is nothing whereunto wee are more eaſily enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worſhipping of them, & to giue vnto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing

Coloſſ.1.16.

Iohn in the Reuelation confesseth to haue chaunced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this answere. See thou do it not. For I am thy fellow seruant, Worship God.

11 But this daunger wee shall well beware of, if wee do consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to prouide for the safetie of the faithfull, & to communicate the gifts of his liberalitie among them. Surely he doth not this of necessitie, as though he could not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, and bringeth his worke to passe with an onely becke: so far is it of, that they be any aide to him, to ease him of the hardnesse thereof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weakenes, so that wee want nothing that may auaile our mindes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough & enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth ỳ he is our protector. But while we see our selues besieged with so many dangers, so many hurtfull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weakenesse and frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for dispaire, vnlesse the Lorde after the proportion of our capacitie doe make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meane he not onely promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whome he hath giuen in charge to trauail for our safetie, & that so long as wee be compassed with the garrison and support of them, whatsoeuer danger betideth, wee be without all reach of hurt. I graunt we do amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, wee still looke about from whence other helpe may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lorde of his infinite clemencie and gentlenes to helpe this our faulr, there is no reason why wee should neglect his so great benefit. An example thereof we haue in the seruant of Elizeus, which when he sawe the hil besieged with the armie of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was striken downe with feare, as if his maister and hee were then vtterly destroyed. Then Elizeus praied God to open his seruants eyes, and by & by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and fierie chariotes, that is, with a multitude of Angels to keepe him and the Prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his heart againe, & was able with a dreedelesse mind to looke downe vpon his enemies, with sight of whome he was before in a maner driuen out of his witte.

Our frailtie is the cause why God who might do all things for vs by himselfe, doth so many things by the ministerie of his Angels.

2. Kin. 6. 17.

12 Wherefore whatsoeuer is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs apply it to this ende, that ouercomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are therefore prouided vs of God, that we should not be made afraid with multitude of enimies, as though they could preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be mo on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that wee should be led away from God by Angels, which are ordeined for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among vs? But they do leade vs away in deede, if they doe not streight lead vs as it were by the hand to him, that we may haue eye vnto, call vpon, and publish him for our only helper: if we consider not them to be as his handes

that moue themselues to no worke but by his direction: if they do not holde vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that wee may hang wholely of him, leane all vpon him, be carried to him and rest in him. For that which is described in the vision of Iacob, ought to sticke and be fastened in our mindes, howe Angels descende downe to the earth vnto men, and from men doe goe vp to heauen by a ladder, whereupon standeth the Lorde of hostes. Whereby is meant, that by the onely intercession of Christ it commeth to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels doe come vnto vs, as he himselfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open and the Angels descending to the Sonne of man. John 1.51. Therefore the seruaunt of Abraham being committed to the custodie of the Angel, doeth not therefore call vpon the Angel to helpe him, but holpen with that commendation, hee prayeth to the Lorde, and beseecheth him to shewe his mercy to Abraham. For as God doeth not therefore make them ministers of his power & goodnes, to the intent to part his glory with them: so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministration, that we should diuide our confidence betweene him and them. Let vs therefore forsake that Platonicall philosophie, to seeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose, that they may make God more gentle vnto vs: which superstitious and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

Gen. 28.12.

Gen. 24.7.

Plato in Epynonide & Cratilo.

That vvhich the scripture hath concerning diuels, is to make vsvvatchfull, not to discourage vs.

13 As for such things as the Scripture teacheth concerning diuels, they tende in a manner all to this ende, that we may be carefull to beware afore hand of their awaites and preparations, & furnish our selues with such weapons as are strong & sure enough to driue away euen the strongest enemies. For whereas Sathan is called the God and prince of the worlde, whereas he is named the strong armed man, the Spirit that hath power of the aire, and a roaring Lion: these descriptions serue to no other purpose, but to make vs more ware and watchfull, and readier to enter in battaile with him. Which is also sometime set out in expresse wordes. For Peter after he had sayde, that the diuel goeth about like a roaring Lyon, seeking whome hee may deuour, by and by addeth this exhortation, that we strongly resist him by Faith. And Paul after he had giuen warning that we wrastle not with flesh & bloud, but with the princes of the ayre, the powers of darkenesse, & spiritual wickednesses, by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great & daungerous a battaile. Wherefore let vs also apply all to this ende, that being warned how there doeth continually approch vpon vs an enimie, yea, an enemie that is in courage most hardy, in strength most mightie, in policies most sutle, in diligence and celeritie vnweariable, with all sortes of engins plenteously furnished, in skill of warre most readie, wee suffer not our selues by slouth & cowardise to be surprised, but on the other side with bolde and hardy mindes set our foote to resist him, and (because this warre is onely ended by Death) encourage our selues to continue. But specially knowing our owne weakenesse and vnskilfulnesse, let vs call vpon the helpe of God & enterprise nothing but vpon trust of him, for as much as it is in him onely to giue vs policie, strength, courage and armour.

14 And that wee ſhould be the more ſtirred vp & enforced ſo to doe, the Scripture warneth vs, that there are not one or two or a fewe enimies, but great armies that make warre with vs. For it is ſaid, that Mary Magdalene was deliuered from ſeuen diuels, wherewith ſhe was poſſeſſed. And Chriſt ſaith, that it is the ordinarie cuſtome, that if after a diuel be once caſt out, a man make the place open again, he bringeth ſeuen ſpirites worſe than himſelfe, & returneth into his poſſeſſion, finding it emptie. Yea it is ſaid that a whole legion beſieged one man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that wee muſt fight with an infinit multitude of enimies, leaſt deſpiſing the fewneſſe of them, we ſhould be more ſlack to enter in battaile, or thinking that we haue ſome reſpite in the meane time granted, we ſhould giue our ſelues to idleneſſe. Whet as many times Satan or the diuel is named in the ſingular number, thereby is meant that power of wickednes which ſtandeth againſt the kingdome of Iuſtice. For as the Church and the fellowſhip of Saints haue Chriſt to their head, ſo the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince, ỹ hath the chiefe authoritie among them. After which manner this is ſpoken. Go ye curſed into eternal fire that is prepared for the diuel & his angels.

15 Here alſo this ought to ſtirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the diuel, for that he is euerie where called the enimie of God and of vs. For if we haue regard of Gods glorie, as it is meete wee ſhould, then ought wee with all our force to bende our ſelues againſt him, that goeth about to extinguiſh it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdome of Chriſt as we ought, then muſt we needes haue an vnappeaſable warre with him that conſpireth the ruine thereof. Againe, if any care of our owne ſafetie doe touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lyeth in waite for the deſtruction of it. Such a one is he deſcribed in the third Chapter of Geneſis where he leadeth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honour, & throweth man himſelfe headlong into deſtruction. Such a one alſo is he ſet forth in the Euangeliſtes, where he is called an enimie, and is ſaid to ſcatter tares, to corrupt the ſeede of eternall life. In ſumme, that which Chriſt teſtifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherer, and a lyer, wee find by experience in all his doings. For he aſſaileth the trueth of God with lyes, obſcureth the light with darkneſſe, entangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiſeth vp hatreds, kindleth contentions and ſtrifes, doeth all things to this end to ouerthrow the kingdome of God, and drowne men with himſelfe in eternall deſtruction. Whereby appeareth, that he is of nature froward, ſpitefull and malicious. For needes muſt there be great frowardnes in that wit, that is made to aſſaile the glorie of God & ſaluation of men. And that doth Iohn ſpeake of in his Epiſtle, when he writeth, that he ſinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine & principal workeman of all malice and wickedneſſe.

The malice of Satan being ſuch as it is, vve muſt haue vnappeaſeable vvarre vvith him.

Mat. 13. 28.
Iohn. 8. 44.

16 But foraſmuch as the diuel was created by God, let vs remember that this malice which wee aſſigne in his nature, is not by creation, but by deprauation. For whatſoeuer damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himſelfe by his owne reuolting and fall. Which the ſcripture therefore giueth vs vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, wee should ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest from him. For this reason doth Christ say that Satan speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lyes, and addeth a cause why, for that he stode not still in the truth. Now when he saith that he stood not still in the truth, he sheweth that once he had bene in the truth. And when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this frō him, that he can not lay that fault to God whereof he himselfe is cause to himselfe. Although these thinges be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose, to deliuer the maiestie of God from all sclaunder. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning deuils? Many perhaps doe grudge, that the Scripture doeth not orderly and distinctly in many places set foorth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof But because these thinges do nothing pertaine to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholy, yet to bee but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not beseeming for ỹ holy ghost to feed curiositie with vaine histories without any fruit: and wee see that it was the Lordes purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but ỹ which we should learne to edification. Therefore, least we our selues should tarie long vpon thinges superfluous, let vs be content shortly to knowe thus much concerning the nature of Deuils, ỹ at the first creation they were the Angels of God: but by swaruing out of kinde, they both destroyed themselues and are become instruments of destruction to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to be knowen, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude. God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paul naming the elect Angels, doth without doubt secretely by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

That Satan stubbornely resisteth God, it is by Gods owne sufferance: but the will of God disposeth the effects which come from Satan, and turneth them to good.

17 As for the discorde & strife that we say is betweene God & Satan, we must so take it that still we holde this for certaine, that he can doe nothing but by the wil & sufferance of God. For we read in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receiue his cōmandementes, & durst not go forward to do any enterprise til he had obteined licence. So when Achab to be deceiued he tooke vpon him that he would be the Spirit of lying in the mouth of all the Prophets, & so being sent of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the euill spirite of the Lord ỹ tormented Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sins of the wicked king were punished. And in an other place it is written, ỹ the plagues were laid vpon ỹ Ægyptians by ỹ euill angels. According to these particular examples Paul doth generally testifie, ỹ the blinding of ỹ wicked is the worke of God, wheras before he had called it the working of Satan. It is euident therefore ỹ Satan is vnder the power of God, & so gouerned by his authoritie ỹ he is compelled to doe him seruice. Now when we say that Satā resisteth God, ỹ the works of Satan disagre with the workes of God, wee doe therewithall affirme that this disagrement and strife hangeth vppon the sufferance of God. I speake not nowe of his will, nor of his endeuor, but of the effect onely. For sith the deuill is wicked of nature, he is not enclined to obey the will of God, but is wholy caried to ſtubborneſſe and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himſelfe and of his owne wickednesſe, that of deſire and purpoſe he withſtandeth God. And by this wickednesſe he is ſtirred vp to the enterpriſing of thoſe things that he knoweth to be moſt againſt God. But becauſe God holdeth him faſt tyed & reſtrained with th bridle of his power, he executeth onely thoſe things that are granted him from God. And ſo doth he obey his creator whether he wil or no, becauſe he is conſtrained to apply his ſeruice whitherſoeuer God compelleth him.

18 Nowe becauſe God boweth the vncleane Spirites hither and thither as pleaſeth him, he ſo tempereth this gouernement, that they exerciſe the faithfull with battell, they ſet vpon them out of ambuſhes, they aſſaile them with inuaſions, they preſſe them with fighting, and oftentimes weary them, trouble them, make them affraide, and ſometime wound them, but neuer ouercome nor oppreſſe them. But the wicked they ſubdue and draw away, they raigne vpon their ſoules & bodies, & abuſe them as bondſlaues to all miſcheuous doings As for the faithfull, becauſe they are vnquieted of ſuch enimies, therefore they heare theſe exhortations. Do not giue place to the diuel The diuel your enimie goeth about as a roaring lyon, ſeeking whom he may deuoure, whom reſiſt ye being ſtrong in faith, and ſuch like. Paul confeſſeth that he himſelfe was not free from this kinde of ſtrife, when he ſaith, that for a remedie to tame pride, the Angel of Satan was giuen to him by whom he might be humbled. This exerciſe therefore is common to all the children of God. But becauſe that ſame promiſe of the breaking of Sathans head, perteineth generally to Chriſt, and to all his members, therefore I ſay, that the faithfull can neuer be ouercome nor oppreſſed by him. They are many times ſtriken downe, but they are neuer ſo aſtonnied withall, but that they recouer themſelues. They fall downe many times with violence of ſtrokes, but they are after raiſed vp againe: they are wounded, but not deadly. Finally, they ſo labour in all the courſe of their life that in ỹ end they obteine the victorie: but I ſpeake not this of euery doing of theirs. For we know that by the iuſt vengeance of God Dauid was for a time giuen ouer to Satan, by his motion to number the people: and not without cauſe Paul ſaith there is hope of pardon, although any haue beene entangled with the ſnares of the diuel. Therfore in another place the ſame Paul ſaith, that the promiſe aboue alleaged is begon in this life, wherein we muſt wraſtle, and is performed after our wreſtling ended: when he ſaith, the God of peace ſhall ſhortly beate downe Satan vnder your feete. This victorie hath alway fully beene in our head Chriſt, becauſe the Prince of the worlde had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doeth now partly appeare, and ſhall be perfited, when being vnclothed of our fleſh by which wee are yet ſubiect to weakeneſſe, we ſhall be full of the power of the Holy ghoſt. In this maner when the kingdome of Chriſt is raiſed vp and aduaunced, Satan with his power falleth downe, as the Lord himſelfe ſaith. I ſawe Satan fall as a lightning downe from heauen. For by this aunſwere hee confirmeth that which the Apoſtles had reported of the power of his preaching. Againe, When the Prince poſſeſſeth his own pallace, all things that hee poſſeſſeth are in peace, but when there cõmeth a stronger, he is throwen out, &c. And to this end Christ in dying ouercame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed vpon al his armies, that they shoulde not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would euery moment an hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weakenesse, and what is his furious strength) how could we stand, yea neuer so little time against his manifold & continual assaults, but being supported by the victorie of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the Diuel to raigne ouer the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked & vnbeleeuing to gouerne, whom God doth not vouchsafe to haue reckened in his flock. For it is said, that he possesseth this world without controuersie til he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that hee doth blinde all them that beleeue not the Gospel. Againe, that he performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and worthelie, for all the wicked are the vessels of his wrathe. Therefore, to whome should they be rather subiect than to the minister of Gods vengeance? Finally, they are said to be of their Father the Diuel, because as the faithfull are hereby knowen to be the children of God, because they beare his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children.

Diuels are really subsisting spirites, and not affections only, or perturbations of the mind.

19 As wee haue before confuted that trifling Philosophie concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing else but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth vp in the mindes of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly saye, that Diuels are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations of the mind, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may wee shortly do, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, and those plaine enough vppon this point. First, where the vncleane Spirites are called, Angels, Apostataes, which haue swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the verie names doe sufficiently expresse, that they are not motions or affections of mindes, but rather in deede as they be called mindes or Spirites endued with sense and vnderstanding. Likewise, whereas both Christ and Iohn doe compare the children of God with the children of the Diuell: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of the Diuel signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somwhat more plainly, that the diuell sinneth from the beginning. Likewise, when Iude bringeth in Michael the Archangel fighting with the diuel, doutles he setteth against the good Angel an euil and rebellious Angel. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the historie of Iob, that Sathan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most plaine of all are those places that make mention of the punishment which they begin to feele by the iudgement of God, and specially shall feele at the resurrection. Sonne of Dauid, why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Againe, Goe ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the Diuel and his Angels. Againe, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into cheines of darkenesse to be kept vnto damnation, &c. Howe fonde should these speeches be, that the Diuels are ordeined to eternal iudgement, that fire is prepared for them, that they they are now alreadie tormented and vexed by the glorie of Christ: if there were no diuels at all? But because the matter needeth no disputation among them that beleeue the worde of the Lord, & little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vaine students of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is newe: I suppose I haue performed that which I purposed, that is, that the godly mindes should be furnished against such fond errors, wherewith vnquiet men do trouble both themselues and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they thinke they haue none to stande against them, should waxe more slowe & vnprouided to resist.

20 In the meane time let it not be wearisome vnto vs, in this so beautiful a stage to take godly delight of the manifest and ordinarie workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere alreadie saide, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to remember, that what way soeuer we turne our eyes, all that we see are the workes of God, & with godly consideration to wey for what ende God did make them. Therefore that wee may conceiue by Faith so much as behoueth vs to know of God, it is good first of all to learne the historie of the creation of the world, how it is shortly rehearsed by Moses, and afterwarde more largely set out by holy men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it wee shall learne that God by the power of his worde and Spirite created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought foorth all liuing creatures and things without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable varietie of things, to euerie thing he gaue the proper nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidings, and where al things are subiect to corruption, yet hath he so prouided, that of all sortes some shalbe preserued to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secrete meanes, and powreth nowe and then, as it were a newe liuelinesse into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to encrease by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not dye together. So hath he marueilously garnished the heauen & the earth, with so absolutely perfect plentie, varietie and beautie of all things as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stuffe, last of all howe in framing man and adorning him with so goodly beautie, & with so many and so great giftes, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the worlde, let it suffice to haue once againe touched these fewe things by the way. For it is better, as I haue alreadie warned the readers, to fetch a fuller vnderstanding of this matter out of Moses and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conueyed the historie of the worlde by writing to perpetuall memorie.

The first thing that wee are to weigh attentiuely when we behold heauen and earth is, what vertues of God there are presented to be seene in creatures.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much a doe in disputing, to what end the consideration of the workes of God ought to tende, or to what marke it ought to be applied: forasmuch as in other places alreadie a great part of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in fewe wordes be ended. Truely, if we were minded to set out as it is worthie, worthie, how inestimable wisedome, power, iustice, and goodnes of God appeareth in the framing of the worlde, no eloquence, no garnishment of speech could suffice the largenes of so great a matter. And no doubt it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupyed in so holy a meditation, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite riches of his wisedome, iustice, bountie and power, we should not runne ouer them, as it were with a flying eye, or with a vaine wandring looke, as I may so call it, but that wee should with consideration rest long vpon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeate them with remembrance. But because wee are nowe busied in that kinde that pertaineth to order of teaching, it is meete that we omit those things that require long declamations. Therefore, to be shott, let the readers know that then they haue conceiued by faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniuersal rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselues, that they may therwith be throughly moued in their harts. The first of those we do when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was to place & aptly set in so wel disposed order the multitude of ỹ starres that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautiful to beholde: to set & fasten some of them in their standings so that they cannot moue, and to other some, to graunt a freecourse, but so that in mouing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all, that it may deuide in measnre the dayes and nightes, monethes, yeares, and seasons of the yeare, and to bring this inequalitie of dayes which we daily see to such a tempered order, that it hath no confusiō. Likewise, when we mark his power in susteining so great a body, in gouerning the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, & such like. For these fewe examples do sufficiently declare, what it is to recorde the power of God in the creation of the world. For else, if I should trauell as I saide, to expresse it all in wordes, I should neuer make an end, forasmuch as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisedome, as there be formes of things in the world, yea, as there be things either great or small.

The fruit of our considering the creatures of God must be the feeling of his goodnes towrard our selues, and our growing thereby in faith, hope, & godlinesse.

22 Now remaineth the other part which commeth neerer to faith, that while we consider that God hath ordained all things for our guard & safetie, & therewithal do feele his power & grace in our selues, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby stirre vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, praise and loue of him. Nowe, as I haue before said, God himselfe hath shewed in the verie order of creation, that for mans sake he created all things. For it is not without cause that he deuided the making of the world into sixe dayes, whereas it had ben as easie for him in one moment to haue in all pointes accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to ỹ end of it. But then it pleased him to shew his prouidence & fatherly carefulnes toward vs, that before he made man he prepared al that he foresaw should be profitable for him and fit for this preſeruation. How great vnthankfulneſſe nowe ſhould it be to doubt, whether this good Father do care for vs, whome we ſee to haue beene carefull for vs ere that we were borne? How wicked were it to tremble for diſtruſt leaſt his goodnes would at any time leaue vs deſtitute in neceſſitie, which we ſee was diſplayed for vs being not yet borne, with great aboundance of all good things? Beſide that we heare by Moſes that by his liberalitie all that euer is in the world is made ſubiect to vs. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an emptie name of gift. Therefore wee ſhall neuer lacke any thing, ſo far as it ſhalbe auailable for our preſeruation. Finally to make an end, ſo oft as we name God the creator of heauē & earth, let this come in our mindes withall, that the diſpoſition of all things which he hath created, is in his hand & power, & that we are his childrē whom he hath taken into his own charge & keeping to foſter & bring vp: that we may looke for al good things at his hand, & aſſuredly, that he will neuer ſuffer vs to lacke things needefull for our ſafetie, to the ende our hope ſhould hang vpon none other: that whatſoeuer we deſire, our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing ſoeuer we receiue profit, wee may acknowledge it to be his benefite, and confeſſe it with thanks giuing: that being allured with ſo great ſweetneſſe of his goodneſſe and liberalitie, we may ſtudie to loue & honour him with all our heart.

Gen.1.26,1. & 9,2.

The xv. Chapter.

VVhat a one man vvas created: vvherein there is entreated of the powers of the ſoule, of the image of God, of free vvill, & of the firſt integritie of nature.

NOwe muſt we ſpeake of the creation of man, not onely becauſe he is among all the workes of God the moſt noble & moſt excellent example of his iuſtice, wiſedome & goodnes: but alſo becauſe as wee haue ſaid in the beginning, we cannot plainly & perfectly know God, vnleſſe we haue withall a mutuall knowledge of our ſelues. Although the ſame knowledge be of two ſorts, the one to knowe what we were created at the firſt beginning, the other to know what our eſtate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to ſmall profit for vs to know our creation, vnleſſe we did alſo in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption & deformitie of our nature:) yet at this time wee will be content with deſcription of our nature when it was pure. And before we deſcend to this miſerable eſtate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we muſt take heede that in preciſely declaring only the natural euils of man, we ſeeme not to impute them to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh her ſelfe to haue ſufficient defenſe in this colour, if it may lay for herſelfe that whatſoeuer fault ſhe hath, the ſame did after a certaine maner proceede from God, & ſticketh not if ſhe be accuſed, to quarel with God, & to lay the fault vpon him whereof ſhe is worthily accuſed. And they that would ſeeme to ſpeake ſomewhat more reuerently of the maieſty of God, yet do willingly ſeeke to excuſe their owne wickedneſſe, by nature, not conſidering that therein though not openly they blame God alſo, to whoſe reproch it ſhould fall if it were proued ỳ there is any fault in nature.

Mans firſt excellencie doth ſtop their mouthes vvhich blame God vvith mens euils, & his being made ſo excellent out of the earth, doth both humble him, & commend his maker.

Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the wayes to escape, whereby she thinketh the blame of her own euils may any way be put off from her, we must diligently trauel to meete with this mischiefe. Therefore we must so handle the calamitie of mankind that we cut off al excuse, & deliuer the iustice of God frō all accusation. Afterward in place conuenient we shal see how far men be now from that pureneſſe that was giuen to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth & claye, a bridle was put vpon his pride, for there is no greater absurditie, than for them to glorie in their excellencie, that doe not onely dwell in a cotage of clay, but also are themselues in part but earth & ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsafe to giue life vnto an earthen vessel, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortall Spirit, Adam might iustly glorie in so great liberalitie of his maker.

The soule of men many wayes proued to be a spirituall, & immortall substance.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule & body, & by the name of soule I meane an immortall essence, and yet created, which is the nobler parte of him. Sometime it is called the Spirite. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirite are ioyned together, they differ one from the other in signification, yet when Spirite is set by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, sayth that then the spirite returneth to him that gaue it. And Christ commending his Spirite to his Father, and Stephen his Spirite to Christ doe both meane none other thing, but that when the Soule is deliuered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirit, because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essence: both the thing it selfe, and all the Scripture sheweth, that they doe too grosly erre. True it is, that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to bee, they waxe dull, yea, because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darkeneſſe, so that they doe not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliue after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkeneſſe, but that they be touched with some feeling of immortalitie. Surely the conscience which discerning betweene good and euill, aunswereth the iudgement of God, is an vndoubted signe of an immortall Spirite. For how coulde a motion without essence attaine to come to the iudgement seate of God, and throwe it selfe into feare by finding her owne guiltineſſe? For the bodie is not mooued with feare of a Spirituall paine, but that falelth onely vppon the Soule. Whereby it followeth, that the soule hath an essence. Moreouer the verie knowledge of God doeth prooue that the soules which ascend vp aboue the world are immortall: for a vanishing liuelineſſe were not able to attaine to the fountaine of life. Finally, forasmuch as so many excellent giftes wherewith mans mind is endued, doe crie out that there is some diuine thing engrauen in it, there are euen so many testimonies of an immortal essence. For that sense which is in brute beastes, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimbleneſſe of the mind of man which veweth the heauen and earth and secretes of nature, & com-

prehending all ages in vnderstanding & memorie, digesteth euery thing in order, & gathereth things to come by things past, doeth plainly shewe that there lieth hidden in man a certaine thing seuerall from the body. We conceiue by vnderstanding the inuisible God and Angels, which the body cannot do. We knowe things that be right, iust, and honest, which are hidden from the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the spirit is the seat of this vnderstanding. Yea, and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witnesse of immortality, forasmuch as it doth not onely minister vnto vs, thoughtes of those things that neuer were done, but also foreknowings of things for time to come. I touch these things shortly which euen prophane writers do excellently set out with more gorgeous garnishment of wordes: but with the godly readers a simple putting in minde of them shal be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe seuerall from the bodie, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death wee remoue out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put of that which is corruptible, that finally at the last day we may receiue rewarde euery man as he hath behaued himself in his body. For these places and other that we doe ech where commonly light vpon, doe not onely manifestly distinguish the soule frō the body, but also in giuing to the soule the name of man do shewe that it is the principal part. Now whereas Paul doth exhort the faithful to clense themselues from al defiling of the flesh & the spirit, he maketh two partes of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sin. And Peter where he calleth Christ ỹ shepeheard & bishop of soules, should haue spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conueniently stand together which he saith of the eternal saluation of soules, & where he biddeth to clense our soules, and where he saith that euill desires do fight against the soule, & where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues sayth, that the Pastors do watch that they may yeld account for our soules, vnlesse it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witnesse to his owne soule, because it could not be called in iudgement before God vnlesse it were subiect to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the words of Christ, when he biddeth vs to feare him which after that he hath killed the bodie, can throwe the soule into hell fier. Nowe where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth distinguish the Fathers of our flesh from God, which is the only Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirme the essence of soules. Moreouer, if the soules remained not aliue being deliuered from ỹ prisons of their bodies, Christ should verie fondly haue brought in the soule of Lazarus ioying in the bosome of Abraham, & againe the soule of the rich man subiect to horrible torments. The same thing doeth Paul confirme, when he teacheth that wee wander abroade from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that wee enioy his presence being out of the flesh. But, because I wil not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I wil adde only this out of Luke, that it is reckened among the errours of the Sadduces, that they did not beleeue that there were any Spirites and Angels.

Man vvas created like to God, not in the fashion of his body, nor because he vvas framed at the first according to the shape vvhich the sonne of God shoulde aftervvards take vpon him: nor because he vvas like vnto Christ, vvho is properly Gods image, but for that in his first integritie he resembled the excellencie of his Creator.

Gen.1.27.

3 Also a strong proofe hereof may be gathered of this, where it is sayde, that man is create like to the image of God. For although the glorie of God do appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no doubt that the proper seate of the image of God is in the soule. I do not denie that as concerning our outward shape, in asmuch as the same doth distinguish & seuer vs from brute beastes, we do also therein more neerely approch to God than they: neither will I much stande against them which thinke that this is to be accounted of the image of God, that where all other liuing creatures do groueling wise behold the ground, to man is giuen an vpright face, & he is cõmanded to looke vpon the heauen, & to aduaunce his countenance toward the starres: so that this remaine certaine, that the image of God which appeareth or shineth in these outward signes, is spiritual. For Osiander (whome his writings declare to haue beene in fickle imaginations fondly wittie) referring the image of God without difference, as well to the body as to the soule, mingleth heauen & earth together. For he saith, that the Father, the Sonne, & the holy ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam had stand without falling, yet should Christ haue become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appointed for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But wher shall he find that Christ is the image of the Spirite? I grant in deed that in the person of the Mediator shineth the glorie of the whole godhead. But how shal the eternal word be called the image of the Spirit whom he goeth before in order? Finally, it ouerthroweth the distinction betweene the Sonne & the holy Ghost, if he do here call him his image. Moreouer I would faine learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy ghost in the flesh that he tooke vpon him, & by what markes & features he doth expresse the likenesse of him.

Gen.1.26.

And wheras this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe, which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osianders inuention be beleeued, man was fashioned only after the figure & paterne of Christ in that he was man, & so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, whereas the scripture in a farre other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their suttle inuention is more colourable which do thus expound it, ỹ Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the only image of God. But that exposition also is not sound. Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image & Likenes, while they seeke a difference between those two words, where is no difference at all, saying, that this word Likenes is added to expound the other. First we knowe that among the Hebrues such repetitions are common, wherin they expresse one thing twise: and in the thing it self there is no doubt, but that man is therfore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Wherby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which do so suttlely argue about the wordes, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of ỹ soule, es Demuth, that is to say, Likenesse in the qualities, or what other thing soeuer it be that they teach. For whereas God determined to creat man after his own image, this being somewhat darkly spoken, he doth as by way of explication repeate it in this saying, After his likenesse: as if he woulde haue said, that he would make man, in whom he would represent himselfe as in an image, because of the markes of likenesse grauen in him. And therfore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doth repeate ỹ image of God twise, leauing out the name of Likenes. And it is a trifling obiection that Osiander maketh, that not a part of man, or the soule onely with the giftes thereof, is called the image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuẽ him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I say, wil all readers that haue their sound wit iudge this obiection. For where whole man is called mortall, yet is not the soule therby made subiect to mortalitie. Again, where he is called a liuing creature endued with reason, it is not therby ment, that the body hath reason & vnderstanding. Although therfore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconuenient, that man in respect of the soul be called the image of God, albeit I holde still that principle which I haue before stablished, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellencie, whereby the nature of man hath preeminence among al kind of liuing creatures. Therefore in that worde is noted the integritie that man had when he was endued with right vnderstanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, & all his senses gouerned in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truely resemble the excellencie of his Creator. And though the principall seate of the image of God were in the mind & heart, or in the soule & the powers thereof, yet was there no part of man, not so much as the body, wherein did not some sparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is that also in all the partes of the worlde, there doe shine some resemblance of the glorie of God: whereby wee may gather that where it is saide, that his Image is in man, there is in so saying a certaine secret comparison, that aduaunceth man aboue al other creatures, & doth as it were seuer him from the common sort. Neither is it to be denyed, that the Angels were create after the likenesse of God, sith (as Christ himself testifieth) our chief perfection shal be to become like vnto them. But not without cause doeth Moses by that peculiar title set forth the grace of God toward vs, specially, where he compareth onely visible creatures with man. Mat. 22. 30.

4 But yet it seemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, vnlesse it plainlier appeare in what qualities man excelleth: & wherby he ought to be counted a glasse, resembling the glorie of God. But ỹ can be by no other thing better knowen, than by the repairing of mans corrupted nature. First it is doutlesse, that when Adam fel from his estate, he was by that departure estranged from God. Wherfore although we grant that the Image of God was not altogether defaced & blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that al that remaineth, is but vgly deformitie. Therefore the beginning of recouerie of safetie for vs, is in that restoring which we obtain by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the second Adam, because he restored vs vnto true and perfect integritie. For although where Paul doth in comparison set the quickening spirit that Christ giueth to the faithful, against the liuing soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth forth the 1. Cor. 15. 14.

The excellencie wherein man resembled God, consisteth in knowledge, and holines, not in the number of the faculties of his mind, nor in the power which God gaue him aboue other creatures more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take Col. 3. 10. away this other principall point, that this is the ende of our regeneration, that Christ should newe fashion vs to the image of God. Therefore in another place he teacheth, that the new man is renued according to the image Eph. 4. 24. of him that created him. Wherewith agreeth this saying: put on the newe man which is created according to God. Nowe it is to be seene what Paul doth principally comprehend vnder this renuing. First he speaketh of know ledge, and after of pure righteousnesse and holinesse. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the mind, in the vprightnesse of heart, and soundnesse of all the partes. For although I grant that this is a figuratiue phrase of speech to set the part for the whole:

yet cannot this principle be ouerthrowen, that that thing which is ỹ chiefe in the renuing of the image of God, was also the principall in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in an other place he tea-
2. Cor. 3. 18. cheth, that we beholding the glorie of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Now do we see how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to the which we being fashioned are so restored, that in true godlinesse, righteousnes, pureneſſe and vnderstanding, wee beare the image of God. Which principle being established, Osianders imagination of the shape of our body doeth easily vanish away of it selfe. Whereas the man alone is in Paul called the image and glorie of God, and the woman is ex-
1. Cor. 11. 7. cluded from that degree of honour, it appeareth by the rest of the text, that the same is to be applyed only to ciuil order of policy. But that vnder the name of image, wherof we speak, is comprehended al that belongeth to the spiritual & eternal life, I thinke it be alreadie sufficiently proued. And the Iohn. 1. 4. same thing doth Iohn confirme in other words: saying, that the light which was from the beginning in the eternall worde of God was the light of men.
For where his purpose was to praise the singular grace of God, wherby man excelleth all liuing creatures, to seuer him from the common sort, because he hath atteined no common life, but ioyned with the light of vnderstanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the image of God.
Therefore sith the image of God is the vncorrupted excellencie of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterward was so corrupted & almost defaced, that nothing remaineth since that ruine, but dis-ordered, mangled, & filthily spotted: yet the same doth in some part appear in the elect, in so much as they are regenerate, & shal obtain her full bright-nes in heauen. But that we may know on what parts it consisteth, it shall be good to entreate of the powers of the soule. For that speculatiue deuise of Lib. de Tri. 10. De ciui. dei. 11. Augustine is not sound, where he saith, that the soule is a glasse of the Trini-tie, because that there are in it vnderstanding, will, and memorie. Neither is their opinion to be approued, which set the image of God in the power of dominion giuen vnto him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed lord and possessor of all things, whereas in deede the image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, & is an inward good gift of the soule.

5 But before I go any further, it is needfull that I meete with the doting

errour of the Manichees, which Seruetto hath attempted to bring in againe in this age. Where it is saide, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule did conuey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie euen shortly to shewe how many grosse and foule absurdities this diueliish errour draweth with it. For if the soule be by deriuation part of the essence of God, it shall followe that the nature of God is subiect, not only to change and passions, but also to ignorance, euil lustes, weakenesse, and all kinds of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do tosse and diuersly drowe his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yeldeth as vanquished euen to small tentations, & wee knowe that the soule it selfe is the sinke & receiuer of all filthinesse, al which things we must ascribe to the nature of God, if wee graunt that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secrete inflowing of godhead. Who woulde not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truely in deede doeth Paul alledge out of Aratus, that we are the ofspring of God, but in qualitie & not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly giftes. But in the meane time, to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that euery man doth possesse a part of it, is too much madnesse. Therefore wee must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created than the Angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into another, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirite of man came from God, & in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not foorthwith to be saide, that it was taken out of his substance And in this point also Ostander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly errour, not acknowledging the image of God to be in man without his essential iustice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirite could not make vs like vnto him selfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially poure himselfe into vs. With whatsoeuer colour many do go about to disguise these deceits, yet shal they neuer so beguile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wittes, but that they will easily see that these things sauour of the Manichees error. And where saint Paul entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be redily gathered out of his words, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his spirit. For he saith, that in beholding the glorie of Christ, wee are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spirite of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs not of one substance with God.

Man was not made in the likenes of god because his soule was a portion of the godhead, or because the essentiall iustice of God was poured into him. Gen. 2 7.

Act. 17. 18.

2. Cor. 3. 18.

6 It were but folly to borrow of the Philosophers a definition of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortal substance. In deede some other also, that is ỹ Socratians, doe touch it, but so as none doth plainly teach ỹ to other, which himself was not persuaded But therfore is Plato of ỹ better iudgement, because he doth in ỹ soul consider ỹ image of God. Some other do so bind the powers & vertues of the soule to this present life, that being out of the body they leaue to it nothing. Now we haue alreadie taught by the scripture, that it is a bodiles substance:

The doctrine of Philosophers concerning the nature & powers of the Soule.

now must we adde that although properly it is not cõprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, & doth there dwel as in a house, not only to minister life to al the parts of the body, & to make the instruments thereof meete & fitly seruing for the actions that they are appointed for, but also to bear the chief office in gouerning the life of man, & that not onely about the dueties in this earthly life, but also to stir vs vp to the seruice of God. Although this latter point in this corruption is not plainly perceiued, yet euen in the vices themselues there remaine emprinted some leauings therof. For whence commeth it but of shame, that men haue so great care what be reported of them? And whence commeth shame, but of regard of honestie? Whereof the beginning & cause is, that they vnderstand that they are naturally born to obserue Iustice, in which perswasion is enclosed the seede of religion. For as without all controuersie man was made to meditation of the heauenly life: so is it certaine, that the knowledge thereof was engrauen in his soule. And surely man should want the principall vse of his vnderstanding, if hee should be ignorant of his own felicitie, whereof the perfection is, that he be ioyned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire thereunto. And so the more that euery man studieth to approch vnto God, the more he thereby proueth himselfe to be endued with reason. As for them that would haue diuers soules in man, that is, a feeling soule, & a reasonable soule, although they seeme to say somwhat by reason proueable, yet because there is no stedfast certaintie in their reasons, wee must reiect thẽ, vnlesse we listed to accomber our selues in things trifling and vnprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betweene the instrumental motions & the part of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it self did not also dissent from it self, and some deuises of it doe striue with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as that troublesomnes proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather therby, that there are two soules, because the powers of ẏ soule do not agree together, in such wel framed order as they ought. But as for more suttle disputation of the powers themselues, I leaue that to the Philosophers. A simple definitiõ shall suffise vs for edification of godlines. I grant that the things ẏ they teach are true, & not only pleasant but also profitable to be knowen, & wel gathered of them, & I forbid not such as are desirous to learn to studie them. First therfore I admit that there are fiue senses, which Plato better liked to cal instruments, whereby all obiects are powred into Common sense, as into a place of receit: then followeth Phantasie, which iudgeth those things one from other that Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belongeth the vniuersal iudgement of things: last, is the Vnderstanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiet viewing beholdeth all those things, that Reason is wont to discourse vpon, and consider. And to the Vnderstanding mind, Reason & Phansie, which are the three powers of the soule, that rest in knowledge, there do answere three other that doe rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the partes whereof are to couet those things that the Vnderstanding mind and Reason do lay before it: the power of Anger, which catcheth those things that Reason and Phansie do minister vnto it.

In Thæteto.

Arist. Ethicorum li.1. ca.vlt. Item li.6.ca.2.

The

The power of Desiring, which taketh hold of these things that phansie and sense presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at the least likely to be true, yet because I feare ỳ they shal more entangle vs with obscurenes, than further vs, I think it best to ouerpasse them. If any man list otherwise to diuide the powers of the soule, & to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it self, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meane directed, & to call the other the power of vnderstanding, which is by it self partaker of reason, I am not much against it, neither wil I confute this opinion, ỳ there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, vnderstanding, & Appetite. But let vs rather choose a diuision, that is within the capacitie of al men, which cannot be had of the Philosophers. For they whē they meane to speak most plainly, do diuide the soule into Appetite & Vnderstanding, but either of these they make of two sorts. Vnderstanding, they say, is somtime contemplatiue, which being contented with only knowlege, hath no mouing of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, wit. Somtime they say it is practicall, which by conceiuing of good or euil doth diuersly moue the Wil. And appetite they do diuide into Wil & Lust. Wil they cal that, when Appetite which they cal horme obeyeth to reason, & Lust they call that, when the appetite shaking off the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alway they imagine reason to be that in man, wherby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

7 But we are constrained somwhat to swarue from this maner of teaching, becaus the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fal, do wrongfully confound the two very diuerse states of man. Let vs therfore thus think of it, ỳ there are in the soule of man two parts, which shal serue at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Vnderstanding & Will. And let it be the office of vnderstanding, to discerne between obiects, or things set before it, as ech of them shall seeme worthie to be liked or misliked: and the office of Will, to choose & followe that which vnderstanding saith to be good, & to refuse & flie that which vnderstanding shal disalow. Let vs not here be staied at all with the nice subtleties of Aristotle, that ỳ mind hath of it self no mouing, but that it is choise which moueth it, which choise he calleth the desiring vnderstanding. But to the end we be not entangled with superfluous questions, let this suffise vs, ỳ the Vnderstanding is as it were the guide & gouernour of the soule, & that Wil hath alwaies regard to the appointment of Vnderstanding, & abideth the iudgement therof in her desires. According wherevnto, Aristotle himself hath truely said, ỳ fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the vnderstanding mind is affirming & denying. Now how certeine the gouernment of Vnderstanding is to direct the Wil: that we wil consider in an other place. Here we meane only to shewe that there can be found no power in the soule but that may wel be said to belong to the one of these two members. And in this sort vnder Vnderstanding wee comprehend Sense, which other do so distinguish, that they say Sense is enclined to pleasure, for which Vnderstanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the appetite of sense is Concupiscence & Lust, the affection of vnder-vnderstanding is Will. Againe, in steede of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Will, which is more commonly vsed.

Two principall partes of the soule, vnderstanding, & vvill.

Eth. lib. ca. 2.

The perfection of mans vnderstanding and will, in his first creation.

8 God therefore hath furnished the soule of man with an vnderstanding mind, whereby he might discerne good from euil, & right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers haue called this directing part the Guider. To this he hath adioyned Will, to which belongeth choise. With these noble gifts the first state of man excelled, so that he not only had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisedome, & iudgement, for the gouernement of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euen to God & to eternall felicitie Then to haue choise added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, & order all the instrumental motions, and that so the Wil might be altogether agreable to the gouernement of reason. In this Integritie, man had freewil, whereby if he would he might haue attained eternall life For here it is out of place to moue question of the secret predestination of God: because we are not now about to discusse what might haue chanced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therfore might haue stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his wil was pliable to either side, & there was not giuen him constancie to continue, therefore he so easily fel. Yet his choise of good & euil was free. And not that only, but also in his vnderstãding mind, & in his wil was most great vprightnesse, & al his instrumental partes orderly framed to obedience, vntil by destroying himself he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hence commeth it that al the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, & for strong ioynts in an vnioynted ouerthrow. This principle they helde, that man could not be a liuing creature endued with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good & euil: and they considered, that otherwise al the difference should be taken away betweene vertues & vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his own aduise. Thus farre had they saide well if there had beene no change in man, which change because they knewe not of, it is no maruaile though they confound heauen and earth together. But as for them which professing themselues to be the disciples of Christ, do yet seeke for freewill in man, that hath bin lost & drowned in spiritual destruction, they in going meane betweene the Philosophers opinions & heauenly doctrine are plainly deceiued, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these things we shal better speake in place fit for them: now onely this we haue to hold in mind, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posteritie euer since, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath frõ him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritance. For then al the partes of his soule were framed to right order, then stoode safe the soundnesse of his vnderstanding mind, & his will free to choose ỹ good. If any do obiect that it stood but in slippery state, because his power was but weake, I answere that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him al excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraine God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all. I grant such a nature had bin better, but therfore precisely to quarel with God, as though it had bin his duitie to haue giuen that vnto man, is too much vniustice, forasmuch as it was in his own choise to giue how much pleased him. But why he did not vpholde him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his own secret counsell: it is our part only to be so farre wise as with sobrietie we may. Man receiued in deed to be able if he woulde, but he had not to will that he might be able. For of this wil should haue followed stedfast continuance. Yet is he not excusable, which receiued so much that of his own wil he hath wrought his own destruction. And there was no necessitie to compel God to giue him any other than a meane wil & a fraile will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his own glorie.

De correp. & grat. ad Valentin. ca. 12.

The xvj. Chapter.

That God by his power doth nourish & maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, & by his prouidence doth gouerne all the parts thereof.

BVt it were verie fonde and bare to make God a creatour for a moment, which doth nothing since he hath once made an ende of his worke. And in this point principally ought wee to differ from the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the worlde, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the verie wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth, are compelled to rise vp vnto the Creator, yet hath faith a certaine peculiar maner by it self, whereby it giueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serueth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleaged, that wee doe not vnderstande but by faith, that the worlde was made by the worde of God. For vnlesse wee passe forwarde euen vnto his prouidence, wee doe not yet rightly conceiue what this meaneth, that God is the creator, howe soeuer wee do seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the flesh hath once set before it the power of God in the verie creation, it resteth there, and when it proceedeth furthest of all, it doeth nothing but wey and consider the wisedome, power, & goodnesse of the workeman in making such a peece of worke (which things doe of themselues offer and thrust themselues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine generall doing in preseruing and gouerning the same, vpon which dependeth the power of mouing. Finally it thinketh that the liuely force at the beginning put into all things by God, doeth suffice to sustein them. But faith ought to perce deeper, that is to say, whom he hath learned to be the creator of all things, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernor aud preseruer of them: and that, not by stirring with an vniuersall motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the partes thereof, but by susteyning, cherishing and caring for, with singular prouidence euery one of those things that hee hath created euen to the least sparowe. So Dauid after he had first saide that the worlde was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the worde of the Lorde (saith he) the heauens were stablished, and all the power thereof by the spirite of his mouth. By and by he addeth, The Lord looked downe vpon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that hee sayeth further to the same effect. For although they doe not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to bee beleeued, that God had care of mens matters, vnlesse he were the maker of the world, nor any man doth earnestly beleeue that God made the world, vnlesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doeth by good order conuey vs from the one to the other. Generally in deed both the Philosophers doe teach, and mens mindes doe conceiue that all partes of the world are quickened with the secret inspiration of God. But yet they attein not so farre as Dauid both himselfe proceedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying all things waite vpon thee, that thou maist giue them food in due season. Thou giuest it to them and they gather it. Thou openest thy hande and they are filled with good things. But if thou hide thy face, they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe, if thou send foorth thy Spirite, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea, although they agree to the saying of Paul, that we haue our beeing and are moued, and doe liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feeling of grace which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of Gods speciall care whereby alone his fatherly fauour is knowen.

Psal. 104 27.

We do iniury vnto God when we ascribe the workes of his prouidence vnto fortune, as also when we speake of nature working without the hand of God guiding her in euery worke.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be knowen, that the prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrarie to fortune and chaunces that happen by aduenture. Nowe forasmuch as it hath beene commonly beleeued in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a maner in al men, that al things happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue bene beleeued concerning Prouidence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among theeues or wilde beastes, if by winde sodenly rising hee suffer shipwracke on the sea, if hee be killed with the fall of a house or of a tree, if an other wandring in desert places finde remedie for his pouertie, if hauing beene tossed with the waues, he attaine to the hauen, if miraculously he escape but a finger breadth from death, all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduersitie the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoeuer is taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the haires of his head are numbred, wil seeke for a cause further of, & wil firmly beleeue that all chaunces are gouerned by the secret counsell of God. And as concerning things without life, this is to be thought, that although euery one of them haue his owne propertie naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so far, as they be directed by the present hand of God. They are therfore nothing else but instrumentes, whereby God continually poureth in so much effect as pleaseth him, & at his wil boweth & turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more maruellous or more glorious than of the Sunne. For besides y it giueth light to the whole world with his brightnes, howe great a thing is this that he cherisheth & quickeneth all liuing creatures with his heat? that he breatheth fruitfulnesse into the earth with his beames? that out of seedes warmed in the bosom of the ground, he draweth a budding greenesse, and susteining the same with new nourishments doth encrease & strengthen it, til it rise vp in stalkes? That he feedeth it with continual vapour til it growe to a flower, & from a flower to fruite? That then also with baking it, he bringeth it to ripenesse? That trees likewise & vines being warmed by him, do first bud & shoote forth branches, & after send out a flower, & of a flower do engender fruit? But the Lord, because he would claime the whole glorie of all these things to himself, made the light first to be, & the earth to be furnished with all kindes of hearbs & fruits before that he created the Sunne. A godly man therfore wil not make the Sunne to be either a principall or a necessarie cause of those things which were before the creation of ỹ sunne, but only an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, wheras he might leaue it & do all things as easily by himselfe. Then when wee read that the sunne stood stil two dayes in one degree at the prayer of Iesua, and that the shadow therof went back ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the sunne doth not daily so rise & go down by blind instinct of nature, but that he to renue the remembrance of his fatherly fauor toward vs, doth gouerne the course thereof. Nothing is more natural than spring tide to come immediatly after winter, Sommer after spring, & harueſt in course after Sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seene so great & so vnequall diuersitie, ỹ it may easily appeare that euery yere, moneth and day, is gouerned by a newe and special prouidence of God.

3 And truely God doth claime & wil haue vs giue vnto him an almightinesse, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, & as it were sleping, but waking, effectual, working & busied in continual doing. Nor such a one as is only a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if hee woulde commaund a riuer to flowe by his appointed chanels, but such a one as is bent & readie at al his particular mouings. For he is therfore called almightie, not because he can do & yet sitteth stil & doth nothing, or by generall instinct only continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but because he gouerning both heauen & earth, by his prouidence so ordereth all things that nothing chanceth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is said in the Psalme, that he doth whatsoeuer he will, therein is meant his certaine & determined wil. For it were verie fond to expound the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning & cause of al mouing: whereas ỹ faithful ought rather in aduersitie to ease themselues with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance & commandement of God, because they are vnder his hande. If then the gouernment of God doe so extende to all his works, it is a verie childish cauilation to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraud God of his glorie than themselues of a most profitable doctrine, whosoeuer doe restraine the prouidence of God within so narrow bounds, as if he suffred al things to be caried with an vngouerned course, according to a perpetual law of nature. For nothing wer more miserable than man if he should be left subiect to euery motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth, & the waters. Beſide that by that meane the ſingular goodnes of god towards euery man is too much vnhonorably diminiſhed. Dauid crieth out that babes yet hanging on their mothers breaſts are eloquent enough to magnifie the glorie of God, becauſe euen ſo ſoone as they be come out of the wombe, they finde foode prepared for them by his heauenly care. This is in deede generally true, ſo that yet our eyes & ſenſes ouerpaſſe not that vnmarked which experience plainly ſheweth, that ſome mothers haue full & plentiful breaſts, ſome other almoſt drie, as it pleaſeth God to feede one more liberally, & another more ſcarcely. But they which giue the due praiſe to the almightines of God, doe receiue double profite thereby, the one that he hath ſufficiently large abilitie to do them good, in whoſe poſſeſſion are both heauen & earth, & to whoſe beck all creatures do attend vpon, to yeld themſelues to his obedience: the other that they may ſafely reſt in his protection, to whoſe will are ſubiect all theſe hurtfull things that may any way be feared, by whoſe authoritie as with a bridle Satan is reſtrained with al his furies & al his preparation, vpon whoſe back doth hang all that euer is againſt our ſafetie. And no other way but this can the immeſurable & ſuperſtitious feares be corrected or appeaſed, which we oftentimes conceiue by dangers happening vnto vs. Superſtitiouſly fearefull I ſay we be, if where creatures doe threaten vs or giue vs any cauſe of feare, we be ſo afraid therof, as if they had of themſelues any force or power to do vs harme, or did vnforeſeene or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if againſt ỹ hurtes that they doe, there were not ſufficient help in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they ſhoulde not feare the ſtarres & ſignes of ỹ heauen, as the vnbeleeuers are wont to do. He condēneth not euery kind of feare. But when the vnbeleeuers to giue away the gouernment of the world from God vnto Planets, do faine that their felicitie or miſerie doth hang on the decrees & foreſhewings of the ſtarres, and not of the wil of God, ſo commeth it to paſſe, that their feare is withdrawē away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the ſtarres & comets. Whoſo therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulneſſe, let him keepe alwayes in remembrance that there is not in creatures a wandring power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the ſecrete counſel of God, ſo that nothing can chaunce but that which is decreed by him both witting & willing it ſo be.

That God doth not only behelde what is done, but order and diſpoſe the doing of things both aboue & beneath.

4 Firſt therefore let the readers learne, that prouidence is called that, not wherewith God idlely beholdeth from heauen what is done in ỹ world, but wherewith as guiding the ſterne he ſetteth and ordreth all things that come to paſſe. So doeth it no leſſe belong to his handes than to his eyes. For when Abraham ſaide vnto his ſonne, God ſhall prouide, he meant not onely, that God did foreknowe the ſucceſſe them to come, but that he did caſt the care of a thing to him vnknowen vppon the will of God, which is wont to bring things doubtfull and confuſed to a certaine ende. Whereby followeth, that prouidence conſiſteth in doing: for too much fondly doe many triſle in talking of bare foreknowledge. Their error is not altogether ſo groſſe which giue vnto God a gouernment but diſordered, and without

aduiſed choyſe, (as I haue before ſaide,) that is to ſay, ſuch as whirleth and drieth about with a general motion the frame of the world with al ỹ parts thereof, but doeth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tollerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithſtanding this Prouidence which they call vniuerſall) that all creatures may be moued by chance, or man may turne himſelfe hither or thither by free choyſe of his will. And ſo doe they parte the gouernment betweene God & man, that God by his power inſpireth into man a motion whereby he may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his own doings by his owne voluntarie aduiſe: Briefely they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themſelues are gouerned by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I ſpeake not of the Epicurians (which peſtilence the world hath alwayes beene filled with) which dreame of an idle and ſlouthfull God: and other as mad as they, which in old time imagined that God did ſo rule about the middle region of the ayre, that he left things beneath to Fortune: For againſt ſo euident madneſſe, the dumme creatures themſelues doe ſufficiently crie out. For, nowe my purpoſe is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleeued, which giuing to God a certaine blind, and I wot not what vncertaine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is, by his incomprehenſible wiſedome to direct and diſpoſe all things to their ende: and ſo in name onely and not in deede it maketh God a ruler of the worlde, becauſe it taketh from him the gouernment of it. For what (I beſeech you) is it elſe to gouerne, but ſo to be ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou maieſt rule them by appointed order? Yet do I not altogether reiect that which is ſpoken of the vniuerſall prouidence: ſo that they will againe graunt me this, that the worlde is ruled by God, not onely becauſe he maintaineth the order of nature which himſelfe hath ſet, but alſo becauſe he hath a peculiar care of euery one of his works. True it is, that all ſortes of thinges are moued by a ſecrete inſtinct of nature, as if they did obey the eternall commaundement of God, and that that which God hath once determined doeth of it ſelfe proceede forwarde. And hereunto may that be applyed which Chriſt ſayeth, that hee and his Father were euen from the beginning alwayes working. And that which Paul teacheth that in him we liue, are moued and haue our being, and that which the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes, meaning to prooue the Godhead of Chriſt, ſaith, that by his mightie commaundement all things are ſuſteyned. But they doe wrong which by this colour doe hide and darken the ſpeciall prouidence, which is confirmed by ſo certaine and plaine teſtimonies of Scripture, that it is meruaill that any man could doubt of it. And ſurely they themſelues that drawe the ſame veile which I ſpeake of to hide it, are compelled by waye of correction to adde, that many things are doone by the peculiar care of God, but then they doe wrongfully reſtraine the ſame only to peculiar doings. Wherefore we muſt prooue that God doeth ſo giue heede to the gouernement of the ſucceſſes of all things, and that they all doe ſo proceede from his determinate counſell, that nothing happeneth by chaunce.

The particular appointment of God appeareth in the diuers alterations of things naturall, & extendeth to euery drop of raine, to euery accident vvhich befalleth the least birde.

5 If we graunt that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all things are either of themselues or by chaunce carried whither the inclination of nature driueth them, the mutuall succeeding by turnes of dayes & nights, of Winter & Summer, shal be the worke of God, in so much as he appointing to euery one their duties, hath set them a certaine law, ỳ is if they should alway kepe one measure in equal proportion, as well the dayes that come after the nights, the moneths after moneths, & yeres after yeres. But when sometimes immoderate heates with drines do burne vp all the grain, somtime vnseasonable raines do marre the corne, when sodaine harme cõmeth by haile & tempests: that shal not be the work of God, vnlesse perhap it be becausе the clouds or faire wether, or cold or heate haue their beginning of the meeting of the planets or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no roome left, neither for the fatherly fauour, nor for the iudgements of God. If they say that God is beneficial enough to mankinde becausе he powreth into the heauen & earth an ordinarie power, whereby they do finde him nourishment: that is too vaine & prophane an inuention, as though the fruitfulnesse of one yere were not the singular blessing of God, & dearth & famine were not his curse & vengeance? But becausе it were too long to gather together al the reasons that serue for this purpose, let the authoritie of God himself suffice vs. In the law & in the Prophets he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so oft as he watereth the earth with deaw & raine, he declareth his fauour, & that when by his commaundement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blasting & other harmes, when the fields are striken with haile & tempests, it is a token of his certaine & special vengeance. If we grant these things, then is it assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commaundement of God. Dauid praiseth the generall prouidence of God, that he giueth meate to the Rauens birdes that cal vppon him: but when God himselfe threateneth famine to liuing creatures, doeth hee not sufficiently declare that he feedeth al liuing things sometime with scarce, & somtime with more plentiful portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing, as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, whereas Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparowe of neuer so small a price doeth fall to the ground without the wil of his Father. Surely, if the flying of birdes be ruled by the purpose of God, then must wee needes confesse with the Prophet, that he so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to looke vpon all things that chaunce in heauen and earth.

The prouidence of God in disposing the estates of men.

6 But becausе we knowe that the world was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therefore consider this end in the gouernance of man. The Prophet Hieremie cryeth out: I know, Lord, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steppes. And Salomon saith, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lorde, and howe shall a man dispose his owne way? Nowe let them say that man is moued by God according to the inclination of his own nature, but that man himself doth turne that mouing whither it pleaseth him. But if that were truely saide, then should man haue the free choise of his owne wayes. Peraduenture they wil denie that, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But seeing it is certaine that the Prophet & Salomon doe giue vnto God, not onely power but also choise & appointment, they cannot so escape away. But Salomon in an other place doth finely rebuke this rashnes of men, that appoint vnto themselues another end without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hand. The preparations (saith he) of the heart are in man, but the answere of the tongue is of the Lord. It is a fond madnesse that men wil take vpon them to do things without God, which cannot so much as speak but what he will. And the scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at al is don in the world but by his appointment, sheweth ỹ those things which seeme most happening by chance are subiect to him. For what can you more ascribe to chance, than when a broken bow falling from a tree killeth a wayfaring man passing by it? But the Lord saith farre otherwise, which confesseth that he hath deliuered him into the hand of the slayer. Likewise, who doth not leaue the hapening of lottes to the blindnesse of fortune? But the Lord suffereth it not, which claimeth the iudgement of them to himself: for he saith that it commeth not to passe by a mans own power that stones are cast into the lap & drawen out againe, but that thing which only might be said to come of chaunce he testifieth to come from himselfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon, The poore man & the vsurer meete together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men & riche be mingled together in the world, while euerie one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which giueth light to all men is not blind, & so he exhorteth the poore to patience, because whosoeuer are not contented with their own state, they seeke to shake of the burthen that God hath laide vppon them. So an other Prophet rebuketh the vngodly men, which ascribe to the diligence of men or to Fortune, that some lye in miserie & some arise vp to honour. To come to preferment is neither from the East, nor frō the West, nor from the South, for God is the iudge, he maketh low & he maketh high. Because God cannot put of ỹ office of a Iudge, thereupon the Prophet proueth that by his secret purpose, some are in honour, & othersome remaine in contempt.

7 And also I say that the verie particular successes are generally witnesses of Gods singular prouidence. God raised in the desert a south winde to bring the people plentie of foules: when his plesure was to haue Ionas throwen into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tempest. But they that think that God gouerneth not the world, wil say ỹ this chaunced beside common vse. But thereby I do gather that neuer any wind doth rise or encrease but by the special commandement of God. For otherwise it should not be true, that he maketh the windes his messengers, and fierie flames his ministers, ỹ he maketh the clouds his chariots, & rideth vpon the wings of the winde, vnlesse he did by his wil driue about the clouds & winds, & shewe in them the singular presence of his power. So in another place we are taught that so oft as the Sea swelleth with blast of windes, those violences do testifie a singular presence of God. He commandeth and raiseth vp the stormie windes & it lifteth vp the waues thereof, & then he turneth the storme to calme, so that the waues therof are stil. As in another place he saith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So whereas the power of engendring is naturally giuen to men, yet God willeth it to be imputed to his speciall grace, that he leaueth some in barrennesse, & vouchsafeth to grant issue to othersome, the fruit of the wombe is his gift. Therfore said Iacob to his wife, am I as God that I can giue thee children? But to make an ende: there is nothing more ordinarie in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the Holy ghost pronounceth, that not only the growing of the fruits of the earth is the special gift of God, but also that men liue not by only bread, because it is not the verie full feeding that nourisheth, but the secrete blessing of God: as on the other side he threateneth, that he wil breake the stay of bread. Neither could we earnestly pray for our daily bread, vnlesse God did giue vs food with his fatherly hand. Therefore the Prophet to perswade the faithful, that God in feeding them doth fulfil the office of a good father of housholde, doth put them in mind, that he giueth meat to all flesh. Finally when we haue on the one side: The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his eares bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eye of the Lord is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memorie of them out of the earth: let vs knowe that all creatures both aboue & beneath are readie to obedience, that he may applye them to what vse soeuer he wil, whereupon is gathered, that not only his generall prouidence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his maruellous counsel is applyed to a certaine and proper end.

The doctrine concerning Gods prouidence, doth not establish Stoicall destenie, but excludeth heathnish fortune & chance Lib.2.ad Bon. cap.6.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, do cauil that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of Fatum or Destenie, which also was once layde for reproche to Augustine. As for vs, although wee be be loth to striue about words, yet we allowe not this word Fatum, both because it is one of those whose prophane noueltie Saint Paul teacheth vs to flie, & because some men do goe about with the odiousnesse thereof to bring Gods trueth in hatred. As for the verie opinió of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully layd to our charge. For we do not as the Stoikes do, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is conteined in nature: but wee make God the iudge and gouernour of all things, which according to his wisedome hath euen from the furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he woulde doe, and nowe by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Wherevpon we affirme that not only the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and willes of men are so gouerned by his Prouidence, that they be directly carried to the end that it appointeth. What then? will one say, doeth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I aunswere that Basilius Magnus hath truely saide that fortune & chaunce are heathen mens words, with the signification whereof the mindes of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if euery good successe be the blessing of God, and euery calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for fortune or chaunce. We ought also to be moued with this saying of Augustine. In his booke against the Academites he saith: It doeth displease mee that I haue so

oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant thereby, but only a chanceable happening in outward things either good or euil. Of which word Fortune are deriued those words which no religiō forbiddeth vs to vse, forte, forsan, forsitan, fortasse, fortuito, that is perhap, peraduēture, by forrune & by chaunce, which yet must all be applyed to the prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue vnspoké when I said, for perchance euen the same that is cōmonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And we cal chance in things nothing els, but that wherof the reson & cause is vnknowen. I said this in deede, but it repenteth mee that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I see that men haue a verie euil custome, that wher they ought to say, thus it pleased god, they say, thus it pleased fortune. Finally, he doth commonly in his bookes teach, that the world should be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were left vnto Fortune. And although in another place he determineth that al things are done partly by the free wil of man, & partly by the prouidence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subiect vnto & ruled by prouidence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against conuenience of reason, than to say that any thing chanceth but by the ordinance of God, for else it should happen without cause or order, by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hangeth vpon the wil of men: and by & by after he plainlier saith that we ought not to seeke a cause of the wil of God. And so oft as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be vnderstanded, shal very well appeare by one place where he proueth that the wil of God is the soueraine & first cause of al things, because nothing happeneth but by his cōmaundement or sufferance. Surely hee faineth not God to sit still idle in a watch toure, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, whereas he vseth an actuall will (as I may so call it) which otherwise could not be called a cause.

De Tri. lib. 3. cap. 4.

9 But forasmuch as the dulnesse of our vnderstanding can not by a great way attaine to the height of Gods prouidence, wee must vse a distinction to help to lift it vp. I say therefore, howsoeuer all things are ordeined by the purpose & certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chanceable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world & men, & vndaduisedly tosseth al things vp & down (for such beastlinesse ought to be farre from a Christian heart) but because the order, meane, end, and necessitie of those things that happen, doth for the most part lie secret in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those things are as it were chanceable, which yet it is certain to come to passe by the wil of God. For they seeme no otherwise, whether we consider thē in their own nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge & iudgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, ỳ a marchant being entred into a woode in companie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his fellowes, & in his wandering chanceth vpon a den of robbers, lighteth among theues, & is killed, his death was not onely foreseene with Gods eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not said that he did foresee how farre ech mans life should extend, but that he hath set and appointed markes which can not be passed. And yet so farre as the capacitie of our minde conceiueth, all

A thing may be termed chanceable, and be said to happen by fortune in respect of vs who see not the cause, when in respect of God who hath appointed it, it is necessarie, & though not in it owne nature, yet by reason of his appointments inuitable.

things herein seeme happening by chaunce. What shall a Christian here think? euen this, whatsoeuer happened in such a death, he wil think it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in deed, but yet he wil not doubt that the prouidence of God did gouerne to direct fortune to her end. In like manner are the happenings of things to come. For as al things that be to come are vncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either part, yet this remaineth settled in our hearts, that nothing shal happen but that which God hath alreadie foreseene. In this meaning is the name of chaunce oft repeted in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight men doe not attaine to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret prouidence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the hearts of men, but that euen in ỹ darknesse there alway shined some sparkes thereof. So the soothsayers of the Philistians, although they wauer in doubtfulnesse, yet they ascribe aduersitie partly to God, partly to fortune. If (say they) the arke go that way, wee shall know that it is God that hath striken vs: but if it goe the other way, then a chaunce hath light vpon vs. In deed they did foolishly, when their cunning
1. Sam. 6. 9. of soothsaying deceiued them, to flee to fortune, but in the meane while we see them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the euill hap which chaunced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his prouidence turneth al successes whither pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Behold euen at one moment of time, when Dauid was found out & neere taken in the desert of Maon, euen then the Philistians inuaded the land, & Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to
1. Sam. 23. 26. prouide for the safetie of his seruant did cast this let in Saules way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sodeine, & beside the expectatiõ of men, yet may we not say that it came by chaunce. But those things that seeme to vs to happen by chance, faith wil acknowledge to haue beene a secret mouing of God. I graunt there doth not alway appeare the like reason, but vndoubtedly wee ought to beleeue, that whatsoeuer changes of things are seene in the world, they come by the secret stirring of the hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely nor by the nature of it self. As thereof is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a body like vnto ours, no wise man will denye that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible that they should be broken: whereby we see againe that not without cause were in scholes inuented the distinctions of necessitie in respect, & necessitie absolute, of consequent and consequence, whereas God had subiect to brickleneſſe the bones of his sonne, which hee had exempted from being able to be broken, & so brought to necessitie by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing could not be, which naturally might haue ben.

The xvij. Chapter.

Wherto & to what end this doctrin is to be aplyed, that we may be certain of the profit therof.

NOW forasmuch as mens wits are bent to vaine curious suttleties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encomber themselues with entangled doubts, whosoeuer doe not know the true & right vse of this doctrine. Therfore it shalbe expedient here to touch shortly, to what ende the Scripture teacheth, that al things are ordered by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the prouidence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondarily, that the same is in such sort the gouernour of all things, that somtime it worketh by meanes, sometime without meanes, & somtime against al meanes. Last of al, that it tendeth to this end, ỹ god may shew ỹ he hath care of al mãkind, but specially ỹ he doth watch in ruling of his church, which he vouchsafeth more neerely to looke vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly fauour & bountifulnes of God, or oftentimes ỹ seueritie of his iudgemẽt do brightly appeare in the whole course of his prouidence: yet somtime the causes of those things that happen are secret, so that this thought creepeth into our mindes, ỹ mens matters are turned & whirled about with the blinde sway of fortune, or so ỹ the flesh stirreth vs to murmure, as if God did to make himself pastime, tosse them like tennise balles. True it is, that if wee were with quiet & stil minds readie to learne, the verie successe it self would at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to train them ỹ be his to patiẽce, or to correct their euil affectiõs & tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of themselues, or to awake their drowsinesse: on the other side to ouerthrowe the proude, to disappoint the suttletie of the wicked, to confound their deuises. But howsoeuer the causes be secret & vnknowen to vs: we must assuredly holde that they are layde vp in hidden store with him, & therefore wee ought to cry out with Dauid, God, thou hast made thy wonderful workes so many, ỹ none can count in order to thee thy thoughts toward vs. I would declare & speak of them, but they are more than I am able to expresse. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to think vpon our sins, that the verie punishment may moue vs to repentance, yet doe wee see how Christ giueth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish euery one according to his deserving For of him that was borne blind he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the glorie of God may be shewed in him. For here natural sense murmureth when calamitie commeth euen before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the silly innocent, that had not deserued it. But Christ doth testifie ỹ in this looking glasse the glory of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eyes to beholde it. But we must keepe modestie, that we drawe not God to yelde cause of his doings, but let vs so reuerence his secret iudgements, that his will be vnto vs, a most iust cause of all things. When thick clouds do couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then because both a heauisome mystinesse is cast before our eyes, & the thunder troubleth our eares, & all our senses are amased with terrour, wee thinke that all things are confounded & troubled together: & yet al the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietnesse and calmenesse that was before. So must wee thinke that while the troublesome state of things in ỹ world taketh from vs abilitie to iudge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisedome, doeth in well framed

Foure things in considering the prouidence of god do make the consideration thereof sweete & comfortable, that it serueth for things to come, as well as past: that it worketh by, with, & without meanes: that it respecteth principally the church of God: & that it worketh euen when the course of things doth seeme to perswade the contrary order gouerne & diſpoſe euen thoſe verie troubleſom motions themſelues to a right end. And ſurely verie monſtrous is ỹ rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly cal the works of God to account & examine his ſecret meanings, & to giue vnaduiſed ſentence of things vnknowen, than they wil do of the deeds of mortal men. For what is more vnorderly than to vſe ſuch modeſtie toward our egals, ỹ we had rather ſuſpend our iudgemẽt than to incurre ỹ blame of raſhnes, & on the other ſide proudly to triumph vpon the dark iudgemẽts of God, which it became vs to regarde with reuerence?

As vvee are to yeld obedience to the knowen reuealed vvill of hu lavv, ſo reuerence is due to the ſecret vvil, according vvhereunto he ruleth by prouidence.

2 Therfore no man ſhal wel & profitably way the prouidence of God, but he that conſidering that he hath to do with his creator & the maker of the world, doth with ſuch humilitie as he ought ſubmit himſelf to feare & reuerence. Hereby it commeth to paſſe, that ſo many dogs at this day doe with venimed bitings, or at leaſt barking, aſſaile this doctrine, becauſe they will haue no more to be lawful for God, than their own reaſon informeth them. And alſo they raile at vs with al the ſpitefulnes ỹ they are able, for that not contented with the commandements of the law, wherein the wil of God is comprehended, we do further ſay, ỹ the world is ruled by his ſecret counſels. As though the things that we teach were an inuention of our own braine, & as though it were not true that the holy Ghoſt doeth euery where expreſly ſay the ſame, & repeteth it with innumerable formes of ſpeech. But becauſe ſome ſhame reſtraineth them, ỹ they dare not vomit out their blaſphemies againſt the heauen: they faine that they contend with vs, to the ende they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what ſoeuer happeneth in the worlde, is gouerned by the incomprehenſible purpoſe of God, let them anſwere, to what end ỹ Scripture ſaith, that his iudgements are a deepe bottomleſſe depth. For, wheras Moſes crieth out that the wil of God is not to be ſought afarre of in the cloudꝭ, or in the depthes, becauſe it is familiarly ſet forth in the law: it followeth, that his other hidden wil is compared to a bottomleſſe deapth. Of the which Paul alſo ſaieth: O deapth of the richneſſe & of the wiſedom, & of the knowledge of God: how vnſearchable are his iudgements, & his waies paſt finding out? for who hath knowen the mind of the Lord, or who hath beene his counſellour? And it is in deede true, that in the goſpel & in the law are contained myſteries which are farre aboue the capacitie of our ſenſe: but foraſmuch as God for the cõprehending of theſe myſteries which hee hath vouchſafed to open by his word, doth lighten the mindes of them that be his, with the ſpirit of vnderſtanding: now is therein no bottomleſſe deapth, but a way wherin we muſt ſafe walke, & a candle to guide our feete, & the light of life, & the ſchoole of certaine & plainly diſcernable trueth. But his marueilous order of gouerning the worlde, is worthily called a bottomleſſe deapth: becauſe while it is hidden from vs, we ought reuerently to worſhip it. Right wel hath Moſes expreſſed them both in fewe words. The ſecret things (ſaith he) belong to the Lord our God: but the things reueiled belong to vs & to our children for euer. We ſee how he biddeth vs not onely to ſtudie in meditation of ỹ law, but alſo reuerently to looke vp vnto the ſecret prouidence of God. And in the booke of Iob is rehearſed one title of this deapth, that it humbleth our mindes.

mindes. For after that the author of that booke in surueying vp & down the frame of the world, had honorably entreated of the works of God, at length he addeth: Loe, these be part of his wayes, but how little a portion heare we of him? According to which reason in another place he maketh difference betweene the wisedom that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisedome that he hath appointed for men. For after he hath preached of ỹ secretes of nature, he saith that wisedome is knowen to God only, & is hidden from the eyes of al liuing creatures. But by and by after, he sayeth further, that it is published to the end it should be searched out, because it is said vn to man: beholde, the feare of God is wisedom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine: Because we know not all things which God doeth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in only good will we do according to the law, because his prouidence is an vnchangeable law. Therefore, sith God doth claime vnto himselfe the power to rule the worlde, which is to vs vnknowen, let this be to vs a law of soberneſſe and modestie, quietly to obey his soueraigne authoritie, that his wil may be to vs the only rule of iustice, and the most iust cause of al things. I meane not that absolute will, of which the Sophisters do babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his iustice from his power, but I meane that prouidence, which is the gouerneſſe of al things, from which proceedeth nothing but right: although the causes therof be hidden from vs.

Iob. 26. 14.

Lib. 83. quæst. cap. 23.

3 Whosoeuer shalbe framed to this modestie, they neither for the time past wil murmure against God for their aduersities, nor lay vppon him the blame of wicked doings, as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying, I am not the cause, but Iupiter and destenie: nor yet againe, as carried away with destenies, they wil by desperation throwe themselues into destruction, as that yong man in Plautus which said: Vnstable is the chaunce of things: the Destenies driue men at their pleasure, I wil get me to some rock there to make an end of my goods and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretend the name of God to couer their own mischieuous doings: for so sayeth Lyconides in an other comedie: God was the mouer. I beleeue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not beene their will, I knowe it should not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy ghost, they may trauaile to attaine therevnto. And also being readie to followe God, whither soeuer he calleth, they shewe in deede that nothing is more profitable than the knowledge of his doctrine. Verie foolishly do prophane men turmoile with their fondnesses, so that they in manner confound heauen & earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we cannot escape it: then it is labour vainly lost in taking heed to our selues. Therfore, whereas one man dareth not venture to go the way ỹ he heareth to be dangerous, lest he be murthered of theeues: another sendeth for Phisitians, & wearieth himself with medicines to succour his life: another forbeareth grosse meates for feare of appeiring his feeble health: an other dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house: Finally, whereas men deuise al wayes and endeuour with all diligence of minde whereby they may attaine that which they desire: either al these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the wil of God, or els life & death, health & sickncs, peace and warre, & other things, which men as they couet or hate them, doe by their trauaile endeuour to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certeine decree. And further they gather, that the prayets of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherin petition is made that it wil please ỹ Lord to prouide for those things which he hath alreadie decreed from eternitie. To be short, they destroy al counsels that men do take for time to com as things against the prouidence of God, which hath determined what hee would haue done, without calling them to counsaile. And then whatsoeuer is alreadie happened, they so impute it to the prouidence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to haue done it. As, hath a ruffian slaine an honest citizen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of god. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath done the thing that was foreseene & ordeined by the Lord, he is a minister of his prouidence. Hath the sonne carelesly, neglecting al remedies, waited for the death of his father? he could not resist God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So al mischiuous doings they cal vertues, because they obey ỹ ordinance of god.

The prouidence of God doth not abolish but establish the meanes by leauing the end certaine only to it self, to vs vncertaine, that vve might take the vvayes vvhich ar likely to bring vnto that ende vvhich vvee should propose to our selues.

4 But as touching things to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together, the purposes of men with the prouidence of god. For as he laugheth to scorne their folly, which boldly doe enterprise any thing without the Lorde, as though they were not ruled by his hande: so in an other place hee speaketh in this manner: The heart of man purposeth his way, but the Lorde doeth direct his steppes, meaning that wee are not hindered by the eternal Decrees of God, but that vnder his will wee may both prouide for our selues, & dispose al things belóging to vs. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limitted our life within appointed boundes, hath therewithal left with vs ỹ care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes & helps to preserue it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hand of dãgers, & that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath giuen vs prouisions & remedies. Now it is plaine to see what is our duetie, that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our duetie is to defende it. If he offer vs helps, our duetie is to vse them. If he shewe vs dangers before, our duetie is not to ruune rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our duetie is not to neglect them. But no daunger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fatall, which by all remedies cannot be ouercome. But what if dangers bee therefore not fatal, because God hath assigned thee remedies to repulse & ouercome them? See how thy maner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition, Thou gathereste that danger is not to be taken heede of, because forasmuch as it is not fatal, we shal escape it without taking heed at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heed of it, because he wil not haue it fatal vnto thee. These madde men doe not consider that which is plaine before their eyes, that the skill of taking counsell and heede is inspired into men by God, whereby they may serue his prouidence in preseruing of their own life: as on the other side by negligence and slouth they procure to themselues those euils that he hath appointed for thé. For how cōmeth it to passe, that a circumspect man while he prouideth for himselfe, doth wind himselfe out of euils ỹ hang ouer him, & the foole perisheth by vnaduised rashnes, but for that both folly & wisedome are the instrumēts of Gods disposition on both parts? Therfore it pleased God to hide from vs al things to come, to this end that we should meete with them as things doutful, & not ceasse to set prepared remedies against them, til either they be ouercome, or be past al help of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished, that the Prouidence of God doth not alway shewe it selfe naked, but as God by vsing of meanes doth in a certaine maner cloth it.

The prouidence of God doth not proue vvicked doers vnvvorthie of punishment. Pro. 6. 9.

5 The same men do vnorderly & vnaduisedly draw the chaunces of time past to the naked prouidence of God. For because vpon it do hang al things whatsoeuer happē, therfore (say they) neither robberies nor adulteries, nor manslaughters are committed without the wil of God. Why then (say they) shal a thiefe be punished, for that he spoyled him whome the Lords wil was to punish with pouertie? Why shal the murtherer be punished which hath slaine him whose life the Lord had ended? If all such men doe serue the will of God, why shal they be punished? But I denye that they serue the will of God. For we may not say, that he which is carried with an euil minde doth seruice vnto God as commaunder of it, where in deede he doeth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doeth labour to that ende, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But whereby are we enformed of his will, but by his worde? Therefore in doing of things we must see that same wil of God, which he declareth in this worde. God requireth of vs only that which he commaundeth. If we do any thing against his commaundement, it is not obedience but obstinacie and transgression. But vnlesse he would, we should not do it. I graunt. But do we euil things to this end to obey him? But he doth not command vs to do them, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but so raging with the intemperance of our own lust, that of set purpose wee bende our trauaile against him. And by these meanes in euill doing wee serue his iust ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnes of his wisdom he hath good skil to vse euil instruments to doe good. And see howe fooliish is their maner of arguing. They would haue the doers vnpunished for mischeuous acts, because they are not committed but by the disposition of God. I grant more: that theeues & murtherers & other euil doers are ỹ instrumēts of Gods prouidence, whom the Lord doth vse to execute those iudgements which he hath with himselfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse thereby. For why? shal they either entangle God in the same wickednes with them, or shal they couer their naughtines with his righteousnes? They can do neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselues, they are accused by their own conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they find al the euil in themselues, & in him nothing but a lawful vse of their euilnes. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead carrion, which hath bin both rotted and discloſed by heat of the sunne? Al men do see that it is raised by the beames of the Sunne. Yet no man doeth therefore say, say, that the sunbeames do stinke So when there resteth in an euil man, the matter and guiltinesse of euill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing defiled with it, if he vse their seruice at his pleasure? Away therefore with this doggish frowardnesse, which may indeede a farre off barke at the iustice of God, but cannot touch it.

The sweete and sober meditation which a Christian man ought to haue of Gods prouidence.

6 But these cauilations or rather doting errors of phrentike men, shal easily be shaken away, by godly & holy meditation of the prouidence, which the rule of godlines teacheth vs, so that therof may grow vnto vs a good & most pleasant fruit. Therfore a Christian heart when it is most assuredly perswaded ỹ al things come to passe by the disposition of God, & that nothing happeneth by chance, wil alway bend his eyes to him as to ỹ principal cause of things, & yet wil consider the inferior causes in their place. Then he wil not doubt that the singular prouidence of God doth watch for his preseruation, which prouidence wil suffer nothing to happen, but that which shal turne to his good & saluation. And because he hath to do first of al with men, & then with the other creatures, he wil assure himselfe that Gods prouidence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that all their counsels, wils, enterprises and powers are vnder the hand of God, so that it is in Gods wil to bowe them whether he list, & to restraine them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular prouidence of God doth keepe watch for the safetie of the faithfull, there are many and most euident promises to witnes. Cast thy burden vpon the Lord, & he shall nourish thee, & shal not suffer the righteous to fall for euer, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the help of the highest, shal abide in the protection of the God of heauen. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. I wil be thy shield, a brasen wall: I wilbe enemie to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her children, yet wil I not forget thee. And also this is the principall entent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doeth with such diligence keepe the waies of the Saints, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therfore as a litle before we haue rightfully reiected their opinion which doe imagine an vniuersall prouidence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care of euerie creature: yet principally it shall be good to reknowledge the same special care toward our selues. Whervpon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparowe of least value, doeth fal to the ground without the wil of the father, doth by & by applie it to this end, that we shold cõsider that how much we be more worth than sparowes, with so much neere care doth God prouide for vs, & he extendeth that care so far that we may be bold to trust that the haires of our head are numbred. What can we wish our selues more, if not so much as a haire can fal from our head but by his wil? I speake not only of all mankind, but because God hath chosen his Church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doubt but that he doeth by singular examples shewe his care in gouerning of it.

7 The seruant of God being strengthened with these both, promises and examples, will ioyne with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their mindes to good will, or to restraine their malice that it may doe no hurt. For it is the Lorde

that giueth vs fauour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Egyptians, and as for the maliciousnesse of our enemies, he knoweth howe by diuerse waies to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceiue no sound or sober aduise, like as hee sent forth Satan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophets with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rechabeam madde by the young mens counsell, that hee might be spoiled of his kingdome by his owne follie, Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet he maketh them so afraide & astonished, that they cannot wil or go about that which they haue conceiued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to goe about that which lust & rage did counsell them, he doth in conuenient time breake off their violences, and suffereth them not to proceede to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophel that should haue beene to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne all his creatures for the benefite and safetie of them that be his, yea, and to gouerne the diuel himself, which as we see durst enterprise nothing against Iob without his sufferance and commandement. Of this knowledge necessarily ensueth both a thankfulnesse of minde in prosperous successe of things, and also patience in aduersitie, & an incredible assuredneſse against the time to come. Whatsoeuer therefore shal betide vnto him prosperously and according to his hearts desire, all that hee will ascribe vnto God, whether he feele the bountie of God by the ministerie of men, or be holpen by liueleſſe creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lorde which hath enclined their mindes to me, which hath ioyned them vnto me to be instruments of his goodnesse towardes me. In plentie of the fruites of the earth, thus he wil thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her fruites. In other things he will not doubt that it is the onely blessing of the Lorde, whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes hee will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If any aduersitie happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his minde to God, whose hande auaileth much to imprint in vs a patience and quiet moderation of heart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the falsehood of his brethren, hee coulde neuer haue taken a brotherly minde towarde them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lorde, he forgate the iniurie, and inclined to meekenesse and clemencie, so farreforth that of his owne arcorde hee comforted his brethren and saide: It is not you that solde me into Ægypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your liues. You in deede thought euil of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whome hee was troubled, hee woulde forthwith haue beene kindled to reuenge. But because hee did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, hee comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So Dauid: when Semei had rayled and cast stones at him, if hee had looked vpon man, hee woulde haue incouraged his souldiers to reacquite the iniurie. But because he vnderstoode that that Semei did it not without the mouing of the Lorde, he rather appeased them. Let him alone (said he) for the Lord hath commanded him to curse. With the same bridle in another place doth he restraine the intemperance of sorow. I held my peace (saith he) & became as dumme, because thou O Lord, didst it. If there be more effectual remedie against wrath & impatiéce: surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the prouidence of God, that he may alway call back his minde to this point. It is the Lords wil, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawful to striue against it, but also because he willeth nothing but that which is both iust & expedient. In summe this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leauing their malice (which would do nothing but enforce our sorrow, & whet our mindes to reuenge) should remember to climbe vp vnto God, & learn to beleeue assuredly, that whatsoeuer our enimie hath mischeuously done against vs, was both suffered & sent by Gods disposition. Paul, to refraine vs from recompensing of iniuries doeth wisely put vs in mind, that we are not to wrastle with flesh & bloud, but with the spiritual enimie the Diuel, that wee may prepare our selues to striue with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as wel the diuel as al wicked men to striue with vs, & that he sitteth as iudge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes & miseries that oppresse vs, do chaunce without the worke of men, let vs remember the doctrine of the lawe: whatsoeuer is prosperous floweth from ỹ fountaine of Gods blessing, & that al aduersities are his cursings: & let that most terrible warning make vs afraide: If ye walke stubbornly against mee, I wil also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishnesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accounting all to be but chance that happeneth of both sorts, we are neither encouraged by the benefits of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentance. This same is the reason, wy Hieremie & Amos did so sharply rebuke the Iewes, because they thought that things as well good as euill came to passe without the commandement of God. To ỹ same purpose serueth that sermon of Esay. I the God that create light & fashion darknesse, that make peace and creat euil: I God do make all these things.

Neither wil he, because hee thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnesse by whome he hath receiued benefite, therefore let them passe vnconsidered, as though they had deserued no thanke by their gentlenes: but he wil hartily think himselfe bound vnto them, & will willingly confesse his bonde, and trauell as he shal be able, and as occasion shall serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefites receiued hee will reuerence and praise God as the principall author, but he will honour men as the ministers, and as the trueth is in deede he will vnderstand that hee is by the will of God bounde to them, by whose hande it was Gods will to be beneficiall vnto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, hee will determine in his mind, that the same was done in deede with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sickenesse whom hee

he hath negligently handled, whereas of duetie he ſhould haue taken good heede vnto him although he be not ignorant that the man was come to his appointed time beyond which he could not paſſe, yet wil he not therby leſſen his offence, but becauſe he had not faithfully diſcharged his duetie toward him, he will ſo take it as if he had periſhed by fault of his negligence. Much leſſe when there is vſed any fraud, and conceiued malice of mind in committing either murther or theft, wil he excuſe it vnder pretence of gods prouidence, but he will in one ſelf euil act ſeuerally behold both the righteouſnes of God, & the wickednes of man, as both doeth manifeſtly ſhewe themſelues. But principally in things to come he wil haue conſideration of ſuch inferior cauſes. For he wil recken it among the bleſſings of God if he be not diſappointed of the helps of men which he may vſe for his ſafetie. And ſo he neither wil be negligent in taking of counſell, nor ſlouthfull in crauing their help whom he ſeeth to haue ſufficient wherof he may be ſuccoured: but thinking that whatſoeuer creatures can any thing profit him, the ſame are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his vſe as the lawful inſtruments of Gods prouidence. And becauſe he doth not certainly knowe what ſucceſſe the buſines will haue that he goeth about, (ſauing that in al things he knoweth that the lord wil prouide for his benefit) he wil with ſtudie trauaile to that which he ſhall thinke expedient for himſelfe, ſo farre as he can conceiue in mind and vnderſtanding. And yet in taking of counſels he wil not be carried on by his own wit, but will commit & yeeld himſelfe to the wiſedome of God, that by the guiding thereof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence ſhall not ſo ſtay vpon outward helps, that if he haue them he wil careleſly reſt vpon them, or if he wãt them he wil be afraid as left deſtitute, for he wil haue his mind alway faſtened vpon the Prouidence of God, neither wil he ſuffer himſelf to be drawen away frõ the ſtedfaſt beholding thereof, by conſideration of preſent things. So though Ioab acknowledged that the ſucceſſe of battaile is in the wil and hand of God, yet he gaue not himſelf to ſlouthfulnes but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaueth it vnto the Lorde to gouerne the end. We wil ſtand valiant (ſaith he) for our nation, & for the cities of our God: But the Lord do what is good in his eyes. This knowledge ſhal deſpoile vs of raſhnes & wrongful confidence, & ſhall driue vs to continual calling vpõ God: & alſo ſhal vphold our minds with good hope, ſo as we may not dout aſſuredly & boldly to deſpiſe thoſe dãgers ỹ cõpaſſe vs about. 2. Sam. 10. 12.

10 In this point doeth the ineſtimable felicitie of a godly minde ſhewe foorth it ſelfe. Innumerable are the euils that do beſeege mans life, and doe threaten him ſo many deaths. As, not to go further than our ſelues: foraſmuch as our bodie is a receptacle of a thouſand diſeaſes, yea, hath encloſed & doth nouriſh within it the cauſes of diſeaſes, man cannot carrie himſelfe but he muſt needs alſo carie about with him many formes of his owne deſtruction, & draw forth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it elſe be called, where he neither is cold, nor ſweateth without peril? Now whither ſoeuer thou turne thee, al things that are about thee are not onely vntruſtie friends to thee, but do in maner openly threaten & ſeeme to ſhew thee preſent death. Go into a ſhip, there is but a foote thicknes betweene thee & death. Sit on horseback, in the slipping of one foot thy life is in danger. Go through the streets of ỹ citie: euen how many tyles are vpon the houses, to so many perils art thou subiect. If there be an iron toole in thy hand or thy friends, thy harme is readie prepared. How many wilde beasts thou seest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shutte vp thy selfe, euen in a garden wel fensed, where may appeare nothing but pleasantnesse of ayre and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fire, doeth in the day time threaten thee with pouertie, and in the night time with falling vppon thy head. Thy feelde, forasmuch as it lyeth open to hayle, frost, drowth & other tempestes, it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisonnings, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which, part do beseege vs at home, and part doe followe vs abroad. In these streightes must not man needes be most miserable, which euen in life halfe dead doeth plainly draw forth a careful and fainting breath, as if he had a sworde continually hanging ouer his necke? But thou wilt say, that these things chaunce seldome, or at the least not alwayes, nor to all men, and neuer all at once. I graunt, but seeing wee are put in minde by the examples of other, that the same things may happen to our selues, and that our life ought of dutie no more to be free than theirs, it cannot be but that we must dread & feare them as things that may light vpon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearefulnesse? besides that, it is not without dishonourable reproch of God to say, that he hath set open man the noblest of al his creatures to their blinde and vnaduised strokes of fortune. But here my purpose is to speake onely of the miserie of man, which he should feele if hee should be brought subiect vnder Fortunes dominion.

VVhat boldnes, & quietnes of mind the knowledge of the prouidence of God vvorketh.

11 But when that light of Gods Prouidence hath once shined vppon a godly man: he is now releeued and deliuered not onely from the extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was before oppressed, but also from al care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly commit himselfe to God, This is (I say) his comfort to vnderstande that the heauenly father doeth so holde in all things with his power, so ruleth them with his authoritie & countenance, so ordereth them with his wisedome, that nothing befalleth but by his appointment: and that he is receiued into Gods tuition, & committed to the charge of Angels, and cannot be touched with any hurt of water, nor fire, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the gouernor to giue them place. For so is it song in the Psalme. For he shal deliuer thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysome pestilence. Hee will couer thee vnder his wings, and thou shalt be sure vnder his fethers. His trueth shal be thy shielde and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraide of the feare of the night, nor of the arrowe that flyeth by day, not of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at noone day. And from thence proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saints to glorie. The Lorde is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may doe to mee. The Lorde is my protector, why shall I be afraid? If whole campes stande vp against mee, if I walke in the middest of the shadow of death, I wil not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is neuer ſhaken away from them? but hereby, that where the worlde ſeemeth in ſhewe to be without order whirled about, they knowe that God worketh euerie where, whoſe worke they truſt ſhall be for their preſeruation. Now if their ſafetie be aſſailed either by the diuell or by wicked men, in that caſe if they were not ſtrengthened with remembrance and meditation of Prouidence, they muſt needes by and by be diſcouraged. But when they call to minde, that the diuel & al the rout of the wicked, are ſo euery way holden in by the hande of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceiue any miſchiefe againſt vs, nor goe about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they goe neuer ſo much about it, can ſtirre one finger to bring it to paſſe but ſo farre are he ſhall ſuffer, yea, ſo farre as he ſhall commaunde, & that they are not onely holden faſt bound with fetters, but alſo compelled with bridle to doe ſeruice: here haue they aboundantly wherewith to comfort themſelues. For as it is the Lordes worke to arme their furie and to turne and direct it whither it pleaſeth him, ſo is it his worke alſo to appoint a meaſure and ende, that they doe not after their owne will licentiouſly triumph With which perſuaſion Paul being eſtabliſhed, did by the ſufferance of God appoint his iourney in an other place which hee ſaide was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely ſaide that he had beene ſtopped by Satan, he ſhould haue ſeemed to giue him too much power, as if it had beene in Satans hande to ouerthrowe the verie purpoſes of God: but when he maketh God the iudge, vppon whoſe ſufferance all iourneies do hang: he doeth therewithall ſhewe, that Satan whatſoeuer hee goe about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will For the ſame reaſon doeth Dauid, becauſe for the ſundrie chaunges wherewith mans life is toſſed and as it were whirled about, he doth flie to this ſanctuarie, ſaith that his times are in the hand of God. He might haue ſaid either the courſe of his life, or time in the ſingular number. But by the worde Times, he meant to expreſſe that howſoeuer the ſtate of man be vnſtedfaſt, whatſoeuer alterations doe nowe and then happen, they are gouerned by God. For which cauſe Raſin and the king of Iſraell, when ioyning their powers to the deſtruction of Iuda, they ſeemed as firebrandes kindeled to waſt and conſume the lande, are called by the Prophet ſmoking brandes, which can doe nothing but breath out a little ſmoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reaſon of his richeſſe, ſtrength and number of men, he himſelf is compared to a beaſt of the Sea, and his armie to fiſhes. Therefore God ſaith that he will take the Captaine and the armie with his hooke and drawe them whither he liſt. Finally, becauſe I will not tarrie long vpon this point, if a man marke it he ſhall eaſily ſee that the extremitie of all miſeries is the ignorance of Gods Prouidence, and the cheefe bleſſedneſſe ſtandeth in the knowledge thereof.

12 Concerning the Prouidence of God, this that is ſaide were enough for ſo much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fil the vaine curioſitie of men, nothing can be ſufficiēt, neither is it to be wiſhed that they be ſatisfied) were it not for certaine places, which ſeeme to meane otherwiſe than is aboue declared, that god hath not ſtedfaſt & ſtable purpoſe but changeable according to the diſpoſition

It diſproueth not the ſetled purpoſe of God in appointing all things that he is ſaid to repent him, and that plagues firſt denounced be afterwards recalled of inferior things. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancing of Saul to the kingdome. And that he wil repent him of the euil that he had determined to lay vpon his people, so soone as he perceiueth any conuersion of them. Againe, there are rehearsed diuers repelles of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Niniuites, that after 40 dayes once past Niniuie should be destroyed, but by & by he was turned with their repentance to a more gentle sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronounced death to Ezechias, which he was moued by his teares and prayers to deferre. Hereupon many do make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternal decree, but yerely, daily, & hourly apointeth this or that, as euery mans deseruings are, or as he thinketh it equitie & iustice. Concerning his repentance this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance, errour & weakenesse. For if no man do wittingly and willingly throw himselfe into the case that he neede to repent, wee can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what wil come to passe, or that he cannot auoid it, or that he headlong and vnaduisedly runneth into a purpose wherof he by and by sorethinketh him. But that it is so farre from the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the verie mention making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at al, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted, ỳ in the same chapter they are both so ioyned together, that the comparison doeth verie wel bring the shew of repugnancie to agreement. His changing is figuratiuely spoken, ỳ God repented that he had made Saul king, by & by after it is added: The strength of Israel shal not ly, nor shalbe moued with repenting. Because he is not a man ỳ he may repent. In which wordes his vnchangeablenes is affirmed plainly without any figure. Therfore it is certain ỳ the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall & aboue al repentance. And ỳ his constancie should not be doutful, his very aduersaries haue beene cõpelled to beare him witnes. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not choose but burst out into this saying, ỳ he is not like a man to lye: nor as a sonne of man to be changed, & ỳ it is not possible that he should not do that he hath said, & not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken.

God is said to repent himselfe, not because he changeth his purpose, but the euents vvhich his vnchangeable purpose vvas to change.

13 What meaneth then this name of repentance? euen in the same sort that al the other phrases of speach which do describe God vnto vs after the maner of men. For, because our weakenesse doeth not reach to his highnes, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed low to our capacitie, that we might vnderstand it. And this is the manner how to frame it low for vs, to paint out himselfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceiued of vs. Whereas he himselfe is without al mouing of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth ỳ he is angrie with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angrie, we ought not to imagine that there is any mouing at all in him, but rather to consider that this speach is borrowed of our common sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angrie so oft as he exerciseth iudgement: so ought we to vnderstand nothing else by this worde of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes, are wont to declare that they mislike them. Because then euerie change among men is an amendment of that which misliketh them, and amendment commeth of repentance: therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God changeth in his works. In the meane time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he followeth on with one continuall course that which he had from eternitie foreseen, allowed & decreed, howsoeuer the alteration seeme sodeine in the eyes of men.

14 Neither doeth the holy historie shewe that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Niniuites which had beene before pronounced, and that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that so construe it are deceiued in vnderstanding of threatnings: which although they doe simply affirme, yet by the successe it shall be perceiued that they conteyned a secrete condition in them. For why did God send Ionas to the Niniuites to tel them aforehand of the ruine of their citie? Why did hee by Isay giue Ezechias warning of death? For he might haue brought to naught both him & them without sending them any worde of their destruction. Hee meant therfore an other thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it comming a far of. Euen this he meant: not to haue them destroyed, but to haue them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ionas prophecied that Niniuie should fall after 40. dayes, was done to this ende that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut off from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that hee might obtaine longer life. Now who doeth not see that God meant by such threatnings to awake them to repentance, whome he made afraide to the ende that they might escape the iudgement which they had deserued by their sins? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselues doeth lead vs to this, to vnderstande in the simple threatning a secrete emplyed condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lorde rebuking the king Abimeleche for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, vseth these wordes: Beholde thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for shee hath a husband. But after hee had excused himselfe, God said thus: Restore the wife to her husbande, for he is a Prophet and shall pray for thee that thou maist liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou hast. You see howe in his first sentence hee vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more heedefully bent to make amends, & in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seeing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawen from the first purpose of God, by this that hee made voide the thing which hee had before pronounced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternal ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishmēt he moueth those to repentance, whome his wil is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his wil, no not in his word, sauing that he doth not expresse the same thing in sillables which is yet easie to vnderstande. For that saying of Esay must needes remaine true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndoe it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

The xviii. Chapter.

That God doeth so vse the seruice of vvicked men, and so bowveth their mindes to put his iudgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remaineth pure from all spot.

How God doth not only permit but appoint the things to be done vvhich vvicked men do.

THere ariseth a harde question out of other places, where it is saide that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe and all the reprobate. For the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiueth how hee working by them, should not gather some spot of their fault, yea, in his common working be free from all fault, and iustly condemne his ministers. Vppon this was deuised the distinction betweene Doing and Suffering: because many haue thought this doubt vnpossible to be dissolued: that both Satan and al the wicked are so vnder the hande and power of God, that he directeth their malice, vnto what ende it pleaseth him, and vseth their wicked doings to the executing of his iudgements. And their modestie were peraduenture excusable, whom the shewe of absurditie putteth in feare, if it were not so that they do wrongfully with a lying defence goe about to deliuer the iustice of God from all vnrightfull blame. It seemeth to them vnreasonable, that man should by the will and commaundement of God be made blinde, and so by and by be punished for his blindnesse. Therefore they seeke to scape by this shifte, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the wil of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doeth it, doeth reiect that shift. As for this that men do nothing but by the secrete commaundement of God, and do trouble themselues in vaine with deliberating, vnlesse he do by his secrete direction stablish that which he hath before determined, it is proued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certaine that this which we before alleaged out of the Psalme, that God doeth all things that he will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God be the certaine appointer of warre and peace, as it is there saide, and that without exception: who dare say that men are carried causelesly with blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, and sitteth still? But in speciall examples will be more lightsome plainnesse. By the first Chapter of Iob wee knowe, that Satan doeth no lesse appeare before God to receiue his commaundements than doe the Angels which doe willingly obey. In deede it is after a diuerse manner and for a diuerse ende: but yet so that hee cannot goe about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterwarde to be added a bare sufferance of him to afflict the holy man: yet because that saying is true: The Lorde hath giuen, the Lorde hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe: We gather that God was the author of that trial of Iob, whereof Satan and the wicked theeues were ministers. Satan goeth about to driue the holy man by desperation to madnesse. The Sabees cruelly and wickedly doe inuade and rob his goods that were none of theirs, Iob knowledgeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoeuer men or Satan him selfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their trauels to the executing of his iudgements. It was Gods will to haue the false

king Achab deceiued: the diuel offered his seruice thereunto: hee was sent with a certaine commandement, to be a lying spirite in the mouth of all the Prophets. If the blinding and madnesse of Achab be the iudgement of God, then the deuise of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the iudge doeth only suffer and not also decree what he wil haue done, & commaund the ministers to put it in execution. It was the Iewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate & the souldiers do follow their raging lust, and yet in a solemne prayer the disciples do confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hande and counsell of God had determined: euen as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose & foreknowledge of God deliuered to be slaine. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden, from the beginning did wittingly & willingly appoint that which the Iewes did execute, as in another place he rehearseth, that God which shewed before by all his Prophets ỳ Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Absolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous aduulterie, committed detestable wickednesse. Yet God pronounceth that this was his own work. For the words are these: Thou hast don it secretly, but I will doe it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremie pronounceth that all the crueltie that the Chaldees vsed in Iury, was the worke of God. For which cause Nabucadnezer is called the seruant of God, God euery where crieth out that with his hissing, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commandement the wicked are stirred vp to warre. He calleth the Assirian the rod of his wrath, & the axe that he moueth with his hande. The destruction of the holy citie & ruine of the Temple he calleth his work. Dauid not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous iudge, yet confesseth that the cursings of Semei proceeded of the cõmandement of God. The Lord (saith he) commanded him to curse. Wee often finde in the holy historie, that whatsoeuer happeneth it commeth of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sonnes of Hely, and verie many things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in the Scriptures do see, that for shortnesse sake, I bring foorth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they doe trifle & talke fondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferance in place of the Prouidence of God, as though God sate in a watch tower waiting for the chaunces of Fortune, & so his iudgements should hang vpon the will of men.

And truely if he did not worke in the mindes of men, it were not rightly said, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, & wisedome from aged men, that he taketh the heart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander wher is no beaten way. And hereto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearful so farre forth as their hearts be taken with his feare. So Dauid went out of the campe of Saul & none was ware of it, because the sleepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that hee blindeth the eyes of men,& ſtriketh them with giddineſſe, that he maketh them drunke with the ſpirite of drowſineſſe,caſteth them into madnes,and hardneth their hearts. Theſe things alſo many doe referre to ſufferance,as if in forſaking the reprobate,hee ſuffered them to be blinded by Satan. But that ſolution is too fond,foraſmuch as the Holy ghoſt in plaine words expreſſeth,that they are ſtriken with blindneſſe & madnes by the iuſt iudgement of God. It is ſaid,that he hardned the heart of Pharao,alſo that he did make dul and ſtrengthen it. Some doe with an vnſauorie cauillation mocke out theſe phraſes of ſpeech, becauſe in an other place it is ſaide, Pharao did harden his owne heart,there is his own wil ſet for the cauſe of his hardning. As though theſe things did not verie wel agree togither, although in diuers maners,that man while he is moued in working by God, doeth alſo worke himſelfe. And I do turne backe their obiection againſt themſelues. For,if to harden do ſignifie but a bare ſufferance, then the verie motion of obſtinacie ſhal not be properly in Pharao. Now how weake & fooliſh were it ſo to expound,as if Pharao did only ſuffer himſelf to be hardened? Moreouer the Scripture cutteth off all occaſions from ſuch cauillations. For God ſaith,I wil hold his heart So of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, Moſes ſaith, that they went foorth to battaile, becauſe the Lorde had hardened their hearts. Which ſame thing is repeated by another Prophet,ſaying: He turned their hearts that they ſhould hate his people. Again in Eſay he ſaith, that he wil ſend the Aſſirians againſt the deceitful nation,& wil commaund them to carrie away the ſpoiles,& violently take the pray,not meaning that he wil teach wicked & obſtinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his iudgements as if they did beare his commandements grauen in their mindes. Whereby appeareth that they were moued by the certaine appointment of God. I graunt that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans ſeruice as a meane, but yet ſo that Satan doth his office by Gods mouing,& proceedeth ſo farre as is giuen him. The euil ſpirite troubled Saul,but it is ſaid that it was of God, that wee may knowe that the madneſſe of Saul,came of the iuſt vengeance of God. It is alſo ſaid,that the ſame Satan doth blind the mindes of the vnfaithful: but how ſo, but only becauſe the effectual working of errour commeth from God himſelfe, to make them beleeue lyes that refuſe to obey the trueth? After the firſt maner of ſpeaking it is ſaid, If any Prophet ſhal ſpeake lyingly, I God haue deceiued him. According to the other maner of ſpeach it is ſaide, that hee giueth men into a reprobate mind:& to caſt them into filthie deſires, becauſe he is the chiefe author of his own iuſt vengeance,& Satan is but onely a miniſter therof. But becauſe we muſt entreat of this matter againe in the ſecond booke,where we ſhal diſcourſe of free or bond wil of man, I thinke I haue alreadie ſhortly ſpoken ſo much as this place required. Let this be the ſumme of al,that foraſmuch as the will of God is ſaide to be the cauſe of all things,his Prouidence is thought the gouerneſſe in all purpoſes & workes of men,ſo as it ſheweth forth her force not onely in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirit,but alſo compelleth the reprobate to obedience.

3 Foraſmuch as hitherto I haue recited only ſuch things as are written in the Scriptures,plainly & not doutfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to slaunder the heauenly oracles, take heed what maner of iudgement they take vpon thē. For if by fained pretending of ignorance they seeke a praise of modestie, what can be imagined more proudly done, than to set one smal word against the authoritie of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to haue this touched. But if they openly speake euil, what preuaile they with spitting against the heauen? But this is no newe example of waywardnesse, because there haue bin in al ages wicked & vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shal feele that thing in deed to be true, which long ago the holy ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that God may ouercome when he is iudged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbridled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they do not only argue against God, but also take vppon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomit vp against the heauen do not reach vnto God, but that he driuing away the cloudes of cauillations, doth brightly shewe forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (becausse being grounded vpon the word of God, it is aboue all the worlde) doeth from her high place contemptuously looke downe vpon these mystes. For first, where they obiect, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrarie willes, because he decreeth those things by secrete purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his lawe, that is easily wiped away. But before I answere it, I wil once againe giue the readers warning that this cauillation is throwen out not against me, but against the Holy ghost, which taught the holy man Iob this confession: as it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theeues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurt that they did him, the iust scourge of God. What saieth the Scripture in other places? The sonnes of Hely obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also another Prophet crieth out, that God which sitteth in heauen doth whatsoeuer he will. And now I haue shewed plainly enough that God is the author of al those things which these iudges would haue to happen only by his idle sufferance. He testifieth that he createth light and darkenesse, that he formeth good and euill, that no euill happeneth which he himself hath not made. Let them tel mee, I beseech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne iudgements? But as Moses teacheth, ỳ he which is slaine by ỳ falling of an axe by chance, is deliuered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole church saith in Luke, that Herode & Pilate conspired to do those things, which the hande and purpose of God had decreed. And truely if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whence came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doeth striue with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that hee willeth not the thing ỳ he wil: but where it is but one and simple in him, it seemeth to vs manifolde, because according to the weakenesse of our witte we conceiue not how God in diuers manner willeth and willeth not one selfe thing. Paul, after that he hath saide, that the calling of the Gentiles is a hidden mysterie, within a little after saith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manifolde wisedome of God: because for the dulnesse of our witte the wisedome of God seemeth to vs manifolde, or (as the olde interpretour hath translated it) of many fashions: shal we therefore dreame that there is any varietie in God himselfe, as though he either changeth his purpose, or dissenteth from himselfe? Rather when wee conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbiddeth to doe, let vs call to mind our own weakneſſe, and therewithal consider that the light where-in he dwelleth, is not without cause called Inaccessible, because it is couered with darkneſſe. Therefore al godly & sober men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime man with good will willeth ỹ which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to haue his father to liue, whom God wil haue to die. Againe it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euil will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an euil sonne willeth to haue his father to die, and God also willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, and the other sonne willeth that which God also willeth, and yet the naturalneſſe of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrarie thing, than the vnnaturalneſſe of the other sonne that willeth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to wil doeth belong to man, & what to God, & to what end the wil of euerie one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or disalowed. For those things which God willeth wel he bringeth to passe by the euil willes of euil men. But a little before he had said, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and al the reprobate, in as much as concerneth themselues, did that which God would not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they could by no meanes so do, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done vpon them. Whereupon he crieth out: Great are the works of God, & ought to be sought out of al them that loue them: that in maruelous maner ỹ same thing is not done without his wil which is also done against his wil, because it could not be done if he did not suffer it: and yet he doth it not against his wil, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euil, vnleſſe for that he is omnipotent, he could of euil make good.

Wicked men are iustly condemned for the euil which they do, although God haue appointed it to be done.

4 In the same maner is assoiled or rather vanisheth away the other obiection: that if God do not onely vse the seruice of wicked men, but also gouerneth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doings, & therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute ỹ which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his wil & commandement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre a sunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wiues, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonor: yet did he not therefore commaunde the wicked sonne to commit incest, vnleſſe perhap you meane it in respect of Dauid, as he speaketh of the railings of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei raileth at him by the commandement of God, hee doeth not therein commend his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commandement of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be ỹ scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by ỹ wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret iudgement, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commandement, which in deede of their owne euil lust they do purpolely breake. Now how that thing is of God, & is ruled by his secret prouidence, which men doe wickedly, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is seuerely condemned, for that they peruerted the order appointed by God, and falsely fell from the house of Dauid, and yet we knowe it was his will that he should be annointed. Whereupon in the verie wordes of Osee there appeareth a certaine shewe of repugnancie, that where God complained that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his wil, in another place he sayeth, that he gaue the kingdom to Iarobeam in his rage. How shal these sayings agree? that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, because neither could the people fall from the house of Dauid, but that they must shake off the yoke which God had layed vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vnthankfulnesse of Salomon. Wee see therefore how God in not willing false breach of allegeance, yet to another ende iustly willeth a falling away from their Prince, whereupon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holy annointing driuen to bee king. After this maner doth the holy historie say, that there was an enimie raised vp to spoyle Salomons sonne of part of his kingdome. Let the readers diligently wey both these things, because it had pleased God to haue the people gouerned vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two partes, it was done against his will. And yet the diuision tooke beginning of his will For surely, where as the Prophet both by words & ceremonie of annointing did moue Iarobeam whē he thought of no such thing, to hope of the kingdom, this was not don without the knowledge or against the wil of God, which commanded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people iustly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of Dauid. In this maner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the requeste of the people, this was done by God, to confirme the worde which he had spoken by the hand of Ahiha, his seruant. Lo how against Gods will the sacred vnitie is torne in sunder, & yet with the will of the same God tenne tribes do forsake Salomons sonne Let vs adde another like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their hands vnto it, the sonnes of Ahab were slaine, & all his ofspring rooted out. Iehu said in deede truely, that nothing of the words of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hand of his seruant Elias. And yet not vniustly he rebuketh the citizens of Samaria, for that they had put their hands vnto it. Are yee righteous, saith he? If I haue conspired against my lord, who hath killed al these? I haue before (as I thinke) alreadie declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the fault of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousnes of God glorioufly appeareth. And for modest wittes this aunswere of Augustine shall alway suffise: where as the father deliuered the sonne, & Christ deliuered his body, and Iudas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that wee now saye, that there is no consent of God with man, where man by the righteous mouing of God doeth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine saith in another place: Who shall not tremble at these iudgements, where God worketh euen in the hearts of euil men whatsoeuer he wil, and yet rendreth to them according to their deseruings? And truely in the fulshod of Iudas, it shalbe no more lawfull to lay the blame of the wicked deede to God, becausse he himselfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, than it shalbe to giue away the praise of our redemption to Iudas. Therefore the same writer doeth in an other place truely tel vs, that in this examination God doeth not enquire what men might haue don, or what they haue don, but what their wil was to do, that purpose and wil may come into the accompt. They that think this hard, let them a little while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardnesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, becausse it exceedeth their capacitie, & do find fault that those things are vttered, which God, vnlesse he had knowen them profitable to be knowen, woulde neuer haue commaunded to be taught by his Prophets and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meeke willingnesse to learne, and that without exception whatsoeuer is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that doe more frowardly outrage in prating against it, sith it is euident that they babble against God, they are not worthie of a longer confutation.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, which knowledge was first opened to the Fathers in the time of the Lawe, and then to vs in the Gospel.

The First Chapter.

That by Adams sinne and falling away, mankind became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: wherin is intreated of Originall sinne.

VVe must learne throughly to know our selues that the consideration of the graces of God may make vs thankful and the beholding of our miseries, humble vs.

NOT without cause hath the knowledge of himselfe been in the olde prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shamefull is the not knowing of our selues: whereby it commeth to passe, ỹ in taking counsell of any thing necessary, we be miserably daseled, yea, altogether blinded.

But

But how much more profitable this leſſon is, ſo much more diligently muſt we take heede, that we do not diſorderly vſe it, as we ſee ſome of the Philoſophers haue done. For they in exhorting man to knowe himſelfe, doe withall appoint this to be the ende, why he ſhould knowe himſelfe, that he ſhould not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing elſe do they wil him to beholde in himſelfe, but that whereby he may ſwell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our ſelues, firſt ſtandeth in this point, that conſidering what was giuen vs in creation, & how bountifully God continueth his gratious fauor toward vs, we may knowe how great had bin the excellencie of our nature, if it had continued vncorrupted: and we may withal thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as it were gotten by borrowing al that God hath beſtowed vpon vs, that wee may alwayes hang vpon him. Then, that we call to minde our miſerable eſtate after the fall of Adam, the feling wherof may throw down al glorying & truſt of our ſelues, ouerwhelm vs with ſhame, & truely humble vs. For as God at the beginning faſhioned vs like his own image, to the end to raiſe vp our mindes both to the ſtudie of vertue & to the meditation of eternal life, ſo leaſt the ſo great nobleneſſe of our kind, which maketh vs different from brute beaſtes, ſhoulde be drowned with our ſlothfulnes, it is good for vs to know, that we are therfore endued with reaſon & vnderſtanding, that in keeping a holy & honeſt life, wee ſhould proceede on forward to the appointed end of bleſſed immortalitie. But the firſt dignitie cannot come in our mind, but by and by on the other ſide the heauie ſight of our filthines, & ſhame doth thruſt it ſelf in preſence, ſince we in the perſon of the firſt man are fallen from our firſt eſtate, where vpon groweth the hatred & loathing of our ſelues, & true humilitie, & there is kindled a new deſire to ſeeke for God, in whom euery of vs may recouer thoſe good things, whereof we are found altogither void and emptie.

2 This thing ſurely the truth of God appointeth to be ſought in examining of our ſelues, I meane, it requireth ſuch a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs deſtitute of all matter to glorie vpon, may bring vs to ſubmiſſion. Which rule it behoueth vs to keepe, if we wil attaine to the true mark both of right knowledge & well doing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleaſant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to conſider our good things, than to looke vpon our miſerable needineſſe and diſhonour, which ought to ouerwhelme vs with ſhame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coueteth, than to be ſtroked with flatterie: and therfore when he heareth the gifts that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that ſide with ouermuch lightneſſe of beleefe: whereby it is ſo much the leſſe to be marueled, y^t herein the greateſt part of men haue pernitiouſly erred. For ſith there is naturally planted in all mortall men a more than blind loue of themſelues, they doe moſt willingly perſwade themſelues, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthily to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this moſt vaine opinion doth ech where get credit, that man is abundantly ſufficient of himſelfe to make himſelfe liue well and bleſſedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modeſtly, howe ſoeuer they graunt ſomeſomewhat to God, leaſt they ſhould ſeeme arrogantly to take all to themſelues, yet they ſo part it, that the principall matter of glorie & confidence alwaye remaineth with themſelues. Now if there come talke, that with her allurements tickleth the pride that alreadie of it ſelfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling moſt fauourably aduanced the excellencie of mans nature, ſo hath he beene excepted with the wel liking reioycement in manner of all ages. But whatſoeuer ſuch commendation there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to reſt in himſelfe, it doeth nothing but delite with that her ſweetneſſe, and in deede ſo deceiueth, that it bringeth to moſte wretched deſtruction all them that aſſent vnto it. For to what purpoſe auaileth it for vs, ſtanding vpon al vaine confidence to deuiſe, appoint, attempt & go about thoſe things that we think to be for our behoofe, and in our firſt beginning of enterpriſe to be forſaken & deſtitute of ſound vnderſtanding & true ſtrength, & yet to goe on boldly till wee fall downe into deſtruction? But it cannot otherwiſe happen to them that haue affiance that they can do any thing by their own power. Therfore if any man giue heede to ſuch teachers that hold vs in conſidering only our owne good things, hee ſhal not profite in learning to know himſelfe, but ſhalbe carried violently away into the worſe kind of ignorance.

The true knowledge of our ſelues emboldneth not, but caſteth downe: it teacheth vs vvhat our duitie is, and howe vnable vve are to performe it.

3 Therefore, whereas in this point the truth of God doeth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the ſecond part of wiſedom conſiſteth in the knowledge of our ſelues, yet in the verie manner of knowing there is much diſagreement, For by the iudgement of the fleſh, a man thinketh that he hath then well ſearched himſelfe, when truſting vpon his owne vnderſtanding and integritie, he taketh boldneſſe, and encourageth himſelfe to doing the duties of vertue, and bidding battel to vices, trauaileth with all his ſtudie to bende himſelfe to that which is comely and honeſt. But he that looketh vppon and tryeth himſelfe by the rule of Gods iudgement, findeth nothing that may raiſe vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardly that he hath examined himſelf, the more he is diſcouraged, til being altogither ſpoiled of all confidence, he leaueth to himſelfe nothing toward the wel ordering of his life. And yet would not God haue vs to forget the firſt noblenes that he gaue to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the ſtudie of righteouſneſſe and goodneſſe. For we cannot conſider either our owne firſt eſtate, or to what end we are created, but we ſhalbe pricked forward to ſtudie vpon immortalitie, and to deſire the kingdome of God. But that conſideration is ſo farre from putting vs in courage, that rather diſcouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humbleneſſe. For what is that firſt eſtate of ours? euen that from whence wee are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euen the ſame from which we are altogether turned away: ſo that lothing our owne miſerable eſtate, wee may grone for ſorrowe, and in groning may alſo ſigh for the loſſe of that dignitie. But nowe when wee ſay that man ought to beholde nothing in himſelfe that may make him of bolde courage: wee meane that there is nothing in him vpon affiance wherof he ought to be proud. Wherefore, if any liſt to heare what knowledge man ought to haue of himſelfe, let vs thus diuide it, that first he consider to what ende he is created, and endued with giftes that are not to be dispised, by which thought hee may be stirred vp to the meditation of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him way his owne strength, or rather needie want of strength, by perceiuing wherof he may lye in extreme confusion, as one vtterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that hee may knowe what is his duetie: and the other, how much he is able to doe towards the performing of it. Wee will entreat of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But because it must needes be that it was not a light negligence, but a detestable wicked act which God so seuerely punished, wee must consider the verie forme of the same in the fall of Adam, that kindled the horrible vengeance of God vppon all mankinde. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly beene receiued, concerning the intemperance of gluttonie, as though the summe and head of all vertues consisted in the forbearing of one onely fruite, when there flowed on euery side store of al sortes of deinties that were to be desired, & when in that blessed fruitfulnesse of ỹ earth, there was not only plentie, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therfore we must looke further, because the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good & euil, was the trial of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proue that he was willingly subiect to the gouernement of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commaundement was giuen for none other ende, than for this, that hee contented with his own estate should not with wicked lust aduaunce himselfe higher. But the promise whereby hee was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as hee did not eate of the tree of life, and againe, the horrible threatening of Death so soone as hee should taste of the tree of knowledge of good & euil, serued to proue and exercise his faith. Hereof it is not harde to gather, by what meanes Adam prouoked the wrath of God against himselfe. Augustine in deede saith not amisse, when hee saith, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambition had not lifted vp man higher than was lawfull & than was permitted him, he might haue continued in his estate: but we must fetch a more full definition from the manner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For sith the woman was with the deceite of the Serpent led away by infidelitie, now it appeareth that disobedience was ỹ beginning of the fall. Which thing Paul confirmeth, teaching that al men were lost by one mans disobedience. Rom. 5.19. But it is withal to be noted, that the first man fell from the subiection of God, for ỹ he not only was taken with the entisemẽts of Satan, but also despising the trueth, did turne out of the way to lying. And surely Gods word being once despised, all reuerence of God is shaken off. Because his maiestie doeth no other wayes abyde in honour among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inuiolate, but while wee hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the roote of that falling away. But thereupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulnesse, for that Adam in coueting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently despise the so great liberalitie of God wherewith he was enriched. And this was a monstrous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that that he was made after the likeneſſe of God, vnleſſe he might alſo be made equall with God. If Apoſtaſie be a filthie and deteſtable offence, whereby man draweth him ſelfe from the allegeance of his creatour, yea, outragiouſly ſhaketh of his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the ſin of Adam. Albeit it was no ſimple Apoſtaſie, but ioyned with ſhamefull reproches againſt God, while they aſſented to the ſclaunders of Satan, wherein he accuſed God of lying enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidelitie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obſtinate rebellion, to make men caſt away the feare of God, and throwe themſelues whither their luſt carried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of ſaluation is opened vnto vs, when at this day wee receiue the Goſpell by our eares: euen as by the ſame windowes, when they ſtoode open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam would neuer haue been ſo bolde, as to do againſt the commaundement of God, but for this, that he did not beleeue his worde. Truely this was the beſt bridle for the right keeping of al affections in good order, to thinke that there is nothing better than to keepe righteouſneſſe in obeying the commandements of God, and then that the chiefe end of happie life is to be beloued of him. He therefore being carried away with the blaſphemies of the diuel, did (aſmuch as in him lay) extinguiſh the whole glorie of God.

Rom. 8.

All Adams offſpring through his ſinne are made ſinful, not by imitation only as Pelagius taught, but by propagation, receiuing the contagion of ſinne & vncleaneſſe before they behold he light of this life.

5 As the ſpirituall life of Adam was, to abide ioyned and bounde to his creatour, ſo his alienation from him was the death of his ſoule. Neither is it marueile if he by his falling away, deſtroyed all his own poſteritie, which peruerted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures do grone, ſaith Paul, being made ſubiect to corruption againſt their will. If one ſhould aske the cauſe: no doubt it is for that they beare part of that puniſhment that man deſerued, for whoſe vſe they were created. Sith then the curſe that goeth throughout all the coaſtes of the worlde, proceeded from his fault both vpward and downwarde, it is nothing againſt reaſon, if it ſpread abroad into all his iſſue. Therefore after that the heauenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone ſuffer this puniſhment, that in place of wiſedome, ſtrength, holineſſe, trueth, and iuſtice (with which ornaments he had beene clothed) there came in the moſt horrible peſtilences, blindneſſe, weakeneſſe, filthineſſe, falſhood, and iniuſtice, but alſo hee entangled and drowned his whole offſpring in the ſame miſeries. This is the corruption that commeth by inheritance, which the olde writers called originall ſinne, meaning by this worde ſinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they haue had much contention, becauſe there is nothing further off from common reaſon, than all men to bee made guiltie of one mans fault, and ſo the ſinne to become common. Which ſeemeth to haue beene the cauſe why the oldeſt Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at the leaſt did not ſet it out ſo plainely as was conuenient. And yet that feareſulneſſe could not bring to paſſe, but that Pelagius aroſe, whoſe prophane inuention was that Adam ſinned onely to his owne loſſe, and hurted not his poſteritie. So through this ſurtletie, Satan went about by hiding the diſeaſe, to make it incurable. But when it was proued by manifeſt teſtimonie of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, hee brought this cauillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men trauailed in this point, and aboue all other Augustine, to shewe that we are corrupted not by forein wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to denie was too great shamelesnesse. But the rashenes of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme maruelous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shall perceiue, how shameleſſe beasts they were in all other things. Surely it is not doutfully spoken that Dauid confesseth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceiued in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set foorth the goodnesse of God towarde him, hee beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his verie begetting. Forasmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to Dauid alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted vnder his example. All wee therefore that descende of vnclean seede, are borne infected with the contagion of sinne, yea, before that wee see the light of this life, wee be in the sight of God filthie and spotted. For who could giue cleane of the vncleanneſſe? not one: as it is in the booke of Iob.

Scrip-

Psa. 51. 7.

Iohn. 14. 4.

6 Wee heare that the vncleanneſſe of the parentes so passeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning vnleſſe we go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therefore, that Adam was not onely the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde worthilie corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he) by one man sinne entred into the whole worlde, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteousnesse and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians here prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue wee no other profite by the righteousnesse of Christ, but that hee is an example set before vs to followe? Who can abide such robberie of Gods honour? If it be out of question that Christes righteousnesse is ours by communication, and thereby life: it followeth also that they both were so lost in Adam, as they be recouered in Christ: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The wordes are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therefore betweene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him, & Christ with his grace restored vs to saluation. In so cleare light of trueth, I thinke wee neede not a longer or more laborious proofe. So also in the 1. Epistle to the Corinthians, when hee goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of the resurrection, he sheweth that the life is couered in Christ, that was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth that wee all are dead in Adam, doeth also therewithall plainly testifie, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation coulde not reache vnto them that were touched with no guiltinesse of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlier vnderstanded

In Adam our nature being corrupted commeth vnto vs such as he by sin had made it: vvhereupon it followeth, that vve are dead because he dead of vvhom vve are: sonnes of vvrath because they vvere so that begate vs: flesh because vve are borne of flesh.

Rom. 5. 12.

ded what hee meaneth then by relation of the other member of the ſentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is reſtored in Chriſt. But it is well inough knowen that the ſame is don no other way, than when by marueilous manner of communicating, Chriſt powreth into vs the force of his righteouſnes. As it is written in another place, that the ſpirite is life vnto
Rom. 8. 10. vs, for righteouſneſſe ſake. Therefore we may not otherwiſe expound that which is ſaid that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in ſinning did not onely purchaſe miſchiefe and ruine to himſelfe, but alſo threwe downe our nature headlong into like deſtruction. And that not only to the corruption of himſelfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but becauſe he infected al his ſeede with the ſame corruption whereinto he was fallen. For otherwiſe the Ephe. 1. 3. ſaying of Paul coulde not ſtande true, that all are by nature the ſonnes of wrath, if they were not alreadie accurſed in the wombe. And it is eaſily gathered that nature is there meant not ſuch as it was created by God, but ſuch as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not conuenient, that God ſhould be made the author of death. Adam therefore ſo corrupted himſelfe, that the infection paſſed from him into all his ofspring. And the heauenly iudge himſelfe Chriſt, doth alſo plainly inough pronounce, that all Iohn. 3. 6. are borne euil and corrupted, where he teacheth, that whatſoeuer is borne of fleſh, is fleſh, & that therefore the gate of life is cloſed againſt all men, vntil they be begotten againe.

Whether we haue our ſoules or no, by deriuation from our parents, as we haue our bodies, is a needeleſſe queſtion in this caſe. It ſufficeth vs to know what what God beſtowed vpon Adam, it was to hold, or to loſe, for, or from, both himſelfe & his. That the children of faithfull men are ſanctified, is no diſprofe of their originall corruption.

7 Neither for the vnderſtanding thereof is any curious diſputation needefull, which not a little combred the old writers, whether the ſoule of the ſonne doe proceede by deriuation from the ſoule of the father, becauſe in it the infection principally reſteth. We muſt be content with this, that ſuch giftes as it pleaſed the Lorde to haue beſtowed vppon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam loſt them after he had receiued them, he loſt them not onely from himſelfe, but alſo from vs all. Who ſhall be carefull of a conueyance from ſoule to ſoule, when hee ſhall heare that Adam receiued theſe ornaments which hee loſt, no leſſe for vs than for him ſelfe? that they were not giuen to one man alone, but aſſigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not againſt reaſon, if hee being ſpoyled, nature be left naked and poore: if hee being infected with ſinne, the infection creepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote aroſe vp rotten branches, which ſent their rottenneſſe into the other twigges that ſprong out of them. For ſo were the children corrupted in the father, that they alſo were infectiue to their children: that is to ſay, ſo was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continuall flowing from one to another, it is conueyed from the anceſters into the poſteritie. For the infection hath not her cauſe in the ſubſtance of the fleſh or of the ſoule, but becauſe it was ſo ordeined of God, that ſuch giftes as he had giuen to the firſt man, man ſhould both haue them, and loſe them as wel for himſelf as for his. As for this that the Pelagians do cauill, that it is not likely that the children do take corruption from godly parents, ſith they ought rather to be ſanctified by their cleanneſſe, that is eaſily confuted. For they deſcend not of their ſpirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation.
Cont. Pelag. & Celeſt. Therefore as Auguſtine ſaieth, whether the vnbeleeuer be condemned as guiltie, guiltie, and the beleeuer quitte as innocent, they both do beget not innocents, but guiltie, becauſe they beget of the corrupted nature. Now where as they do in manner partake of the parents holineſſe, that is the ſpeciall bleſſing of the people of God, which proueth not but that the firſt and vniuerſal curſe of mankind went before. For of nature is guiltineſſe, and ſanctification is of ſuperna urall grace.

What original ſin is, & that wee are not only ſubiect to the punishment wvhich our firſt fathers fault deſerued, but the infection of his faultineſſe is alſo in vs.

8 And to the ende that theſe things be not ſpoken of a thing vncertaine and vnknowen, let vs define Originall ſinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to be moſt agreeable with trueth. Originall ſin therefore ſeemeth to be the inheritably deſcending peruerſneſſe and corruption of our nature, powred abroad into all the parts of the ſoule, which firſt maketh vs guiltie of the wrath of God, and then alſo bringeth foorth theſe workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the fleſh: and that is it properly that Paul oftentimes calleth ſinne. And theſe workes that ariſe out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, theftes, hatreds, murthers, banketings, after the ſame manner hee calleth the fruites of ſinne, albeit they are likewiſe called ſinnes both commonly in the Scriptures, & alſo by the ſame Paul himſelfe. Therefore theſe two things are diſtinctly to bee noted: that is, that being ſo in all partes of our nature corrupted and peruerted, wee are nowe euen for ſuch corruption onely holden woorthily damned and conuicted before God, to whome is nothing acceptable but righteouſneſſe, innocencie and pureneſſe. And yet is not that bonde in reſpect of anothers fault. For where it is ſaide, that by the ſinne of Adam wee are made ſubiect to the iudgement of God, it is not ſo to bee taken, as if wee innocent and vndeſeruing did beare the blame of his fault. But becauſe by his offending wee are all clothed with the curſe, therefore is it ſaide that hee hath bounde vs. Neuertheleſſe, frō him not the puniſhment onely came vppon vs, but alſo the infection diſtilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the puniſhment is iuſtly due. Wherefore howe ſo euer Auguſtine doeth often times call it an others ſinne, (to ſhewe the more plainly, that it is conueyed into vs by propagation) yet doeth hee alſo affirme withall that it is proper to euerie one. And the Apoſtle himſelfe expreſſely witneſſeth, that therefore death came vppon all men, becauſe all men haue ſinned, and are wrapped in Originall ſinne, and defiled with the ſpottes thereof And therefore the verie infantes them ſelues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde, not by an others, but by their owne fault. For though they haue not as yet brought forth the fruites of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the ſeede therof encloſed within them: yea, their whole nature is a certain ſeede of ſinne: therefore it cannot be but hatefull & abhominable to God. Wherevpon followeth, that it is properly accounted ſinne before God: for there could be no guiltineſſe without ſinne. The other point is, that this peruerſeneſſe neuer ceaſſeth in vs, but continually bringeth foorth newe fruites, euen the ſame workes of the fleſhe that wee haue before deſcribed: like as a burning furnace bloweth out flame and ſparcles, or as a ſpring doeth without ceaſſing caſt out water. Therefore they which haue defined

Gal. 5. 19.

Rom. 5. 12.

Originall ſinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteouſnes which ought to haue beene in vs, although in deede they comprehende all that is in the thing it ſelfe: yet they haue not fully enough expreſſed the force and efficacie therof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodneſſe, but alſo is ſo plenteous and fruitfull of all euils, that it cannot be idle. They that haue ſaide, that it is a concupiſcence, haue vſed a worde not very farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not graunted by the moſte part, that whatſoeuer is in man, euen from the vnderſtanding to the will, from the ſoule to the fleſh, is corrupted and ſtuffed full with this concupiſcence: or, to ende it ſhortlyer, that whole man is of himſelfe nothing elſe but concupiſcence.

The verie vnderſtanding of man is corrupted & not the ſenſuall or inferior part only.

9 Wherefore, I haue ſaide that all the partes of the ſoule are poſſeſſed of ſinne, ſith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteouſneſſe. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impietie poſſeſſed the verie caſtle of his minde, and pride pearced to the innermoſt part of his heart. So that it is a fond and fooliſh thing, to reſtraine the corruption that proceeded from thence, only to the ſenſual motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture, that allureth, ſtirreth and draweth to ſinne only that part, which among them is called Senſualitie. Wherein Peter Lombard hath diſcloſed his groſſe ignorance, which ſeeking and ſearching for the place of it, ſaith that it is in the fleſh, as Paul witneſſeth not properly in deede, but becauſe it more appeareth in the fleſh, as though Paul did meane onely a part of the ſoule, and not the whole nature which is in compariſon ſet againſt ſupernaturall grace. And Paul there taketh away al doute teaching that corruption reſteth not in one part alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, hee doeth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare, but ſpecially trauelleth to proue that the vnderſtãding mind is ſubiect to blindneſſe, and the heart to peruerſneſſe. And the ſame third Chapter to the Romanes is nothing elſe but a deſcription of originall ſinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the ſpirite which is compared with the old man and the fleſh, doth not only ſignifie the grace whereby the inferiour or ſenſuall part of the ſoule is amended, but alſo containeth a full reformation of all the partes. And therfore Paul doth commaund, not onely that our groſſe appetites be brought to naught, but alſo that we our ſelues be renewed in the ſpirite of our mind, as likewiſe in an other place he biddeth vs to be transformed in neweneſſe of minde. Whereupon followeth, that the ſame part, wherein moſt of all ſhineth the excellencie and nobleneſſe of the ſoule, is not onely wounded, but alſo ſo corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a newe nature. How farre ſinne poſſeſſeth both the vnderſtanding minde and the heart, we wil ſee hereafter. Here I onely purpoſed ſhortly to touch that the whole man from the head to the foote is ſo ouerwhelmed as with an ouerflowing of water, that no part of him is free from ſinne, & that therfore whatſoeuer proceedeth from him is accompted for ſinne, as Paul ſaith, that all the affections of the fleſh or thoughtes, are enmities againſt God, and therefore death.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sinnes, because wee say that men are naturally sinfull. They doe wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthinesse, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sound and vncorrupted. Therefore our destruction commeth of the fault of our owne flesh and not of God, forasmuch as wee perished by no other meane but by this, that wee de;endred from our first estate. But yet let not any man here murmure and say, that God might haue better foreseene for our saluation, if he had prouided that Adam should not haue fallen For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godly mindes, for the too much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secrete of predestination which shal after be entreated of in place conuenient. Wherefore let vs remember that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that wee accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in deede it is, that the same deadly wound sticketh fast in nature: but it is much materiall to knowe, whether it came into nature from elsewhere, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is euident that the wound was giuen by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why we should complaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This haue I founde, that God hath made man righteous, but they haue sought many inuentions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to himselfe, forasmuch as hauing gotten vprightnesse by the goodnesse of God, hee by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

Though wee be naturally sinfull, yet is not God the author of our sin.

Eccl. 7. 13.

11 We say therefore that man is corrupted with faultinesse natural, but such as proceeded not from nature. Wee denie that it proceeded from nature, to make it appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, which is happened to a man, than a substantiall propertie that hath bene put into him from the beginning Yet we call it Naturall, that no man should thinke that euery man getteth it by euil custome, whereas it holdeth al men bound by inheritably descending right. And this we do not of our owne heads without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are al by nature the children of wrath. Howe could God, whom all his meanest workes do please, be wrathfull against the noblest of al his creatures? But he is rather wrathfull against the corruption of his worke, than against his worke it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, man is not vnfitly saide to be by nature abhominable to God, it shalbe also not vnaptly called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes naturall, which do necessarily reigne in our flesh where the grace of God is absent. So vanisheth away the foolish trifling deuise of the Manichees, which when they imagined an euilnesse hauing substance in man, presumed to forge for him a new Creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous god the cause and beginning of euill.

We are termed corrupt by nature, not because God hath put corruption as a naturall qualitie in vs, but because together vvith our nature it is derined into vs and not gotten by custome.

Ephe. 2. 3.

The second Chapter.

That man is vvo vv spoiled of the Freedome of vvill, and made subiect to miserable bondage.

The doctrine which concerneth the bondage of our will, must not make vs slothfull vnto good things, as if they did not appertaine vnto vs, but rather hūble and carefull, that knowing our owne weakenesse, we presume not to trust vnto our selues.

Sith we haue seene, that the dominion of sin, since the time that it helde the first man bound vnto it, doth not onely reigne in all mankind, but also wholy possesseth euery soule: now must we more neerely examine, since we are brought into that bondage, whether wee be spoiled of all freedome or no: and if yet there remaine any parcell, how farre the force thereof proceedeth. But to the ende that the trueth of this question may more easily appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, whereunto the whole summe may be directed. And this shalbe the best way to auoid errour, if the dangers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from al vprightnesse, by and by hee thereby taketh occasion of slouthfulnes: and because it is said, that by himselfe he can doe nothing to ỹ studie of righteousnes, forthwith he neglecteth it wholy, as if it pertained nothing vnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it neuer so little, but that both Gods honor shalbe thereby taken from him, and man himselfe be ouerthrowne with rash confidence Therefore to the ende we strike not vpon these rocks, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodnesse, & being on euery side compassed about with most miserable necessitie, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is voide, and to the libertie whereof he is depriued, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulnes, than if it were fained that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessarie this second point is, euery man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by moe than it ought to be. For this being set out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stande for trueth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his own, as farre as it behoueth that he be throwne downe from false boasting of himself. For if it were not granted to man to glorie in himselfe euen at that time, when by the bountifulnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornamentes, how much ought he now to be humbled, sith for his vnthankfulnesse hee is thrust downe from hie glorie into extreme shame? At that time (I saye) when he was aduaunced to ỹ highest degree of honor, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that hee was created after the image of God, whereby it secretely teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his owne good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and destitute of al glorie, doe acknowledge God, to whose liberalitie hee could not be thankfull when hee flowed full of the richesse of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne pouertie he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profit, that all praise of wisedome and strength be taken from vs, as it pertaineth to the glorie of God that they ioine our ruine with the robberie of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more than that which is true. For what is else done when wee are taught to fight of our owne force, but that we be lifted vp on hie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the grounde? Albeit, our forces are yet too much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vaine men haue imagined and doe babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeated by Augustine, that free will is rather throwne downe headlong, than ſtabliſhed by them that defend it. This I thought needefull to ſpeake before, as by way of preface for many mens ſakes, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowne from the ground, that the power of God may be builded in man, do much hate this maner of diſputing as dangerous, much more ſuperfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion neceſſarie, & for vs moſt profitable.

2 Whereas we haue a little before ſaid, that in the vnderſtanding mind, & in the heart are placed the powers of the ſoule, now let vs conſider what they both are able to do. The Philoſophers in deede with great conſent do imagine that in the vnderſtanding minde ſitteth reaſon, which like a lampe giueth light to al counſels, & like a Queene gouerneth the will, for they ſay that it is ſo endued with diuine light, that it can giue good counſell, & ſo excelleth in liuely force that it is able wel to gouerne. On the other ſide, that ſenſe is dull & bleare eyed, that it alway creepeth on ỹ ground, & walloweth in groſſe obiects, and neuer lifteth vp it ſelfe to true inſight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reaſon, and do not yeld it ſelfe to ſenſe to be ſubdued, is carried on to the ſtudie of vertues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into willibut if it giue it ſelfe ſubiect into the bondage of ſenſe, it is by it corrupted and peruerted, ſo that it degendreth into luſt. And wher as by their opinion there do ſit in the ſoule thoſe powers that I haue ſpoken of before, vnderſtanding, ſenſe, appetite or will, which worde will is nowe more commonly vſed, they ſay that vnderſtanding is endued with reaſon, the beſt gouerneſſe toward good and bleſſed life, ſo that it doe holde it ſelfe within his owne excellencie, & ſhew forth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferior motion of it, which is called ſenſe, wherewith man is drawne to error & deceit, they ſay to be ſuch, that it may be tamed with the rod of reaſon, & by litle & litle be vanquiſhed. They place will in the midſt betwene reaſon & ſenſe, as a thing at her own ordering, and hauing libertie whether it liſt to obey to reaſon, or giue forth it ſelfe to be raviſhed by ſenſe.

The opinion of Philoſophers concerning the freedom of mans will.

3 Sometime in deede they do not denie, being ouercome by verie experience, howe hardly man ſtabliſheth reaſon to raigne as Queene within himſelf, while ſometime he is tickled with entiſements of pleaſure, ſometime deceiued with falſe ſemblance of good things, ſometime importunatly ſtriken with immoderate affections, & violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or ſtrings of ſinowes, as Plato ſaith. For which reaſon Cicero ſaith, that theſe ſparkes giuen by nature, are with peruerſe opinions and euil maners by and by quenched: But when ſuch diſeaſes haue once gotten places in the mindes of men, they graunt that they doe more outragiouſly ouerflow, than that they eaſily may be reſtrained: and they ſtick not to cõpare them to wild horſes which throwing away reaſon as it were caſting the Chariot driuen, do range vnruledly & without meaſure. But this they make no queſtion of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (ſay they) it be in our choiſe to do this or that, then is it alſo in our choiſe not to do. Now if it be in our choiſe not to do, then is it alſo to do, but of free choiſe we ſeeme to do thoſe things that we do, and to forbeare thoſe things that we forbeare. Therefore if we do any good thing when we liſt, wee may likewiſe leaue it vndone; if we do any euil, we may alſo eſchewe the ſame. Yet some of them haue burst foorth into so great licentiousnesse, that they haue boasted that it is in deede Gods gift that wee liue, but our owne that we liue well and holily. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Cotta: because euery man himselfe getteth vertue to himself, therefore neuer any of the wise men did thanke God for it. For (saith he) for vertue wee be praised, & in vertue wee glorie, which should not bee if it were the gifte of God, & not of our selues. And a litle after: This is the iudgement of all men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisedome to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers: that the reason of mans vnderstanding is sufficient for a right gouernance: that Will being subiect to it, is in deede moued by Sense to euill things. But euen as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

Philoſophers imagine that man hath in and of himſelfe habilitie as to be vicious, ſo to make himſelf vertuous.

The ancient fathers for feare of contradicting the common receiued opinion of Philosophers, and least they should noozle men in sloth haue too much aduanced the strength of mans both reason and vvill.

4 Among the Ecclesiasticall writers, albeit there haue bene none that did not acknowledg both that the soundnesse of reason in man hath beene sore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedinglie entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much assented to the Philosophers, of which the auncient, as I thinke, did so much aduaunce the streinght of man vpon this consideration, lest if they should haue expressely confessed his weakenesse, first they should haue made the Philosophers, with whom they then contended, to laugh at them: and then least they should giue to ỹ flesh which of it selfe was dull to goodnes, a new occasion of slouthfulnes. Therefore because they would not teach any thing that were an absurditie in the common iudgement of men, their studie was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that seconde point, not to make place for slothfulnesse, appeareth by their owne wordes. Chrysostome hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill things in our owne power, hee hath giuen vs Freedome of election, and he withholdeth not the vnwilling, but embraceth the willing. Againe, Oftentimes he that is euil, if hee will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slouthfulnesse falleth and becommeth euil, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layth not necessitie vpon vs, but giuing conuenient remedies, suffreth all to lye in the mynde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse wee be holpen by the grace of God, wee can neuer doe any thing well: so vnlesse wee bring that which is our owne, wee cannot obtaine the fauour of God. And hee had saide before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but wee must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar worde with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God will supply the rest. Wherewith agreeth that which Hierom sayeth, that it is our parte to begin, but Gods to make an ende: our part to offer what we can, his to fulfill what we cannot. You see nowe that in these sayings they gaue to man towarde the studie of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dulnesse that was naturally in vs. But if they did proue that in it onely wee sinned, with what apt handeling they haue done the same, we shal after see. Surely that the sayings which wee haue rehearsed are most false, shall byandby appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other and among them principally Chrysostome haue passed measure in aduauncing the power of mans will, yet all the olde writers, except Augustine, doe in this point so either varie, or wauer, or speake doubtfully, that in manner no certaintie can be gathered of their writings. Therefore wee will not tary vpon exact reckening of euerie one of their sayings, but here and there wee will touch out of euery one of them so much as the plaine declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euery one for himselfe sought praise of wit, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by litle and litle one after another into worse & worse, til it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his sensuall part, and to haue reason altogether, and will for the more part vncorrupted. In the meane time this flewe about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away. But to what meaning that tended, scarsely the hundreth man did euen sleightly vnderstand. As for my parte, if I woulde plainly shewe of what sort is the corruption of nature, I could be easily contented with these wordes. But it is much materiall that it be heedefully weyed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoiled of his supernaturall gifts, is able to do. They therefore which boasted themselues to be the disciples of Christ, spake of this matter too much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewil stil remained among the Latines, as if man had stil abiden in vncorrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the word much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say, of her owne power, as if a man had the power himselfe. Because therefore al, euen to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Free wil, & many of them that would seeme excellent, cannot tel how farre it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it self, & then let vs proceede on by the simplicitie of the Scripture, to shewe what man is able to do of his own nature, toward good or euil. What Free will is, where as it is a word commonly found in al mens writings, yet fewe haue defined. Yet it seemeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he said that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euil, and a power of will to choose either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euil when grace ceasseth. Bernard, while he meaneth to speake more subtelly, speaketh more darkely, which sayeth, that it is a consent by reason of the libertie of wil that cannot be lost, & the iudgement of reason that cannot be auoyded. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar enough, which saith that it is a power to kepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombard and the other Scholemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was plainer and did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they saw that will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of their owne such things as they thought either to be better, or to serue for plainer declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to bee referred to reason, whose part is to discerne betweene good and euil things: and the adiectiue Free, pertaineth properly to will, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore, sith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Par. 1. quæst. 83. art. 3. Thomas sayeth, that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of choosing, which being mixt of vnderstanding & appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue wee in what things they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to say, in reason and will. Now remaineth that we shortly see how much they giue to either part.

Diuers kinds of spirituall freedome
5 They are commonly wont to make subiect to the free determination of man, things meane, that is which belong not to the kingdome of God: but they do referre true righteousnesse to the special grace of God & spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the author of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shewe, he reckeneth vp three sortes of Willes, the first Sensitiue, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he sayeth, that man hath the first two at his owne libertie, the last is the worke of the holy Ghost in man. Which whether it be true or not, shalbe entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Hereby it commeth to passe, that when writers speake of free will, they principally seeke not what it is able to do to ciuil or outward doings, but what it can doe to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shewe a good reason. There hath bene a distinction receiued in Schooles, that reckneth vp three sortes of freedomes, the first from necessitie, the second from sinne, the third from miserie. Of which the first so naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sin. This distinction I willingly receiue, sauing that there necessitie is wrongfully confounded with compulsion: betwene which two how much difference ther is, and how necessarie that difference is to be considered, shal appeare in another place.

The schoolemens opinion touching free vvill.
6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controuersie that man hath not free will to do good workes, vnlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I doe not passe vpon these phrantike men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made plaine, whether he be altogether depriued of power to do well, or whether hee haue yet some power, although it be but litle & weake, which by it selfe in deede can do nothing, but by helpe of grace doeth also her part. While the Master of the Sentences goeth about to make that plaine, he sayeth there are two sortes of grace necessarie for vs, whereby wee may be made meete to doe a good worke: the one they call a working grace, whereby wee effectually will to doe good: the other a Together working grace, which followeth good wil in helping it. In which diuision this I mislike, that while he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he secretly sheweth his meaning that man alreadie of his owne nature, after a certaine manner, desireth good though vneffectually. As Bernard affirming that good will is in deede the worke of God, yet this he graunteth to man, that of his owne motion he desireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Lombard would seeme to haue borowed this diuision. In the second part of the diuision, the doubtfulnes of speach offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore work together with the Second grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make void the first grace by refusing it, or to confirm it by obediently following it. Whereas the author of the booke, Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus expresse it, that it is free for them that vse the iudgement of reason, to depart from grace, that it may be worthie reward not to haue departed, & that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merits, by whose wil it was possible to haue not bin done. These two things I had wil to note by ỹ way, that now, reader, thou maist see how much I dissent from the soundest sort of the schoolemen. For I do much farther differ from the later Sophisters, euen so much as they be farther gone from the auncient time. But yet somwhat, after such a sort as it is, we perceiue by this diuisiō, after what maner they haue giuen free wil to man. For at length Lombard saith, that we haue not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to doe or to thinke good and euill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedom is not hindered, although we be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, & can do nothing but sinne.

7 Therefore, man shalbe said to haue free will after this sort, not because he hath a free choise as wel of good as of euil, but because he doeth euil by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well saide: but to what purpose was it to garnish so small a matter with so proude a title? A goodly libertie forsooth, if man be not compelled to serue sinne: so is he yet a willing seruant that his will is holden fast bound with the fetters of sinne. Truely I do abhorre striuing about wordes wherewith the Church is vainely wearied, but I thinke that such wordes are with great religious carefulnesse to bee taken heede of, which sounde of any absurditie, specially where the errour is hurtful. How fewe I pray you, are there, which when they heare that free will is assigned to man, do not by and by conceiue, that he is lorde both of his owne mind & wil, and that he is able of himself to turne himself to whether part he will? But some one wil say: that perill shalbe taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bent to falsitie, he wil sooner conceiue an error of one litle worde, than a trueth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this verie worde, than is to be wished. For omitting that exposition of the old writers, all they in maner that came after, while they sticke vpon the naturall signification of the worde, haue bin caried into a trust of themselues that bringeth them to destruction.

The danger of vsing the name of free will though we take it in a harmlesse meaning.

8 But if the authoritie of the fathers do moue vs, they haue in deed continually ỹ word in their mouth: but they do withal declare, how much they esteeme the vse of it. First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to call it Bond will. In one place he is angrie with them ỹ denie free will: but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he saieth only, Let not any man be so bolde to deny the freedome of will, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in an other place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do binde and conquere it.

S. Augustines meaning when he vseth the name of free will is sound & good.

Againe,

De perfec. iustic. Enchir. ad Laur. cap. 30. Ad Bonif. li. 3. c. 8 Ibid. cap. 7. Ad Boni. li. 1. c. 3. Ad Boni. li. 3. c. 7 De verb. Apost. sermone. 3. De spiritu & litera. cap 30.

Againe, that when will was ouercome with sinne whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedome. Againe, that man hauing ill vsed his free will, lost both himself & it. Againe, free wil is become captiue, that it can do nothing toward righteousnes. Againe, that it cannot be free, which the grace of god hath not made free. Againe, that the iustice of God is not fulfilled when the law commaundeth, and man doeth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God obeyeth. And of all these things he shortly rendreth a cause, when in another place he writeth, that man receiued great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in another place, after that he had shewed that free will is stablished by grace, he sharply inueyeth against them that take it vpon them without grace. Why therefore (saith he) dare wretched men either be proud of free wil before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be alreadie made free? And they mark not that in the verie name of free will, is mention of freedom. But where the spirite of the Lorde is, there is freedom. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will: For of whome a man is ouercome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondseruants, which saith: Without mee ye can do nothing? Beside that also in an other place hee seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he sayde, that will was in deede free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondseruant of sinne. Which saying in another place hee repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousnesse, but by choyse of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Sauiour. Hee that doeth testifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a freemaking or manumission from righteousnesse, seemeth trimly to mock at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this worde with no euill signification, he shall not be troubled by mee for so doing. But because I thinke it cannot be kept without great perill, and that it should turne to a great benefite to the church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would wish other, if they aske mee counsell, to forbeare it.

That the fathers who in considerations before alleaged Section 4. seeme sometimes to furnish mã vvith hu owne armour, do notvvithstanding giue the praise of all good things to the holy ghost.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great preiudice against my self, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall writers, except Augustine, haue spoken so doubtfully or diuersly in this matter, that no certeinty can be had out of their writings. For some wil so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giuing any voyce herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply and in good faith would haue godly wittes prouided for, which if they wait vppon those mens opinions in this point, they shall alway wauer vncertaine. In such sort doe they sometime teache, man being spoiled of all strength of free will, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doutfulnesse of speech, they nothing, or verie litle esteeming mans strength, haue giuen the praise of all good things to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certain sentences of theirs, whereby that is plainly taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so often repeateth, that wee ought to glorie of nothing, because wee haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoyled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vppon God. What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whome he that reacheth his hand, shall liue? and that the tree of knowledge of good and euil, is the free choise of wil, whereof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall dye? What meaneth that of Chrysostom, that euery man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we haue no good thing of our owne: If man from top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawful to attempt how much the power of free will is able to do, how then may it be lawfull to part the praise of a good worke betweene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort verie many sayings out of other, but least any man should cauil, that I choose out those things only that make for my purpose, and doe craftily leaue out such things as make against mee, therefore I do forbeare such rehearsal Yet this I dare affirme, howsoeuer they be sometime to busie in aduancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strength reposed in God alone. Nowe come I to the simple setting foorth of the trueth, in considering the nature of man.

10 But I am here constrained to repeat that, which in the beginning of this Chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is moste discouraged and throwen downe with conscience of his owne miserie, needinesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath hee best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, least man wil take too much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recouered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his own right, be it neuer so little, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conueying the honor of God to himselfe, become giltie of hainous sacriledge. And truely so oft as this lust inuadeth our mind, ỳ we desire to haue somwhat of our own, which may rest in our selues rather than in God, let vs knowe that this thought is ministred vs by no other counseller, but by him that persuaded our first parents, to haue a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good & euil. If it be the word of the diuell that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vnlesse wee list to take counsell of our enemie. It is pleasant in deede, for a man to haue so much strength of his owne, ỳ he may rest in himself. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many sore sentences make vs afraid, by which we be throwen downe: as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in man, & setteth flesh to be his arme. Again, ỳ God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, & attend vpon his mercy. Againe, that it is he which giueth strength vnto him that fainteth, & vnto him that hath no strength, he encreaseth power, euen the yong men shall faint & be wearie, and the yong men shal stumble and fall, but they that wait vpon the Lord, shal renue their strength. All which sayings tend to this end, that wee leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strength, be it neuer so little, if wee meane to haue God fauourable vnto vs, which resisteth the proud, & giueth grace

A dangerous thing for man to haue an opinion of his owne strength. a blessed thing to mourne vvith the sense and feeling of his owne powertie and inuvarde vveaknes.

Esa. 55. 1. dry ground. Againe, All ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises do testifie, that none are admitted to receiue the blessings of God, but they that pine away with feeling of their owne pouertie. And such promises are not to be passed ouer, as is that of Esay: Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shal the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shalbe thine euerlasting light, & the God thy glorie. The Lord in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his seruants, but because he will himselfe alone appeare glorious in them, hee calleth their confidence farre away, euen from those things, that are counted in their opinion most excellent.

Humilitie therefore a precious vertue, because in acknowledging mans baseneße, Gods highneße is aduanced.

11 Truely, that saying of Chrysostome hath alway exceedingly wel pleased mee, that the foundation of our Wisedome is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, as (sayeth hee) that same Rhetorician being asked, what was the first thing in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the seconde, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the thirde, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske mee of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Seconde, and Thirde time, and alwaies I woulde answere Humilitie. But he meaneth not humilitie, when a man knowing some litle vertue to be in himselfe, abstaineth from pride and hautinesse of minde, but when he truely feeleth himselfe to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humilitie: as in another place hee declareth. Let no man (sayeth he) flatter himselfe: of his owne he is a diuell. That thing whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee sinne which is thine owne, for righteousnesse is Gods. Againe, why is the possibilitie of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maymed, troubled and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defence. Againe, when euery man knoweth that in himselfe he is nothing, and of himselfe hee hath no helpe, his weapons in himselfe are broken, the warres are ceassed. But it is needefull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shiuered in peeces and burnt, that thou remaine vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. Howe much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lorde receiueth thee. So vppon the three score and tenne Psalme he forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteousnesse, that wee may acknowledge the righteousnesse of God: and hee sheweth that God doeth so commende his grace vnto vs, that wee may knowe our selues to be nothing, that wee stand onely by the mercie of God, when of our selues wee are nothing but euill. Let vs not therfore striue here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawen from our saluation which is giuen to him. For as our humblenesse is his hieneße, so the confession of our humbleneße hath his mercy readie for remedie. Neither yet do I require that man not conuinced should willingly yeeld himselfe: nor if hee hath any power, that hee should turne his minde from it, to be subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the disease of selfeloue and desire of victorie, wherewith being blinded, hee thinketh too highly of himselfe, hee should well consider himselfe in the n And the common saying which they haue borowed out of Augustine pleaseth mee well, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made emptie. For in this latter part of supernaturall giftes, they vnderstand as well the light of faith as of righteousnesse, which were sufficient to the attaining of heauenly life and eternall felicitie. Therefore banishing himselfe from the kingdome of God, he was also depriued of the spirituall giftes, wherewith he had beene furnished to the hope of eternall saluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the kingdome of God, that all things that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, vntill by grace of regeneration he recouer them. Of that sort are faith, the loue of God, charitie towarde our neighbours, the studie of holinesse and righteousnesse. All these things, because Christ restoreth them vnto vs, are counted things comming from another to vs, and beside nature, and therfore we gather that they were once taken away. Againe, soundnesse of the vnderstanding minde and vprightnesse of heart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall giftes. For though there remaine somewhat left of vnderstanding and iudgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our vnderstanding is sound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darknesses. And as for our will, the peruersenes thereof is more than sufficiently knowen. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth between good and euil, whereby he vnderstandeth and iudgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether destroied, but it was partly weakened, partly corrupted, so that foule ruines thereof appeare. In this sense doeth Iohn say, Iohn. 1. 5 that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not. In which words both things are plainly expressed, that in the peruerted and degendred nature of man, there shine yet some sparkes ỹ shewe that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from brute beasts, because he is endued with vnderstanding: and yet that this light is choked with great thickenesse of ignorance, that it cannot effectually get abroad. So will, because it is vnseparable from the nature of man, perished not, but was bounde to peruerse desires, that it can couet no good thing. This in deede is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made plaine with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceede according to that first distinction, wherein we deuided the soule of man into vnderstanding and will: let vs first examine the force of vnderstanding. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindnesse, that a man leaue vnto it no manner of skill in any kinde of things, is not onely against the worde of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For wee see that there is planted in man a certaine desire to search out trueth, to which he woulde not aspire at all, but hauing felt some sauour thereof before. This therefore is some sight of mans vnderstanding, that he is naturally drawen with loue of trueth, the neglecting whereof, in brute beastes prooueth a grosse Sense without reason, albeit, this litle desire, such as it is, fainteth before it enter the beginning of her race, because it by and by falleth into vanitie. For the witte of man cannot for dulnesse keepe the right way to search out trueth,

Man through sinne was made emptie of supernatural giftes, as faith, loue, righteousnes: naturall, as both vnderstanding & will, though they be not quite take away, yet the soundnesse of them is lost: the vnsoundnesse of his vnderstanding may be seene both by his often straying in that which he seeketh, & his not seeking that which belongeth most vnto him.

trueth, but strayeth in diuerse errours, and as it were groping in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanish away, so in seeking trueth, it doeth bewray howe vnfit it is to seeke and finde trueth. And then it is sore troubled with another vanitie, that oftentimes it discerneth not those things, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bende it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with fonde curiositie, in searching out things superfluous and nothing woorth: and to things moste necessarie to be knowen, it either taketh no heede, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarse at any time applyeth her studie earnestly vnto them. Of which peruersenesse, whereas the prophane writers doe commonly complaine, it is founde, that all men haue entangled themselues with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when hee had gone through all these studies, in which men thinke themselues to bee verie wise, yet hee pronounceth that they are all vaine and trifling.

Mans naturall capacitie may attain to the knowledge of things belonging to this present life. As first there are in all mens minds certaine seedes of vnderstanding those things vvhereon ciuil order & policie is grounded.

13 Yet doe not all trauailes of Witte so alway become voide, but that it attaineth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferiour things. Yea, and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some little of the higher things, howsoeuer it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceiuing. For when it is carried vppe aboue the compasse of this present life, then is it principally conuinced of her owne weakenesse. Wherefore, that wee may the better see how farre according to the degrees of her abilitie, it proceedeth in euery thing, it is good that I put foorth a distinction. Let this therefore be the distinction, that there is one vnderstanding of earthly things, an other of heauenly things. Earthly things I call those that doe not concerne God and his kingdome, true righteousnesse, and the blessednesse of eternall life, but haue all their respect and relation to this present life, and are as it were contained within the boundes thereof. Heauenly things, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heauenly kingdome. Of the first sort are policie, gouernance of household, all handy craftes, and liberall Sciences. Of the seconde sort are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the rule to frame our life according to it. Concerning the first, this wee must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies togither: hee is also by naturall instinction bent to cheerish and to preserue the fellowship of these companies, therefore wee see that there are in the mindes of all men vniuersall impressions of a certaine ciuil honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that vnderstandeth not, that all companies of men ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiueth not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vnto lawes, because the seedes thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weye not the dissensions and fightings that afterward arise while some desire to peruert lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernement of Kings, that lust strayeth abroade in steede of right, as theeues and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke

that to be vniuſt, which other haue ſtabliſhed for iuſt: and on the other ſide ſtiffely ſaye, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For theſe men doe not therefore hate lawes, becauſe they doe not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raging with headie luſt, doe fight againſt manifeſt reaſon, and for their fantie doe abhorre that, which in vnderſtanding of minde they allowe. The latter ſort of it ſtriuing in ſuch, that taketh not away the firſt conceiuing of equitie. For when men doe ſtriue among themſelues, concerning the pointes of lawes, they agree together in a certaine ſumme of equitie. Wherein is prooued the weakeneſſe of mans wit, which euen then when it ſeemeth to followe the right way, yet halteth and ſtaggereth, but ſtill this remaineth true, that there is ſowne in all men a certaine ſeede of politike order. And that is a large proofe, that in the ordering of this life, no man is voide of the light of reaſon.

Men haue naturally a power & facilitie to learne & finde out artes: vvherin notvvithſtanding the liberalitie of God ſheneth: vvithout vvhich al vvould be as ſome are emen meere naturals.

¶ 14 Nowe do followe the artes, both the liberall, and the handie crafts, in learning whereof, becauſe there is in vs all a certaine aptneſſe, in them alſo doeth appeare the force of mans witte: but albeit, all men be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certaine enough of the common naturall power, that there is almoſt no man founde, whoſe conceite of witte doeth not in ſome arte or other ſhewe foorth it ſelfe. Neither haue they onely a power or facilitie to learne, but alſo to deuiſe in euerie arte ſome newe thing, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath bene learned of an other that went before, which thing, as it mooued Plato erroniouſly to teach, that ſuch conceiuing is nothing elſe, but a calling to remembrance, ſo by good reaſon it ought to compell vs to confeſſe, that the beginning thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. Theſe pointes therefore doe plainly teſtifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuerſall conceiuing of reaſon and of vnderſtanding. Yet is it ſo an vniuerſall benefite, that therein euery man ought for himſelf to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankefulneſſe the creatour himſelfe doeth ſufficiently awake vs, when hee createth naturall fooles, in whome he maketh vs to ſee with what giftes mans ſoule excelleth, if it bee not endued with his light, which is ſo naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gifte of his liberalitie towardes euery man. But the inuention and orderly teaching of the ſame artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a fewe, is no perfect argument of the common conceiuing of wit, yet becauſe without difference it happeneth to the godly and vngodly, it is righfully reckened among naturall giftes.

The skil vvhich Philoſophers had in ſundrie arts & ſciences, ſhevveth vvhat good God hath ſtill left the nature of man enriched vvithall, although he hath robbed & ſtripped himſelf of the chiefeſt giftes vvherevvith God endued him.

15 So oft therefore as wee light vppon prophane writers, let vs be put in minde by that maruellous light of trueth that ſhineth in them, that the wit of man, howe much ſoeuer it be peruerted and fallen from the firſt integritie, is yet ſtill clothed and garniſhed with excellent giftes of God. If we conſider that the ſpirite of God is the onely fountaine of trueth, we will neither refuſe nor deſpiſe the trueth it ſelfe, wherſoeuer it ſhal appeare, except we wil diſhonourably vſe the ſpirite of God: for the giftes of the holy Ghoſt cannot be ſet light by, without contempt and reproch of himſelfe:

And what? Shall wee denie that the trueth shined to the olde Lawyers, which haue set foorth Ciuil order and Discipline with so great equitie? Shall wee say that the Philosophers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall wee say that they had no witte, which by setting in order the arte of speach, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall wee say that they were madde, which in letting foorth Phisicke, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall wee thinke them doting errours of madde men? no, rather wee cannot read the writings of the olde men, concerning these things, without great admiration of their witte. But shall wee thinke any thing praise worthie or excellent, which wee doe not reknowledge to come of God? Let vs be ashamed of so great vnthankefulnesse into which the heathen Poets fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good artes, were the inuentions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men whome the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searching out of inferiour things, let vs learne by such examples, how many good things the Lorde hath left to the nature of man, after that it hath beene spoyled of the true God.

The knowledge of artes and sciences is the gift of the spirit of God: neither is it to be neglected, although before God it be but a vanishing transitorie thing.

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good gifts of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde hee dealeth abroad to whome it pleaseth him. For if it behoued, that the vnderstanding and skill that was required for the framing of the tabernacle, should be powred into Beseleel and Oliab by the spirite of God, it is no maruel if the knowledge of those things which are most excellent in mans life, be saide to be communicated vnto vs by the spirit of God. Neither is there cause why any man should aske, what haue the wicked to doe with Gods spirite, which are altogether estranged from God. For where it is saide that the spirite of God dwelleth in the faithful onely, that is to be vnderstanded of the spirit of sanctification, by the which we are consecrate to God himselfe, to be his temples: yet doth he neuertheless fill, moue and quicken all things with the vertue of the same spirite, and that according to the propertie of euery kind which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue beene the Lordes wil that we should be holpen by the trauell and seruice of the wicked in naturall Philosophie, Dialectike, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: let vs vse it, least if wee neglect the giftes of God, willingly offered in them, wee suffer iust punishment for our slouthfulnes. But least any should thinke a man to be blessed, when vnder the elements of this worlde there is graunted vnto him so great an abilitie to conceiue trueth, it is also to be added that all this power to vnderstande, & the vnderstanding that followeth thereof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where is not a stedfast foundation of trueth. For Augustine teacheth most truely, whome (as we haue saide) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Scholemen are compelled to assent vnto, as the free giftes were taken from man after his fall, so these naturall giftes which remained, were corrupted. Not that they be defiled of themselues in asmuch as they come from God, but because they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that he should haue no praise of them.

17 Let this be the summe: that it is seene that in all mankinde is reason which is proper to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beasts, as brute beastes do differ in sense from things without life. For whereas there be borne certaine naturall fooles and idiots, that default obscureth not the generall grace of God: but rather by such sight we are put in mind, that what is left vnto our selues, ought iustly to be ascribed to the kindnesse of God, because if hee had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawne with it the destruction of our whole nature. But whereas some doe excell in sharpnesse of conceiuing, some other do passe in iudgement, some haue a quicker wit to learne this or that arte: in this varietie God setteth foorth his grace vnto vs, that no man shoulde claime to him selfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods meere liberalitie. For how becõmeth one more excellent than an other, but that in common nature might appeare aboue other the speciall grace of God, which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bound to none. Beside that, God powreth in singular motions, according to the calling of euery man. Of which thing wee meete with many examples in the bookes of the Iudges, where it is saide, that the spirite of the Lord clad them, whom he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble act there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose hearts the Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdome was propheeied of, Samuel said thus: The spirit of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be an other man. And this was continued to the whole course of gouernement: as after it is spoken of Dauid, that the spirite of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in an other place as touching particular motions: yea in Homer men are saide to excell in witte, not onely as Iupiter hath dealt to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased, as were most sharpe and deepe witted, that the wittes of men are in the hand & will of God to rule them at euery moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh wit from the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some markes of the Image of God, which do make difference betweene all mankinde and other creatures.

As God hath in common indued men with reson, so he doth particularly for special purposes powre special motions into them.

Psal. 107. 40.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it commeth to the kingdome of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, wherein our saluation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his lawe. Both in the first two, and in the second properly they that are most wittie, are blinder than molles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many things well and aptly spoken, but yet such as doe alway sauour of a certaine giddie imagination. The Lord gaue them in deed, as is aboue said, a litle tast of his godhead, that they should not pretend ignorance to colour their vngodlinesse: and many times he moued them to speake many things, by confession whereof themselues might be conuinced. But they so sawe the things that they saw, that by such seeing they were not directed to y truth, much lesse did attaine

Touching heauenly things, as the knowledge of god, of his fauour towards vs, and of the way to frame our liues after his will, mans natural reason conceiueth very litle in the first, in the second nothing at all.

vnto it, like as a wayfaring man in the middest of the fielde, for a sodaine moment, seeth farre and wide the glistering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that hee is sooner couered againe with the darkenesse of the night, than he can stirre his foote, so farre is it off that he can be brought into his way by such a help. Beside that, those smale droppes of trueth, wherewith as it were by chaunce, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good will toward vs, without which mans witte must needes be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approcheth, nor goeth towarde, nor once directeth sight vnto this trueth, to vnderstand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

To knowe God is the speciall gift of God.

19 But becaũse wee being drunke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, do verie hardly suffer our selues to be persuaded, that in matters of God it is vtterly blinde and dull: I thinke it shalbe better to confirm it by testimonies of Scripture, than by reasons. This doeth Iohn verie well teach in that place which I euen nowe alleaged, when hee writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which should be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darkenesse, and the darkenesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in deede, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparcle of it, but yet, that with such a light hee comprehendeth not God. And why so? becaũse mans quickenesse of witte, as toward the knowledge of God, is but meere darkenesse. For when the holy Ghost calleth men darkenesse, he at once spoileth them of all ability of spirituall vnderstanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithful which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloud, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he should say: flesh is not capable of so high wisedome to conceiue God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirite of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall reuelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

Iohn 1. 13.

Math. 16. 7.

It is the principal illuminatiõ of the spirite which openeth the eyes of Gods elect: and theirs only to see the things that are of God.

20 If we were persuaded of this which ought to be out of all controuersie, that our nature wanteth al that, which our heauenly father giueth to his elect by the spirit of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt vpon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when he saith, that no man can call Iesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seeing the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, that no man can receiue any thing, vnlesse it be giuen him from aboue. And that he meaneth by gifte a speciall illumination, and not a common gift of nature, appeareth hereby, that he complaineth, in so many wordes as he had spoken to commend Christ to his disciples, he preuailed nothing. I see (saith he) that wordes are nothing to informe mens mindes concerning diuine things, vnlesse the Lord giue vnderstanding by his spirite. Yea, and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes growe wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefite of God. Thine eyes (sayeth he) haue seene those those great tokens and wonders, &, The Lord hath not giuen thee a heart to vnderstand, nor eares to heare, nor eyes to see. What should he expresse more, if he called vs blockes in considering the workes of God? Whereupon the Lorde by the Prophet promiseth for a great grace, that hee will giue the Israelites a heart, that they may knowe him: signifying thereby, that mans wit is onely so much spiritually wise, as it is lightened by him. And this Christ plainly confirmed with his owne mouth, when he sayeth, that no man can come to him, but he to whom it shalbe giuen from the Father. What? is not he himselfe the liuely image of the Father in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed vnto vs? Therefore he could not better shewe what our power is to knowe God, than when he sayeth, that we haue no eyes to see his image, where it is so openly set present before vs. What? came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will vnto men? And did he not faithfully do his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inward scholemaster, the holy Ghost, set open the way to our mindes. Therefore none come to him, but they that haue heard and beene taught of the Father. What manner way of learning and hearing is this? Euen, when the holy Ghost by marvellous and singular vertue formeth the eares to heare, and the mindes to vnderstand. And least that should seeme strange, he alleageth the prophesie of Esay, where when he promiseth the repairing of the Church, that they which shalbe gathered together to saluation, shal be taught of the Lorde. If God there foresheweth some peculiar thing concerning his electes, it is euident that he speaketh not of that kinde of learning that was also cõmon to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that wee must vnderstand it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy ghost by his enlightening shall make a new mind. But Paul speaketh most plainly of all, which of purpose entring into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisedome of folly and vanitie, and vtterly brought it to nought, at the last concludeth thus: that the naturall man cannot perceiue those things that are of the spirite of God: they are fooleshnesse vnto him, and he cannot vnderstand them, because they are spiritually iudged. Whome doeth hee call naturall? euen him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. Hee I say comprehendeth nothing in the spirituall mysteries of God. Why so? is it because by slouthfulnes he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would trauel neuer so much, he can doe nothing, because forsooth they are spiritually iudged. What meaneth that? because being vtterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely reuelation of the spirite: so that they are reckened for folly where the spirite of God giueth not light. Before he had auanced those things that God hath prepared for them that loue him, aboue the capacitie of eyes, eares and mindes. Yea, he testifieth that mans wisedom was as a certaine veile, whereby mans minde was kept from seeing God. What meane wee? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisedome of this worlde is made folly by God: and shal we forsooth giue vnto it sharpnesse of vnderstanding, whereby it may pearce to the secrete places of the heauenly kingdome? Farre be such beastlines from vs.

Ephe. 1. 15.

21 And so that which here he taketh away from men, in another place in a prayer, he giueth it to God alone. God (saith he) & the father of glorie, giue to you the spirite of wisedome & reuelation. Now thou heares that all wisedome and reuelation is the gifte of God. What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your mind. Surely if they neede a newe reuelation, then are they blind of themselues. It followeth after: That ye may know what is the hope of your calling. &c. Therefore he confesseth, that the wittes of men are not capable of so great vnderstanding, to knowe their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedie that dulnesse or vnskilfulnesse, when by the doctrine of his worde hee directeth mans vnderstanding, whither without a guide he could not haue atteyned. For Dauid had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisedome that may bee desired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to haue his eyes opened, that Psal. 139. 18. he may consider the mysteries of the same lawe. By which speech truely he secretly saith, that the sunne riseth vpon the earth where the worde of God shineth to men: but they get not much thereby, vntill he himselfe, that is
Iac. 1. 17. therefore called the father of lightes, doe giue them or open their eyes, because whereseuer he shineth not with his spirit, all thinges are possessed with darkenesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best Iohn 14. 26. scholemaster: yet if they had not needed the spirit of trueth to instruct their mindes in that same doctrine which they had heard before, hee would not haue bidden them looke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, wee doe thereby confesse that we want: & God in that that he promiseth it vs, doeth argue our neede, let no man doubt to confesse that he is so much able to vnderstande the mysteries of God as he is enlightned with his grace. He that giueth to himselfe more vnderstanding, is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowledge his owne blindnesse.

There is in man some knowledge of that vvhich serueth for the vvell framing of his life: namely a certaine conscience of good and euil.
Rom. 2. 14.

22 Nowe remaineth the thirde pointe, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which wee doe rightly call the knowledge of the workes of righteousnesse, wherein mans wit seemeth to bee of somewhat more sharpe sight, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the gentiles which haue no lawe, while they doe the workes of the lawe, are to themselues in steede of a lawe, and do shewe the law written in their harts, their consciences bearing them witnes, and their thoughtes accusing them within themselues or excusing them before the iudgement of God. If the Gentiles haue righteousnes naturally grauen in their mindes, surely we can not say that wee are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more cõmon, than that man by the law naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the lawe is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, howe farre it bringeth them towarde the marke of reason and trueth. The same is also euident by the wordes of Paul, if a man doe marke the placing of them. Hee had sayde a little before, that they which sinned in the lawe, are iudged by the lawe, they that haue sinned without lawe doe perish without lawe. Because this might seeme vnreasonable, that the Gentiles should perish without any iudgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in steede of a law, and there-therefore is ſufficient fore their iuſt damnation. Therefor the ende of the lawe naturall is, that man may be made inexcuſable. And it ſhalbe defined not ill after this ſort, that it is a knowledge of conſcience, that ſufficiently diſcerneth betweene iuſt and vniuſt, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proued guiltie by their owne teſtimonie. Such is the tenderneſſe of man towarde himſelfe, that in doing of euils, hee alway turneth away his minde ſo much as he may from the feeling of ſinne. By which reaſon it ſeemeth that Plato was moued to thinke that there is no ſin done but by ignorance. That in deede were fitly ſayde of him, if mens hypocriſie went ſo farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not knowe it ſelfe guiltie before God. But when the ſinner ſeeking to eſchue the iudgement emprinted in him, is nowe and then drawen backe vnto it, & not ſuffered ſo to winke, but that he be compelled whether he wil or no, ſometime to open his eyes: it is falſely ſaide that he ſinneth onely by ignorance. In Protagora.

23 Themiſtius ſaith more truely, which teacheth that vnderſtanding is ſeldome deceiued in the generall defining of thinges, that it is blindneſſe when it goeth any further, that is, when it commeth downe to the ſpeciall caſe. Euery man, if it be generally asked, wil affirme, that manſlaughter is euill: but he that conſpireth to kill his enimies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, priuately he will flatter himſelfe. This is ignorance, when a man cõming to the ſpeciall caſe forgetteth the rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the generall queſtion. Of which thing Auguſtine diſcourſeth very finely in his expoſition of the firſt verſe of the lvij. Pſalme: albeit the ſame thing is not continuall. For ſometime the ſhamefulnes of the euill deede ſo preſſeth the conſcience, that not deceiuing himſelfe vnder falſe reſemblance of a good thing, but wittingly & willingly he runneth into euill. Out of which affection came theſe ſayinges: I ſee the better and allow it, but I follow the worſe. Wherefore, me thinke, Ariſtotle hath very aptly made diſtinction betweene Incontinence & intemperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he ſaith, that there by reaſon of troubled affection or paſſion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euill in his owne act, which it generally ſeeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentance immediatly followeth. But intemperance is not extinguiſhed or broken by feeling of ſinne, but on the other ſide obſtinately ſtandeth ſtill in her conceiued choiſe of euill.

The mind vvhich knovveth general ly that euil muſt be ſhunned is nõvvithſtanding blind in diſcerning particularly vvhat it ſhould ſhun as euil, and carried ſometimes vvittingly to embrace that euil vvhich it knovveth. Paraph. in lib. 3. de anima. cap. 46. Medæa apud Ouidium. Ethic. 7. ca. 3.

24 Now when thou hearеſt iudgement vniuerſally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not euery ſounde and perfect iudgement. For if mens heartes are furniſhed with choiſe of iuſt and vniuſt, only to this end, that they ſhould not pretende ignorance, it is not then needefull to ſee the trueth in euery thing. But it is enough & more, that they vnderſtand ſo farre that they cannot eſcape away, but being conuict by witneſſe of their conſcience, they euen now alreadie begin to tremble at the iudgement ſeat of God. And if we will trie our reaſon by the law of God, which is the examplar of true righteouſneſſe, we ſhall find how many wayes it is blinde. Truly it attaineth not at all to thoſe that are the chiefe thinges in the Firſt table, as of confidence in God, of giuing to him the praiſe of ſtrength and righteouſneſſe,

The vnderſtanding attaineth not at all to the chiefeſt duties of the firſt table of the lavv of God: in the ſecond although it perceiue more yet in manie things it faileth & neuer marketh that the ſecret tickling deſire vnto ſinne is ſinne.

teousneſſe, of calling vpon his name, of the true keeping of Sabbat. What ſoule euer by naturall ſenſe did ſmell out, that the lawfull worſhipping of God conſiſteth in theſe & like things? For when prophane men wil worſhip God, although they be called away an hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway ſlide backe thither againe. They denie in deede that ſacrifices do pleaſe God, vnleſſe there be adioyned a pureneſſe of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceiue ſomewhat of the ſpirituall worſhipping of God, which yet they by and by corrupt with falſe inuentions. For it can neuer be perſuaded them, that all is true that the lawe preſcribeth of it. Shal I ſay, that that wit excelleth in any ſharpe vnderſtanding, which can neither of it ſelfe be wiſe, nor harken to teaching? In the commaundements of the Second table it hath ſome more vnderſtanding, by ſo much as they came neerer to the preſeruation of ciuil fellowſhip among men. Albeit euen herein alſo it is found manie times to faile. To euery excellent nature it ſeemeth moſt vnreaſonable, to ſuffer an vniuſt, & too imperious a maner of gouerning ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the iudgement of mans reaſon is none other, but that it is the part of a ſeruile & baſe courage, to ſuffer it patiently: and againe, the parte of an honeſt & free borne heart, to ſhake it off. And reuenge of iniuries is reckened for no fault among the Philoſophers. But the Lorde condemning that too much nobleneſſe of courage, commaundeth his to keepe the ſame patience that is ſo ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our vnderſtanding marketh not concupiſcence at all. For a naturall man ſuffereth not himſelfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diſeaſes of his deſires. The light of nature is choked vp, before that it come to the firſt entrie of this bottomleſſe depth. For when the Philoſophers note immoderate motions of minde for faults, they meane thoſe motions that appeare and ſhewe forth themſelues by groſſe tokens, but they make no account of thoſe euil deſires that do gently tickle the minde.

Our vnderſtanding is altogether impotent & blind, except it be by grace illuminated not once but continually in euery diuine & heauenly thing vvhich vve haue to learn

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthily found fault withall before, for that he imputed all ſinnes to ignorance, ſo is their opinion to be reiected, which teach that purpoſed malice and frowardneſſe is vſed in all ſinnes. For wee finde it too much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reaſon is ouerwhelmed with ſo many ſortes of being deceiued, is ſubiect to ſo many errours, ſtumbleth at ſo many ſtayes, is entangled with ſo many ſtraites, that it is farre from ſure directing. But how litle it is eſteemed before the Lorde in all partes of our life, Paul ſheweth when he ſayeth, that we are not ſufficient to think any thing of our ſelues, as of our ſelues. Hee ſpeaketh not of wil or affection, but he taketh alſo this away from vs, that we ſhould not thinke that it can come in our mindes how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, inſight, vnderſtanding and heede ſo corrupted, that it can deuiſe or thinke vpon nothing that is right before the Lord? that ſeemeth too hard to vs, that doe vnwillingly ſuffer our ſelues to be ſpoyled of the ſharpneſſe of reaſon, which we account a moſt precious gift. But to the holy Ghoſt it ſeemeth moſt full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughts of wiſe men are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that al the inuention of mans heart is onely euil. If all that our witte conceiueth deuiseth vpon, purposeth & goeth about, is alway euill, how can it come in our mindes to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whome onely holinesse and righteousnes is acceptable? So is it to be seene, that the reason of our mind, which way soeuer it turne it selfe, is miserably subiect to vanitie. Dauid knew this weakenesse in himselfe, when he prayed to haue vnderstanding giuen him, to learne the Lords commandements aright. For he secretely sayeth therein, that his owne wit sufficeth him not, which desireth to haue a newe giuen him. And that not only once, but almost tenne times, in one Psalme, he repeateth ỹ same prayer. By which repeting he priuily declareth, with how great neede he is driuen to pray it. And that which he prayeth for him selfe alone, Paul commonly vseth to pray for the Churches. We cease not (saith he) to pray for you, and to desire that ye may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisedome and spirituall vnderstanding, that yee may walke worthily of God &c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that hee doeth withall testifie, that it lyeth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledged this defaut of reason to vnderstand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than ỹ light of the sunne is for our eyes. And not content with that, he addeth a correction of that, saying, that we lift vp our eyes to see the light: but the eyes of our minde lye shut, vnlesse the Lorde open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightened one day alone, that they may afterwarde see by themselues: for that which I euen now alleged out of Paul, belongeth to continual proceedings & encreasings. And this doth Dauid expresly set out in these words: With my whole heart haue I sought thee, make mee not to stray from thy commaundements. For when he had beene regenerated, & had not slenderly profited in true godlinesse, yet hee confesseth, that for euery moment he needeth continuall direction, least he should swarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in an other place hee prayeth to haue the right spirite renued, which he had lost by his own fault, because it belongeth to the same God to restore vnto vs the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

26 Nowe is will to be examined, wherein standeth the chiefe libertie of free choise, for it hath bin alreadie seene, that choise doth rather belong to wil, than to vnderstanding. First, ỹ this thing which the Philosophers haue taught, & is receiued with common consent, that is, ỹ all things by naturall instinction desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to ỹ vprightnesse of mans wil: Let vs marke that the force of free wil, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather proceedeth of ỹ inclination of the essence, than of the aduisement of the vnderstanding minde. For euen the schoolemen do confesse, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it self to obiects, whereby they meane that the obiect of appetite must be such as may be subiect to choise, and goe before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truely, if a man consider what is the naturall desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beastes. For they also desire to be wel, and when any shewe of good appeareth that moueth their sense, they follow it. But man doth neither chose by reason, ỹ he may follow with diligence that thing which is in deede good for him, according to the excellencie of his immortal nature, nor taketh reason to counsel, nor bendeth his mind, but without reason, without counsel, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of wil, if a man by sense of nature be caried to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discerne good by right reason, and when he hath known it, that he chose it, & when he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But least any man should doubt, there is to be noted a double sophisticall argument. For appetite is not here called the proper manner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or iustice, but of estate, as we say: This man is well, or in good case. Finally, although a man do neuer so much desire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternall blessednesse is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspireth vnto it, but by the mouing of the holy Ghost. Wherefore, sith the naturall desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to proue the freedome of will, no more than in metals and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other things, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euil: or whether it keepeth still any parcel vnhurt, frō whence do growe good desires.

It is not sufficient to confesse that grace maketh the desires of our vvil effectual, vvhich othervvise vvold not be able to attaine any good thing vvhich is vvished for: but vvee must acknovvledge that it is the grace of the holy ghost vvhich vvorketh in vs the very first beginning to thinke of vvishing vvell.
Rom. 7. 15.
Gal. 5. 17.

27 They that do attribute to the first grace of God; that we wil effectually, seeme on the other side to say secretly, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it cannot growe to a perfect affection, or raise vp any endeuour. And there is no doubt that the scholmen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the olde writers: forasmuch as they are wont to consider man in pure naturall things, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these words: I do not the good ẏ I woulde, but the euil that I would not, that I doe. To will is present vnto mee, but to performe it, I find not. But after this maner is the discourse ẏ Paul there followeth, altogether wrongfully peruerted. For he entreateth of the Christian wrastling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithful continually feele within themselues, in the battell of the flesh & the spirit. But the spirit is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, ẏ when he had said, that there dwelleth no goodnes in him, hee addeth an exposition, that hee meaneth it of his flesh And therfore he saith, that it is not he that doth the euil, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in mee, that is, in my flesh? Euen as much as if he had said thus: God dwelleth not in me of my self, for there is no good to be found in my flesh. Hereupon followeth that manner of excuse: I my selfe doe not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which do with the chiefe part of their soule tende vnto good. Now, the conclusion that is adioyned after, declareth all this matter euidently. I am delited (saith he) with the lawe, according to the inward man: But I see an other lawe in my members, fighting against the lawe of my minde. Who hath such a striuing in himself, but he that being regenerate by the spirit of God,

carieth the leauings of his flesh about with him? Therfore Augustine, where as once he had thought, that that had beene spoken of the nature of man, reuoked his exposition as false, and ill agreeing together. And truely, if wee allow this, that men without grace haue som motions to good, though they be but small, what shal we answere to the Apostle which sayeth, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall wee aunswere to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that euerie inuention of mans heart is onely euill? Wherefore, sith they haue stumbled by false taking of one place, there is no cause why wee shoulde staye vppon their iudgement. Let rather this saying of Christ preuaile. Hee that doeth sinne is the seruant of sinne. Wee are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all holden vnder the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole man bee subiect to the dominion of sinne, then must it needes be, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, be bound fast with most straite bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paul would not stande together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did goe before the grace of the Holy Ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triflingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull do pray to haue their heart formed to the obedience of the lawe, as Dauid doeth in many places: yet it is to bee noted, that euen that desire of praying is from God. Which wee may gather of his wordes, for when he wisheth to haue a cleane heart created within him, surely he taketh not on himselfe the beginning of creation. Therefore, let rather this saying of Augustine haue place with vs: God will preuent thee in all things: And sometime preuent thou his wrath. Howe? Confesse that thou hast all these things of God, that whatsoeuer good thou hast, is of him: whatsoeuer euill, it is of thy selfe. And a little after: Nothing is ours but sinne.

The iii. Chapter.

That out of the corrupt nature of man proceedeth nothing but damnable.

BVT man cannot be any way better knowen in either parte of his soule, than if hee come forth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If hee be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easie to proue, then is hee prooued to bee a verie miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for as much as it is enimitie against God; and so is not subiect, nor can bee subiect to the lawe of God. Is flesh so peruerse, that with all her affection shee continually vseth enimitie against God? that she cannot agree with the righteousnesse of the law of God? Finally, that shee can bring foorth nothing but matter of death? Nowe, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth only to the sensuall, and not the higher part of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must bee borne againe, because hee is flesh. Hee commaundeth not to be borne againe according to the body. But in mind he is not borne againe, if a part of it be it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doeth the compariſon, ſet in both places, confirme. For the ſpirite is ſo compared againſt the fleſh, that there is left no meane thing betweene them. Therefore whatſoeuer is not ſpiritual in man, is after the ſame reaſon called fleſhly. But wee haue nothing of the Spirit but by regeneration. It is therefore fleſh whatſoeuer wee haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwiſe wee could haue any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paul, where after he had deſcribed the old man, whome he had ſaid to be corrupt with concupiſcences of errour, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the ſpirite of our mind: you ſee he doth not place vnlawfull and euil luſtes onely in the ſenſitiue part, but alſo in the verie mind, and therefore requireth a renewing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out ſuch an image of mans nature, as did ſhewe that there was no part wherein we were not corrupted and peruerted: for whereas he writeth that all nations doe walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in vnderſtanding, eſtranged from the life of God, by reaſon of the ignorance that is in them, and the blindneſſe of their heart: it is no doubt that this is ſpoken of al them whom the Lord hath not reformed to the vprightneſſe both of his wiſedome and iuſtice: which is alſo made more plaine by the compariſon by and by adioyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not ſo learned Chriſt. For of theſe wordes wee gather, that the grace of Chriſt is the onely remedie whereby we be deliuered from that blindneſſe, and the euils that enſue thereof. For ſo had Eſay alſo prophecied of the kingdome of Chriſt, when he promiſed, ỳ the Lorde ſhould be an euerlaſting light to his Church, when yet darkeneſſe couered the earth, and a miſt the peoples. Whereas he teſtifieth, that the light of God ſhal ariſe onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkeneſſe and blindneſſe. I will not rehearſe particularly ſuch things as are writen euery where, ſpecially in the Pſalmes and in the Prophets againſt the vanitie of man. It is a great thing that Dauid writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he ſhall be vayner than vanitie it ſelfe. His wit is wounded with a greeuous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are ſcorned as fooliſh, trifling, madde and peruerſe.

2 No eaſier is the condemnation of the heart, when it is called guilefull and peruerſe aboue all things: but becauſe I ſtudie to be ſhort, I wil be content with one place alone, but ſuch a one as ſhalbe like a moſt bright looking glaſſe, wherein wee may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Apoſtle, when he goeth about to throw downe the arrogancie of mankind, doth it by theſe teſtimonies: That there is not one righteous mã, there is not one man that vnderſtandeth or that ſeeketh God, Al are gone out of the way, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doeth good, no not one: their throte is an open ſepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poiſon of Serpents is vnder their lippes, whoſe mouth is full of curſing and bitterneſſe: whoſe feete are ſwift to ſhedde bloude, in whoſe wayes is ſorrowe and vnhappineſſe, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes. With theſe thunderboltes hee inueyeth, not againſt certaine men, but againſt the whole nation of the ſonnes of Adam. Neither declaimeth hee againſt the corrupt manners of one or two

ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to teach rather that all men are oppressed with calamitie, impossible to be ouercome, from which they cannot get vp againe, vnlesse they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And because, that could not be proued vnlesse it had beene by the ouerthrowe and destruction of nature, hee brought foorth these testimonies whereby is prooued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that men are such as they bee here described, not only by fault of euill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument cannot stande, that there is no saluation for man but by the mercie of God, because hee is in himselfe vtterly lost and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in prooving the applying of these testimonies that no man should thinke them vnfitly vsed. I will so take them as if they had beene first spoken by Paul, and not taken out of the Prophets. First he taketh away from man righteousnesse, that is integritie and pureneſſe, and then vnderstanding. The want of vnderstanding, he proueth by Apostasie or departing from God, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisedome. But that want must needes happen to them that are fallen away from God. Hee sayeth further, that all are gone out of the way and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doth good, and then he adioyneth the haynous faults, wherewith they defile their members that are once let loose into wickednesse Last of all he testifieth that they are voide of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes should haue bin directed. If these be the inheritable giftes of mankinde, it is in vaine to seeke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I grant that not all these faultes do appeare in euery man: yet can it not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the hearts of al men. For as the body while it alreadie fostreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, cannot be called healthie: no more can ỹ soule be reckened sound, while it swarmeth ful of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all points. For in the bodie be it neuer so much diseased, there remaineth a quickenesse of life: but the soule being drowned in this gulfe of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath bin before assoyled, nowe riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there haue bin some, which by guiding of nature haue bin bent to vertue in al their life. And I regard it not, though many slippings may be noted in their maners: yet by the verie studie of honestie they haue shewed a proofe, that there was some pureneſſe in their nature. What reward such vertues haue before God, although wee will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merites of workes, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessarie for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that wee should not thinke mans nature altogether corrupt, for that by her instruction some men haue not onely excelled in some noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselues most honestly. But here wee must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardly to restraine it. For if the Lord would suffer the mindes of all men as it were with lose reines to runne wildly into all sortes of lustes, without doubt there would be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleeue, that al those euils wherewith Paul condemneth all nature, are most truely sayde of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose feete are swift to shed bloud, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throtes like vnto open Sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lippes venomous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruersenesse, whose eyes are bent to entrappings, their heartes lifte vp dispiteously to triumph ouer other, and all the partes of them applyed to infinite mischeeues. If euerie soule be subiect to al such monsters, as the Apostle boldly pronounceth, truely we see what would come to passe, if the Lorde would suffer the lust of man to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beast that is so hedlong caried away, there is no streame be it neuer so swift and strong, whereof the ouerflowing is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his elect by this meane that wee will by and by set forth. In some he onely restraineth thē with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so farre as he foreseeth to be expedient for preseruing of the vniuersitie of things. Hereby some are holdē in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not foorth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they doe for a great part not hide their vncleannesse. Some because they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, doe after a certaine sorte aspire toward it. Some rise vp aboue the common sort, that by their maiestie they may keepe other in their duetie. So God by his prouidence bridleth the peruersnesse of nature, that it breake not forth into doing: but he cleanseth it not within.

The morall honestie of prophane men vno argumẽt of puritie in nature, because it commeth not of them but of the grace of God vvorking in them: not the grace that regenerateth the heart, but that bridleth onely & restraineth the perverſneſſe of naturall inclination.

Rom. 3. 10.

4 But yet the doubt is not dissolued. For either wee must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or else in Camillus wee shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I graunt in deede that those goodly gifts which were in Camillus both were the gifts of God and seeme worthie to be commended, if they be weyed by themselues, but howe shall they be proues of naturall goodnesse in him? must wee not returne to the minde, and frame our argument in this sorte? If a naturall man excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power towarde the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse aud crooked, and following any thing rather than vpright streightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that he was a naturall man. Nowe what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you rehearse vnto mee in this behalfe, if in the greatest shewe of pureneſse it be founde that he is alway carried to corruption? Therefore, least yee commende a man for vertue, whose vices deceiue you vnder vertues Image, do not so giue vnto the will of man power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remaineth fast in her owne peruersnesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easie solution of this question, that theese are not common giftes of nature, but speciall graces of God, which he diuerslie & to

The vertues of vngodly men doe neither come of naturall goodnesse and by naturall corruption they are so polluted, that in the sight of God they are loathsome.

a certaine measure dealeth amonge men that are otherwise vngodlie. For which reason wee feare not in common speach to call one man well natured, and an other of euill nature, and yet wee cease not to include them both vnder the vniuersall state of mans corruption, but wee shewe what speciall grace God hath beestowed vpon the one, which hee hath not vouchsafed to geeue to the other. When his pleasure was to make Saul king, hee formed him as a newe man. And that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homer, saieth that Kings sonnes are created notable by some singular marke, because God prouiding for mankinde, furnisheth these with a princely nature whome he appointeth to beare gouernement: & out of this storehouse came all the great Captaines that are renoumed in histories. The same is also to be thought of priuate men. But because as euery man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moued him forwarde (with which spot all vertues are defiled, so that they lose all fauour before God) it is to be accompted nothing worth, whatsoeuer seemeth praise worthie in vngodly men, beside that the chief part of vprightnes faileth, where there is no studie to aduaunce the glorie of God, which al they want whom he hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vainly spoken in Esay, that vpon Christ resteth the spirite of the feare of God, whereby wee are taught, that so many as are strange from Christ are without ỹ feare of God, which is the beginning of wisedom. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine shewe, I grant they shall haue praise in the court of policie, and in the common fame of men, but before the heauenly iudgement seate, they shall be of no value to deserue righteousnes. Esay.11.3.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is deteined, it cannot once mooue it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse apply it selfe. For such mouing is the beginning of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholy imputed to the grace of God. As Ieremie prayeth to the Lord to turne him, if he will haue him turned. Whereupon the Prophet in the same Chapter, describing the spiritual redemption of the faithful people, saith that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stronger, meaning with howe straite fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Diuel. Yet Will stil remaineth, which with most bent affection is both enclined and hasteth to sinne. For man was not depriued of Will when he did cast himselfe into this necessitie, but of the soundnes of Will. And Bernard saith not vnaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to Will ill is a default: and therefore simply to Will, is the worke of man: to Will euill, of corrupt nature: to Will well, of grace. Now whereas I say, that will put from libertie is by necessitie drawne or led into euil, it is maruel if that should seeme a hard speach vnto any mā, which neither hath any absurditie in it, nor varieth from ỹ vse of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betweene necessitie & compulsion. But if a man aske them, is not God of necessitie good? is not the diuel of necessitie euill? what can they aunswere? For so is goodnesse knit with Gods diuinitie, that it is no more necessarie that he be God than that he be good. And the diuel is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnesse, that he can do nothing but euil. But nowe if any robber of God do do barke against this and say, that God deserueth small praise for his goodnesse, which he is compelled to keepe: shall not this be a readie aunswere to him, that it commeth to passe by his infinite goodnesse and not by violent impulsion, that he cannot do euil. Therefore of this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, doe not hinder the free will of God in doing well, if the diuell which cannot do but euil yet willingly sinneth, who shall then say that a man doeth therefore lesse willingly sinne for this that hee is subiect to necessitie of sinning? This necessitie, whereas Augustine ech where speaketh of it, euen then also when he was enuiously pressed with the cauillation of Celestinus, he sticked not to affirme in these wordes, by libertie it came to passe that man was with sinne, but nowe the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of libertie made necessitie. And so oft as hee falleth into mention thereof, he doubteth not to speake in this manner of the necessarie bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kepte, that man since he is corrupted, sinneth in deede willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by forraine constraint: but yet of such peruersnesse of nature as he is, hee cannot but be moued and driuen to euill. If this be true, then surely it is plainly expressed that he is subiect to necessitie of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine writeth thus, onely man among all liuing creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, he also suffereth a certaine violence, but of will and not of nature, that euen thereby also he shoulde not be depriued of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a little after, will being changed in it selfe into worse, by I wot not what corrupt and maruellous manner, so maketh necessitie that verie necessitie for as much as it is willing, cannot excuse will, and will forasmuch as it is drawne by allurement, cannot exclude necessitie, for this necessitie is after a certaine maner willing. Afterward he saith that we are pressed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certaine willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will we are inexcusable, because wil when it was free, made it selfe the bondseruant of sinne. At length he concludeth, that the soule is so after a certaine maruellous and euil maner holden both a bond seruant and free, vnder this certaine willing and ill free necessitie: a bondseruant by reason of necessitie, free by reason of Will, and that which is more maruellous and more miserable, therein guiltie wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guiltie, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the readers doe perceiue that I bring no newe thing, which long agoe Augustine brought foorth out of the consent of all godly men, & almost a thousand yeres after was kept stil in monkes Cloysters. But Lombard when he could not distinguish necessitie from compulsion, gaue matter to a pernitious errour.

Sermone super Cant. 81.

God is the onely framer of the vvil vnto good things, from the first motion to the last perfection of euery good act, his hande vvorketh & vvorketh alone.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what manner remedie is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended & healed. For whereas the Lorde in helping vs, giueth vs that which wee want, when wee shall knowe what his worke is in vs, it will streight way appeare on the other side what is our needinesse. When the Apostle sayth to the

Phi-

Philippians, that he truſteth that he which began a good work in them, will performe it vnto the day of Ieſus Chriſt: it is no doubt, that by the beginning of a good woorke, hee meaneth the verie beginning of conuerſion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by ſtirring vp in our heartes the loue, deſire and endeuour of righteouſneſſe, or (to ſpeake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our heartes to righteouſneſſe: hee endeth it in confirming vs to perſeuerance. And that no man ſhould cauill that good is begunne by the Lorde, when will being of it ſelfe weake is holpen: the holy Ghoſt in another place declareth what will is able to doe being left vnto it ſelfe. I will giue you (ſaieth hee) a newe heart. I will put a newe ſpirit in the middes of you. And I will take away the ſtonie heart from your fleſh, and I will giue you a heart of fleſh. And I will put my ſpirite in the middes of you, and I will make you to walke in my commaundements. Who ſhal ſay that the weakneſſe of mans will is ſtrengthened with helpe, whereby it may effectually aſpire to the choiſe of that that is good, when it muſt be whole transformed and renued? If there be any ſoftneſſe in a ſtone, which by ſome helpe being made tenderer will abide to bee bowed euerie way, then will I graunt that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right, ſo that that which in it is perfect, bee ſupplyed by the grace of God. But if hee meant to ſhewe by this ſimilitude, that no goodneſſe could euer be wrong out of our heart vnleſſe it be made throughly newe: let vs not part betweene him and vs, that which hee chalengeth to himſelfe alone. If therefore a ſtone be transformed into fleſh, when God turneth vs to the deſire of that which is right: then is all that which was of our owne will taken away, and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God. I ſay that will is taken away, not in that it is will, becauſe in the conuerſion of man, that which was of the firſt nature abideth whole: alſo I ſay that it is created newe, not that will then beginneth to be, but that it be turned from an euill wil into a good. And this I affirme to bee wholy done by God, becauſe wee are not able ſo much as to thinke, as the ſame Apoſtle witneſſeth: therefore in another place hee ſaieth, that God doth not onely helpe our weake will, or amende our peruerſe will, but that he worketh in vs to will. Whereupon is eaſily gathered, that which I ſaid before, that whatſoeuer good is in will, it is the worke of onely grace. In which ſenſe in an other place he ſaith, that it is God that worketh all in all. Neither doth he there intreat of the vniuerſall gouernement, but giueth vnto God alone the praiſe of all good things that the faithfull haue. And in ſaying, all, truely hee maketh God the author of ſpirituall life, euen from the beginning to the ende. Which ſelfe ſame thing he had taught before in other words, ſaying that the faithfull are of God in Chriſt, where he plainly maketh mention of the newe creation, wherein that which was of common nature before, is deſtroyed. For there is to be vnderſtanded a compariſon betweene Adam and Chriſt, which in another place hee more plainly expreſſeth, where hee teacheth that wee are the worke of God created in Chriſt to good works, which he hath prepared that we ſhould walk in them. For he goeth about by this reaſon to proue, that our ſaluation is of free gifte, becauſe the beginning of all goodneſſe, is at the ſeconde creation, which we obtaine in Christ. But if there were any power of our selues, were it neuer so small, wee should haue also some portion of merite. But hee to proue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that wee haue deserued nothing, because we are create in Christ to good works, which God hath prepared. In which words he signifieth againe, that all partes of good workes euen from the first motion, are proper to God onely. For this reason, the Prophet after he had said in the Psalme that wee are the workemanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth by and by, Wee made not our selues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spirituall life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it by and by after followeth, that we are his people and the flocke of his pastures. We see now how he not contented simply to haue giuen to God the praise of our saluation, doth expressely exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if he would say, that there resteth no peece, be it neuer so litle, for man to glorie in, because it is all of God.

It is not enough to make God the principal actor & leader of our vvil vnto good things, but the vvhole processe must be ascribed intierly vnto him.

7 But there be some peraduenture that will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is conuerted by the onely power of the Lord: but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne part in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before euery good worke, but so, that wil doth accompanie it and not leade it, as a wayting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euil spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombard doeth disorderly writhe to this purpose. But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two things be plainly signified, that the Lord doeth both correct our corrupted will, or rather destroy it, and also of himselfe putteth in place thereof a good will. In as much as it is preuented by grace, in that respect I giue you leaue to call it a wayting maide: but for that being reformed, it is the worke of the Lorde, this is wrongfully giuen to man that hee doth with will comming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not wel written of Chrysostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke verie well it selfe, as euen nowe wee haue seene by Paul. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mans will the wayting maide of grace, to assigne vnto her a certaine second office in doing a good worke, but because this onely was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principal cause of saluation in mans deseruing: therefore he stoode onely vpon this point, that grace was before all deseruing: which was sufficient for the matter that hee then had in hande, not medling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in another place he excellently well handleth. For sometimes when he saith, that the Lord doeth preuent the willing that hee may will, and followeth the willing that he will not in vaine, hee maketh him altogether the whole author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are too plaine to neede any long arguing vpon them. Men (saith hee) doe labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I knowe not. And in his first booke against Pelagius & Celestius, where he doeth expound that saying of Christ, Euery one that hath hath heard of my father commeth to mee, he saith: Free will is so holpen not onely that it may knowe what is to be done, but also may doe it when it hath knowen it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the lawe, but by the grace of the spirite, hee so teacheth, that hee that hath learned, doth not onely see it knowing, but also desire it in willing, and perfourme it in doing.

8 And because wee are nowe in hande with the chiefe point whereupon the matter hangeth, let vs go forward and proue the summe thereof to the readers, only with a fewe and the most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, least any man shoulde accuse vs of wrongfull wresting the scripture, let vs shewe that the trueth which wee affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimonie of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the things be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shal be brought foorth, the way may be prepared to vnderstande all the rest that are here and there commonly read. And againe, I thinke it shall not be vnfitly done, if I openly shewe that I agree wel with that man whome worthilie the consent of godly men doeth much esteeme. Surely, it is euident by plaine and certaine proofe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but onely from God, for there can not be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right will of himselfe, but it proceedeth from the same good pleasure, whereby we are elect before the creation of the world. There is also an other reason not vnlike vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be seene whence faith it selfe commeth. For as much as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, that it is of the meere grace of God, when wee, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good. Therefore the Lorde, when he nameth these two things in the conuersion of his people, to take away from them a stonie heart, and to giue them a heart of flesh, plainly testifieth that that which is of our selues must be done away, that wee may be conuerted to righteousnesse: and that whatsoeuer commeth in place thereof, is from himselfe. And he vttereth not this in one place only. For he saith in Ieremie: I wil giue them one heart and one way, that they may feare mee all their dayes. And a little after, I will giue the feare of my name into their heart, that they depart not from mee. Againe in Ezechiel: I will giue them one heart, & I wil giue a new spirite in their bowels. I will take away the stonie heart out of their flesh, and I will giue them a heart of flesh. Hee could not more euidently claime to himselfe, & take from vs whatsoeuer is good and right in our will, then when he declareth that our conuersion is a creation of a new spirit, and of a newe heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodnesse til it be reformed, and that after reformation, so much as it is good, is of God, and not of vs.

Sith there is found a vvill bent to good in none but only in the elect, and the beginning to vvil vvel is faith, of vvhom our election & faith commeth of him the conuersion of our vvil must also of necessitie proceed.

* 9 And so read we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lorde encline our heart to him (saith Salomon) that wee may keepe his commaundementes. He sheweth the frowardnesse of our heart which naturally

* The prayers of holy men to haue their hearts framed vnto good things: the testimonie of Christ that vvithout him vve are like frutlesse and drie sticke: of Paul & Dauid ascribing both the first and last in our vvils to God as the author, proue sufficiently that our liking, desiring, following, attayning good, our going forvvard and continuing in it, is of him.

turally reioyceth to rebell againſt the Lawe of God if it be not bowed. And Pſa.119. the ſame thing is in the Pſalme: Lorde incline my heart to thy teſtimonies. For the compariſon of contrarietie is alway to be noted, which is betweene the peruerſe motion of the heart, whereby it is carried to obſtinacie, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When Dauid feeling himſelfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a Pſal.51.12. newe heart within him, to renue a right ſpirite within his bowels: doth he not acknowledge that all the partes of his heart are full of vncleanneſſe, and his ſpirite writhen with crooked peruerſneſſe? and in calling the cleanneſſe which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doeth hee not attribute it wholy to God? But if any man take exception and ſay, that the verie prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our aunſwere is readie, that though Dauid were by that time ſomewhat come to amendement, yet doeth he ſtil compare his firſt ſtate with that ſorrowfull fall that hee had felte. Therefore taking vpon him the perſon of a man eſtranged from God, he for good cauſe prayeth to haue giuen him al theſe things ỹ God giueth to his elect in regeneration. And ſo being like a dead man, hee wiſheth himſelfe to bee created of newe, that of the bondſlaue of Sathan, he may be made the inſtrument of the holy Ghoſt. Maruelous and monſtrous ſurely is the luſt of our pride. God requireth nothing more earneſtly, than that wee ſhoulde moſt religiouſly keepe his Sabbath, that is in reſting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If ſluggiſhneſſe hindreth not, Chriſt hath giuen teſtimonie euident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuiouſly ſuppreſſed. I am (ſaith he) the Vine, you be the branches: My father is a husbandman. As the branch cannot beare fruite Iohn 15.1. of it ſelfe, vnleſſe it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnleſſe you abide in mee. For without mee you can doe nothing. If wee beare fruite none otherwiſe than a branch buddeth being plucked out of the grounde and without moiſture: wee neede no more to ſeeke what is the aptneſſe of our nature to goodneſſe. And this is a plaine concluſion: Without me you can do nothing. He doeth not ſay that wee are too weake to be ſufficient for our ſelues: but in bringing vs to nothing, he excludeth all opinion of power be it neuer ſo little. If wee being graffed in Chriſt, beare fruite like a Vine, which taketh her efficacie of liuelines both from the moyſture of the earth, and from the dewe of heauen, and from the cheriſhing of the ſunne: I ſee nothing remaine for vs in doing a good worke, if wee keepe whole for God that which is his. The fonde ſuttle deuiſe is alleaged in vaine, that there is iuyce alreadie encloſed within the branche, and a certaine power to bring foorth fruite, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the firſt roote, becauſe it bringeth ſomewhat of her owne. For Chriſt doeth meane nothing elſe, but that wee are a drie ſticke and nothing worth, when we be ſeuered from him, becauſe by our ſelues beeing ſeparate, we haue no power to do well: as alſo in another place hee ſaieth:
Mat.15.13. Euerie tree that my Father hath not planted ſhall be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apoſtle aſcribeth all the whole vnto him in the place alreadie al-
Phil.2.13. leaged. It is God (ſaith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe.

The

The first part of a good worke is will: the second is a strong endeuour in doing it: the author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from God, if wee take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectuall working. If it were saide that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is saide that he maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh that it cannot rise vp: He said further, that to ouercome the hardnesse of that battell, there is ministred vnto vs stedfastnesse of endeuour, euen to the effect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in another place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all things in all, wherein we haue before taught that the whole course of spiritual life is comprehended For which reason, Dauid, after he had prayed to haue the wayes of the Lord opened vnto him, that he might walke in his trueth, by and by addeth: Vnite thou my heart to feare thy name. In which wordes he signifieth, that euen they that are well minded, are subiect to so many withdrawings of mind, that they easily vanish or fall away if they be not stablished to constancie. For which reason in another place, after he had praied to haue his steppes directed to keepe the worde of God, hee requireth also to haue strength giuen him to fight. Let not any iniquitie (saith he) beare rule ouer me. After this sort therefore doth the Lord both begin & end a good work in vs: that it may all be his worke, that will conceiueth a loue of that which is right, that it is enclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp & moued to endeuour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeuour faint not, but do proceede euen to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

1. Cor. 12. 6.

Psal. 86. 11.

10 And he moueth the wil, not in such sort as hath in many ages beene taught & beleeued: that it is afterward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motion, but with mightily strengthning it. Therefore that must be reiected which Chrysostome so oft repeateth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth only reach out his hand to see if we will be holpen by his aid. Wee grant that such was the state of man while he yet stoode, that he might bow to either part. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is free will, vnlesse God both wil and can in vs: what shal become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that small proportion? But rather wee do obscure and extenuate it with our vnthankfulnes. For the Apostle doeth not teach, that ỹ grace of a good wil is offered vs, if we do accept it, but ỹ he wil performe it in vs: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his spirit doth direct, bowe and gouerne our heart, & reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he will giue to the elect a newe spirite onely for this end, that they may be able to walke in his commaundements, but to make them walke in deede. Neither can Christs saying, (Euery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwise take, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuall of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace God vouchesafeth not to giue to all men generally without regarde, as that saying (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people. that it denieth nothing to him that doeth what lieth in him. Men are in deede

God doth not only make our vvil the offer to encline it, vvhich if vvee accept it vvorketh & not other vvise, but he setteth good before vs, giueth vs eyes to see it and effectually bowveth our mindes vnto it.

to be taught that Gods goodneſſe is laide open for all men, without exception that ſeeke for it. But foraſmuch as they onely beginne to ſeeke for it, whome the heauenly grace hath breathed vpon, not ſo much as the little peece ought to be plucked away from his praiſe. Truely this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the ſpitite of God, they are moued and gouerned by his guiding. Therefore Auguſtine doeth worthily as well mocke them, that claime any parte of willing to themſelues, as hee doeth reprehende other which thinke, that that is generally giuen to all men, which is the ſpeciall teſtimonie of free election. Nature (ſaith he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a brickle ſubteltie of witte like glaſſe, that gliſtereth with meere vanitie, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whome it pleaſeth him. And in another place: Howe cameſt thou? by beleeuing. Feare thou, leaſt while thou takeſt vpon thee that thou haſt found the iuſt way, thou periſh out of the iuſt way. I came (ſaieſt thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why ſwelleſt thou? wilt thou heare that this alſo is giuen thee? Heare euen him that calleth: No man commeth to mee vnleſſe my Father drawe him. And it is without controuerſie gathered out of Iohns wordes, that the heartes of the godly are ſo effectually gouerned by Gods working, that they followe with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (ſaith he) can not ſinne, becauſe the ſeede of God abideth in him. For wee ſee that the meane motion which the Sophiſters imagine, which we at our libertie may either obey or refuſe, is openly excluded, where an effectuall conſtancie to continue is affirmed.

Iohn 6. 44.

1. Iohn. 3. 9.

At our firſt entrance into vvel-vvilling, ſo our continuance therein is alſo the vvorke and free gift of God: they erre vvhich holde either that the thankeful vſe of the firſt grace doth deſerue the ſecond, or that the firſt onely vvorketh alone, and vvith the ſeconde vve our ſelues are cooperators.

Mat. 25. 21. Luk. 19. 17.

11 Of continuance there ſhould no more doubt haue beene made, but that it ſhould haue beene taken for the free gift of God vnleſſe the moſt wicked errour had growen in force, that it is diſtributed according to the deſert of men, as euerie man hath ſhewed himſelfe not vnthankfull to the firſt grace. But foraſmuch as this errour hath growen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuſe or receiue the grace of God offered, that opinion being driuen away, this other doeth alſo fall of it ſelfe. Albeit herein they erre two manner of wayes. For beſide this that they teache that our thankfulneſſe towarde the firſt grace and our lawfull vſe thereof are rewarded with the latter giftes: they adde alſo, that nowe grace alone doeth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the firſt this wee ought to beleeue, that the Lorde while hee daily enricheth and heapeth his ſeruants with newe giftes of his grace, becauſe he liketh & fauoureth the worke which he hath begun in them, findeth in them ſomewhat whereupon to beſtowe greater graces. And hereto ſerue thoſe ſayings, To him that hath, ſhalbe giuen. Againe: Oh, good ſeruaunt, becauſe thou haſt beene faithfull in fewe things, I will ſet thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, that neither the lawful vſe of the firſt grace be ſaid to be rewarded with the later graces, nor it bee ſo counted a rewarding, that it ceaſſe to be reckoned the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this bleſſing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that how much the better they haue vſed the firſt graces, they ſhall be encreaſed with ſo much the greater. But I ſay, that this vſe alſo is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good wil. And they vse no lesse wrongfully than vnhappily that olde destruction of working & together working grace. Augustine vsed the same in deed, but delaying it with a fit definition, that God in together working with vs doth ende, that which in working he beginneth, & that it is stil the same grace but changeth name, according to the diuerse maner of effect. Whereupon followeth, that he doth not part it betweene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by the motion of both, but only noteth the multiplication of grace. To which purpose belongeth that which in an other place he teacheth, that many giftes of God do goe before the good will of man, among the which the selfe same is one. Whereupon followeth, that he leaueth nothing that it may claime to it self. Which thing Paul also hath namely expressed: For when he had said that it is God, which worketh in vs both to wil & to performe, he by & Phil. 2. 13.

by addeth ẏ he doth them both of his good wil, declaring by this word, that it is his free goodnes. Whereas they are wont to say, that after wee haue once giuen place to the first grace, our owne endeuours do now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I answere: If they meane that we, after we haue beene once by the power of the Lorde broken to the obedience of righteousnesse, do of our owne accord go forward, & are inclined to follow the working of grace, I speak nothing against it For it is most certaine, that there is such a readines of obeying, where the grace of god reigneth. But whence commeth that, but from this, that the spirit of God alway agreeing with it self, doth cherish & confirme to stedfastnesse of continuing the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himselfe somewhat whereby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pestilently deceiued.

12 And to this purpose is that saying of the Apostle wrongfully wrested by ignorance: I haue laboured more than they all: not I, but the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therfore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of god, but yet so, that he calleth himself a worker together with grace. It is maruell that so many which otherwise were not euil men, haue stumbled at this strawe. For the Apostle doth not write that the grace of the Lord laboureth with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away al the praise of the labor to grace only. It is not I (saith he) that haue laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doutfulnesse of the speach deceiued them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greek article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but ẏ the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkly, though shortly, where he thus sayth: The good wil of man goeth before many giftes of God, but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, then followeth his reason: because it is written: His mercy hath preuented me: And his mercy shal follow me. It preuenteth man not willing, to make him wil: & it followeth him willing, that he wil not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking thus:

1. Cor. 15. 10.

The Apostle S. Paul vvrested by Sophisters to maintain the freedom of mans vvil as a ioynt vvorker vvith the grace of God.

Psal. 59. 11.

Psa. 23. 6.

Ser. 2. in Cant.

Drawe mee in a manet vnwilling, that thou maist make mee willing: drawe me lying slouthfull, that thou maist make me runne.

S. Augustines doctrine, not that God doth offer his grace which man hath free election to receiue or refuse, but that the will & election of euery receiuer is by him thereunto framed.

13 Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne words, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbon, should as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they follow their father Pelagius, by whome long ago Augustine was drawen foorth into the same contention. In his booke of Correption and Grace written to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet do it in his owne wordes: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuing in good if he woulde: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to ouercome concupiscence: that hee therefore had to be able if he woulde, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first libertie was to be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And least he should be thought to speak of the perefection to come after immortalitie (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after he plucketh out this dout. For (saith he) the wil of holy men is so much kindled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able because they so will: they therefore wil, because God worketh that they so will. For if in so great weakenesse, in which yet behoueth the power to bee made perfect, for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnto them, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doeth not worke in them to wil: then among so many temptations wil should needs fall downe for weakenesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weakenesse of mans will, that it should be moued without swaruing or seuering by the grace of God, and therefore should not faint howe weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely how our heartes do of necessitie follow the mouing of God that worketh affection in them. And he saith, that the Lord doth drawe men in deede with their own willes, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Now haue we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not only offered by God to be receiued or refused at euery mans Free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election & wil in the heart: so that euery good worke that followeth after, is the fruit and effect therof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his wordes out of another place, that nothing but grace maketh euery good worke in vs.

2. Cor. 12. 9.

Epi. 100. 5.

By grace freely & vndeseruedly giuē vnto Gods elect their vvil is conuerted vnto good and therin strengthened to continue.

Epi. 100. 6.

14 But whereas he saith in another place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euil will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good: he meaneth onely that man is not so drawen, that without any motion of heart he is caried as by an outward impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his verie heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he writeth thus vnto Boniface: Wee knowe that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whome it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merites of workes, nor according to the merits of wil, but of free fauour: and to them to whom it is not giuen, we knowe that it is by the iust iudgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace following is giuen to the deseruings of men, because in not refusing the first grace, they shewed themselues worthie. For he wil haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessarie to vs for euery of our doings, and is not giuen in recompense to workes, that it may be grace in deede. But the matter cannot be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight Chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtaineth not grace by libertie, but libertie by grace: and that by the same grace, by affection of delite printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with inuincible force: that while grace gouerneth, it neuer falleth away: when grace forsaketh, it by and by tumbleth downe. That by the free mercie of God it both is conuerted to good, and being conuerted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and stedfastnesse after direction, hangeth vpon the only will of God, and not vpon any merite of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we list so to call it, as he writeth of in another place, that can neither be turned to God, not abide in God but by grace, and by grace is able all that it is able. Epist. 46.

The iiii. Chapter.

Howe God worketh in the hearts of men.

Satan sitteth and ruleth in the wils of wicked men who of themselues are most willing to be stirred, led & guided by him.

IT is sufficiently proued, as I thinke, that man is so holden captiue with the yoke of sinne, that of his owne nature hee can neither aspire by desire, nor trauaile by endeuour to goodnesse: beside that, wee haue rehearsed a distinction betweene compulsion and necessitie, whereby it might appeare, that when hee sinneth of necessitie, yet neuertheleese hee sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subiect in bondage to the Diuel, he seemeth rather to be ledde by the diuels will than his owne, it resteth nowe to be declared of what sort are both kindes of working. And then is this question to be assoyled, whether in euil workes there be any thing to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some working of his. In one place Augustine compareth mans will to a horse, which is readie to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the diuell he compareth to riders. If God (sayth he) sit vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperatly, spurreth it forward if it be too slow, plucketh it backe if it be too quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse & wildnesse of it, tameth the stubbornnesse of it, and guideth it into the right way. But if the Diuel haue possessed it, hee like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carrieth it through places where no way is, drieueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steepe places, spurreth it forwarde to stubbornnesse and fearcenesse: which similitude wee will for this time be contented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is sayde that the will of naturall man is subiect to the rule of the diuel, to be stirred by him, it is not ment thereby that man as it were striuing against it, and resisting is compelled to obey, as wee compell bondslaues against their will, by reason of being their lordes, to doe our commaundements: but that being bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of necessitie yeldeth it selfe obedient to euery leading of him. For whome the Lorde vouchsaueth not to rule with his ſpirite, them by iuſt iudgement hee ſendeth away to be mooued of Satan.

2. Cor.4.4. Wherefore the Apoſtle ſayeth, that the God of this worlde hath blinded the mindes of the vnbeleeuers ordained to deſtruction, that they ſhoulde not ſee the light of the Goſpell. And in another place: That he worketh in Eph.2.2. the diſobedient children. The blinding of the wicked, and all the wicked deedes that followe thereupon, are called the workes of Sathan, of which yet the cauſe is not to be ſought elſewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariſeth the roote of euil, wherein reſteth the foundation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is Sinne.

God & Satan & man vvorking one & the ſelfeſame act, vvorke diuerſly in reſpect as vvel of the end as the manner of doing.

2 But farre other is the order of Gods doing in ſuch things. And that the ſame may appeare more certainly vnto vs: let the hurt done to the holy man Iob by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his heardmen, & like enemies in warre, droue away his cattell for booties. Nowe is their wicked deede plainly ſeene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, frō whome the Hiſtorie ſaith, that all this did proceede. But Iob himſelfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lord in it, whome he ſaith to haue taken away from him thoſe things, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can wee referre the ſelfeſame worke to God, as author, to Sathan as author, & to man as author of it, but ẏ we muſt either excuſe Satan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of euil? Very eaſily: if firſt we looke vpon the end, why it was done, and then the maner how. The purpoſe of the Lord is by calamitie to exerciſe the patience of his ſeruant: The diuel goeth about to driue him to diſpaire. The Chaldees againſt right & lawe, ſeeke gaine of that which is another mans. Such diuerſitie in purpoſes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the maner of doing there is no leſſe diuerſitie. The Lord leaueth his ſeruant to Sathan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did choſe for miniſters to execute it, he did leaue & deliuer to him to be driuen to it. Sathan with his venemous ſtings, pricked forward the minds of the Chaldees which otherwiſe were peruerſe of themſelues to do that miſchiefe: they furionſly runne to do wrong, & do binde & defile all their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly ſaid, that Sathan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciſeth his kingdom, that is to ſay, the kingdome of wickedneſſe. It is alſo ſaid that God worketh in them after his manner, becauſe Sathan himſelfe, foraſmuch as hee is the inſtrument of his wrath, according to his bidding & cōmandement, turneth himſelfe hither & thither to execute his iuſt iudgements. I ſpeake not here of Gods vniuerſall mouing, whereby as all creatures are ſuſteined, ſo from thence they take their effectual power of doing any thing. I ſpeake only of that ſpecial doing, which appeareth in euery ſpecial act. Wee ſee therefore that it is no abſurditie, that one ſelf act be aſcribed to god, to Sathan, & to man: but the diuerſitie in the end & manner of doing, cauſeth that therein appeareth the iuſtice of God to be without fault, & alſo the wickedneſſe of Sathan & man bewrayeth it ſelfe to their reproch.

In the euil motions of vvicked mē God vvorketh after tvvo ſorts, the one by vvithholding his grace, vvherby they might be moued vnto good, the other by vſing the miniſterie of Satan to ſtir, frame and encline their vvils.

3 The old writers in this point alſo, are ſometime preciſely afraid, ſimply to confeſſe the trueth, becauſe they feare leſt they ſhould ſo open a window to wickedneſſe, to ſpeake irreuerently of the workes of God. Which ſobrietie as I embrace, ſo I thinke it nothing daungerous, if wee ſimply hold what the Scripture teacheth. Auguſtine himſelfe ſometime was not free from the ſuperſtition, as where he ſaith, that hardning and blinding, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his fore knowledge. But the phraſes of Scripture allow not theſe ſutteleties, which phraſes do plainly ſhew that there is therin ſomewhat elſe of God, beſides his foreknowledge. And Auguſtine himſelf in his fift booke againſt Iulianus, goeth earneſtly about with a long proceſſe to proue that ſinnes are not only of the permiſſion or ſufferance of God, but alſo of his power, that ſo former ſinnes might be puniſhed. Likewiſe, that which they bring forth, concerning permiſſion, is too weake to ſtande. It is oftentimes ſaid, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that hee turneth, boweth, & moueth their hearts as I haue elſe where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is neuer expreſſed, if wee flee to free foreknowledge or ſufferance. Therfore we anſwere that it is done after two manners. For firſt, where as when his light is taken away, there remaineth nothing but darkneſſe & blindnes: whereas when his ſpirite is taken away, our hearts wax hard & become ſtones: where as when his direction ceſſeth, they are wreſted into crookednes, it is wel ſaid that he doth blind, harden & bow them from whom he taketh away the power to ſee, obey & do rightly. The ſecond maner, which commeth neere to the propertie of the words, is that for the executing of his iudgemẽts by ſathan the miniſter of his wrath, he both appointeth their purpoſes to what end it pleaſeth him, and ſtirreth vp their willes, & ſtrengtheneth their endeuours. So when Moſes rehearſeth that king Sehon did not giue paſſage to the people, becauſe God had hardened his ſpirit, & made his heart obſtinate, he byandby adioyneth the end of his purpoſe: that he might (ſaith he) giue him into our hands. Therefore becauſe it was Gods wil to haue him deſtroyed, the making of his heart obſtinate, was Gods preparation to his deſtruction.

Deu. 2. 30.

4 After the firſt manner this ſeemeth to be ſpoken. He taketh away the lip from the ſpeakers of trueth, & taketh away reaſon from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are ſet ouer the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord, why haſt thou made vs mad, and hardened our heart, that we ſhould not feare thee? Becauſe they iudge rather of what ſort God maketh men by forſaking them, than how he perfourmeth his worke in them. But there are other teſtimonies that go further: as are theſe of the hardening of Pharao. I wil harden the heart of Pharao, that he do not heare you, & let the people go. Afterward he ſaith, that he hath made heauie & hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not ſuſteining it? That is true in deede: but he did ſomewhat more, that he committed his heart to Sathan to be confirmed with obſtinacy. Wherupon he had before ſaid: I wil hold his heart. The people went out of Ægypt, the inhabitants of that countrey came forth & met them like enimies. By whom were they ſtirred vp? Truely Moſes affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lorde that had hardened their hearts. And the Prophet reciting the ſame hiſtory, ſaith, that he turned their hearts, that they ſhould hate his people. Now can you not ſay, that they ſtumbled being left without the counſell of God. For if they be hardened & turned, then they are of purpoſe bowed to that ſelfe thing. Moreouer ſo oft as it pleaſed him to puniſh the tranſgreſſours of the people, people, how did he performe his worke in the reprobate? so as a man may see, that the effectualnes of working was in him, and they onely did seruice as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would call them out with his whistle, sometime that they should be like a net for him to entangle them, & sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed & driuen by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse appoint it after this sort: that inasmuch as they sinne, it is their own: inasmuch as in sinning they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that deuided the darkenesse as pleaseth him.

5 Now that the ministerie of Sathan is vsed to prick forward the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his prouidence apointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proued, though it were but by one place onely. For it is oftentimes said in Samuel, that the euil spirit of the Lord, and an euil spirite from the Lord, did either violently carne or leaue Saul. To say that this spirite was the holy ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the vncleane spirite is called the spirit of God, because it aunswereth at his commaundement and power, being rather his instrument in doing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added withall, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacie of errour & deceiuing is sent by God, that they which haue not obeyed the trueth, may beleeue lies. But there is alway great difference in one selfsame work, betweene that which the Lorde doth, and that which Sathan & the wicked goe about He maketh the euil instruments that he hath vnder his hande, & may turne whither he list to serue his iustice. They, in as much as they are euil, do bring foorth in effect the wickednesse that they haue conceiued by corruptnesse of nature. The rest, of such things as serue for to deliuer the maiestie of God from slander, and to cut off all shifting from the wicked, are alreadie set forth in the Chapter concerning Prouidence. For in this place my purpose was only to shewe how Sathan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

Not only in spirituall, but in the administration euen of outvvard things, it is the speciall mouing of God, that maketh his creatures answvere vnto our desires in doing vs good, or turning euil avvay from vs.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainly declared what libertie man hath in those doings, which are neither iust nor faultie of themselues, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirituall life. Some in such things haue graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they would not striue about a matter of no great importance, than ỹ they minded certeinly to proue the same thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confesse that they which do holde that they haue no power to righteousnesse, do hold the thing that is principally necessarie to saluation: yet I doe thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may knowe that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it commeth in our minde to choose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth thereunto; againe, so oft as our wit & minde eschueth that which else woulde haue hurt vs. And the force of Gods prouidence extendeth thus farre, not onely to make the successes of things to come to passe, as he shal foresee to be expedient, but also to make the willes of men to tend therunto. Truly, if we consider in our wit the administration of outward things, wee shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the wil of man: but if we shall giue credit to so many testimonies, which cry out that the Lord doeth in these things also rule the hearts of men, they shall compell vs to yelde our will subiect to the speciall mouing of God. Who did procure the good willes of the Egiptians to the Israelites, to lende them all their most precious iewels? They would neuer haue found in their hearts to haue so done of their own accord. Therefore their heartes were more subiect to the Lord, than ruled by them selues. And truely if Iacob had not beene persuaded that God put into men diuerse affections as pleaseth him, he would not haue saide of his sonne Ioseph, whom he thought to be some Heathen Egiptian: God graunt you to finde mercie before this man As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, that when it pleased God to haue mercie vpon it, he meekened the hearts of the cruel nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that hee prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirit of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde, from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to be persuaded with the yong mens aduise? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afraid at the comming of Israel? Truely, the harlot Rahab confessed, that it was done by God. Againe, who threwe downe the hearts of Israel with dread and fearefulnesse, but he that in the lawe threatened that he would giue them a fearefull heart?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule whereof all things vniuersally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently prooued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meaneth to prepare the way for his prouidence, euen in outwarde things doeth bowe and turne the willes of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods wil beareth rule ouer the freedome thereof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mouing of God, than vpon the freedome of thine owne choise, this daily experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in things of no perplexitie thy iudgement and wit oft faileth thee, in things not harde to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in things most obscure, by and by present aduise is offred thee in things great and perillous, thou hast a courage ouercomming al difficultie. And so do I expound that which Salomon saith: That the eare may heare, that the eye may see, the Lorde worketh both. For I take it that hee speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hand and boweth whither he will the heart of the king as the streames of waters: truely vnder the example of one special sort, he comprehendeth the whole generaltie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the willes of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hande of God, no more shal our wil be exempted from y same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine: The Scripture if it bee diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not only the good willes of men which he of euill maketh good, and so being made by himselfe doeth direct to good doings and to eternall life, but also these willes that preserue the creature of the worlde, are so in the power of God, that he maketh them to be inclined whither

Daily experience may enforce any man to confesse that in common outward things the freedome of our choise is ruled and guided by the hād of God vvith out vvhich vee could not of our selues see & attaine that vvhich is good, discerne & auoid that vvhich is euill.

whither hee will and when hee will, either to doe benefites, or to execute punishmentes, by a iudgement moste secret in deede, but the same moste righteous.

The meaning of the question that concerneth the freedome of mans will, is not whether he be often hindered or no frō obteininge the things he wisheth for, but whether his iudgemēt and affection be so addicted vnto euill that he cannot of himself discerne or desire that which is good.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans will is not to be weyed by the successe of things, which some vnskilful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they seeme to them selues to proue trimly and wittily that mans will is in bondage, because euen the highest Monarches haue not all things flowing after their owne desire. But this power whereof wee speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outward successe. For in the disputation of free will, this is not to the question, whether man may for outwarde impediments, perfourme and put in execution all those things that he hath purposed in mind: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of iudgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrownesse of a tonne, set ful of sharpe prickes, shal no lesse haue free will than Augustus Cæsar, gouerning a great part of the world with the becke of his countenance.

The v. Chapter.

A confutation of the obiections that are wont to be brought for defence of Free will.

The necessitie of sinning doeth not excuse vs when we sinne, both because Adam of his owne accorde made himselfe & his subiect thereunto, and also for that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuertheless sin voluntarily: which answereth their reason which argue in defense of free will. If sinne be necessarie, it ceaseth to be sinne: if voluntarie, then it may be auoided, and is not necessarie.

IT might seeme that we haue saide enough alreadie, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throwe it downe hedlong, did not on the contrarie parte pretende certaine reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heap vp together diuerse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from cōmon reason: afterward they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then ceaseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoided. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till wee haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I denye therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie I denie againe that this doeth followe which they conclude, that it may be auoided, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his iudgement by this pretence, because he could none otherwise do: God hath that aunswer ready which we in an other place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaues to sinne, can will nothing but euil. For whence commeth this want of powe? which the wicked would gladly pretend, but vpon this, that Adam of his owne accorde made himselfe subiect to the tyranny of the Diuel? Hereupon therefore grewe the corruption, with the bonds whereof we are holden fast tyed, for that the first man fell from his creator. If all men be iustly holden guiltie of his falling away, let them not thinke themselues excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they haue a moste euident cause of their damnation. And this I haue aboue plainly set footh, and I haue giuen an example in the Diuell himselfe, whereby it might appeare, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuerneuertheleſſe willingly ſinne: as againe in the elect Angels, whereas their will cannot decline from good, yet it ceaſſeth not to be a will. Which ſame thing Bernard alſo aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miſerable becauſe our neceſſitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs ſo ſubiect vnto it, that we be the bondſlaues of ſinne, as we haue before rehearſed. The ſecond part of their argument is faultie, becauſe from voluntarie it ſtraightway leapeth to free: but we haue before proued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not ſubiect to free election. Ser. 81. in Can.

2 They further ſay, that if both vertues and vices proceede not of free choiſe of will, it is not reaſonable that either puniſhment ſhould be layde vpon man or rewarde giuen to him. This argument, although it be Ariſtotles, yet I graunt is in ſome places vſed by Chryſoſtome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome himſelfe hydeth not, and alſo rehearſeth it in their owne words. If the grace of God worke in vs: then it, not we that labour, ſhalbe crowned. Of puniſhments I anſwere, that they are iuſtly laid vpon vs from whom the guiltines of ſin proceedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether ſinne be done by free or bond iudgement, ſo it be done by voluntarie luſt: ſpecially ſith man is hereby prouoced a ſinner, for that he is vnder the bondage of ſinne? As to the rewards of righteouſneſſe: a great abſurditie forſooth it is, if we confeſſe that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifulneſſe, than vpon our owne deſeruings. Howe oft finde we this thing repeated in Auguſtine: that God crowneth not our deſeruings, but his owne gifts: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our deſeruings, but ſuch as are rendred to the graces alreadie beſtowed vpon vs? Wiſely in deede they note this, that nowe there remaineth no place for deſeruings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we ſay ſo farre differing from trueth, they are much deceiued. For Auguſtine doubteth not, commonly to teach for neceſſarie, that which they thinke ſo vnlawful to confeſſe, as where he ſaith: What be the merites of any men whatſoeuer they be? whē he commeth, not with due reward, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from ſinne? He findeth all men ſinners. Againe, If that ſhalbe rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou art to be puniſhed: what is done then? God hath not giuen thee puniſhment which is due, but giueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be eſtranged from grace, boaſt of thy deſeruinges. In Epiſt. ad Cteſiphon. & Diacon. 1. In Pſal. 31. In Pſal. 70.

A ſecond argument in defenſe of free will, wherein is vr obiected that the deniall thereof is repugnant to Gods puniſhing or rewarding men. But he puniſheth them for their deſert, though they ſinne of neceſſitie, becauſe they are voluntarily in thoſe bonds: and he rewardeth them of his owne mercie, though, becauſe their doing well is meerly by grace, they cannot deſerue to be rewarded.

Againe: Thou art nothing of thy ſelfe, Sinnes are thine, but deſeruinges are Gods, puniſhment is due to thee: and when rewarde commeth, hee ſhall crowne his owne giftes, and not thy deſeruings. And in the ſame meaning in an other place, he teacheth that grace is not of deſeruing, but deſeruing of grace. And a litle after he concludeth, that God with his gifts goeth before all deſeruinges, that out of the ſame hee may gather his owne deſernings, and doeth giue altogether freely, becauſe he findeth nothing whereupon to ſaue. But what neede is it to make a longer regiſter, when ſuch ſentences are often found in his writings? But the Apoſtle ſhal yet better deliuer them from this error, if they heare from what beginning he conueieth ỹ glorie of the Saints: Whom he hath choſen, them he hath called, whome he hath called, them hee hath iuſtified: whom hee hath iuſtified, them hee hath Epiſt. 52. De verbis Apoſt. Ser. 47. 1. Cor. 4 7.

hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? because by the Lords mercie and not by their owne endeuour they are both chosen and called and iustified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shall no more be any deseruings, if free will shall not stand. For it is most foolish to be fraied away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (saith he) thou hast receiued all things, why glorieſt thou, as if thou hadst not receiued them? Thou seest that for the same cause hee taketh all things from free will, to leaue no place for deseruings: but as the bountifulnesse and liberalitie of God is manifold, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which he bestowed on vs, because he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

1. Cor. 4. 7.

A third reason arguing that if mans vvill vvere not naturally free vnto good & euil, but necessarily subiect to the one or the other, either all men shoulde be good or all men euil. As in trueth all men are by nature euil, that some are made good, it is by grace and not through the freedome of their vvill.

Ho. 22. in Gen. Lib. 2. cap. 4. Rom. 3. 10.

3 Moreouer they bring foorth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chrysostome: If this be not the power of our will, to chooſe good or euil, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is hee, whatsoeuer hee was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, which is carried about vnder ỹ name of Ambrose, when he maketh this argument, that no man shoulde euer depart from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is maruell that so excellent men fell beside themselues. For how chanceth it came not in Chrysostomes minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betweene men? As for vs, we feare not to grant that which Paul with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that al together are peruerse and giuen to wickednes: but with him wee adioyne this that by Gods mercie it commeth to passe that al abide not in peruersenes. Therfore whereas naturally wee are all sicke of one disease, they onely recouer health vpon whome it hath pleased God to lay his healing hand. The rest whom by iust iudgement he passeth ouer, pine away in their owne rottennesse til they be consumed. Neither is it of any other cause, that some continue to the end, and some fall in their course begunne. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he giueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaseth him selfe. If a man aske for a cause of the difference, why some continue constantly, and some faile by vnstedfastnes, wee knowe none other cause but that God susteineth the one sort strengthened with his power that they perish nor, and doeth not giue the same strength to the other sort, that they may be examples of inconstancie.

A fourth argument for free vvil to proue that exhorting & threatening ar in vain except man haue powver in himself to obey: vvhereas God himself vvho threateneth & exhorteth men, teacheth them neuertheleſſe vvithall, that an obedient heart is his free guift.

4 Further they presse vs, saying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hande, that the vse of admonitions is superfluous, that it is a fonde thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like things in time past were obiected against Augustine he was compelled to write the booke of Correption & grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this summe: O man, in the commaundement learne what thou oughtest to doe: in correction learne that by thine owne fault thou hast it not: in prayer learne whence thou maist receiue that which thou wouldest haue. Of the same argument in a manner is the booke of the Spirite and Letter, where hee teacheth that God measureth not the commaundementes of his lawe by the strength of man, but when hee hath commaunded that which is right, hee freely giueth to his elect

power to fulfil it. And this is no matter of long disputation First we are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Nowe let the other looke how they will get the maisterie in striuing, that match themselues with such aduersaries. Doeth Christ, which testifieth that wee can doe nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chastice them, ỹ without him did euill? Doeth he lesse exhort euery man to applie himself to good workes? How seuerely doth Paul inuey against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet hee prayeth for charitie to be giuen to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romanes, that it is neither of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie, & yet he ceasseth not afterwarde to admonish, to exhorte, and to rebuke. Why doe they not therefore speake to the Lorde, that hee doe not so lose his labour in requiring of men those things, which hee himselfe alone can giue, and in punishing those things which are done for want of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paul to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercie of God, going before them which nowe hath forsaken them? As if the Lorde had not a verie good reason of his doctrine, which offereth it selfe readily to be founde of them that reuerently seeke it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking doe worke of themselues, to the changing of the minde, Paul declareth, when hee writeth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor hee that watereth, but the Lord that giueth the encrease onely, effectually worketh. So wee see that Moses seuerally stablisheth the commaundements of the Law, and the Prophets doe sharply call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men doe then onely waxe wise, when a heart is giuen them to vnderstand, that it is the proper worke of God to circumcise the heartes, and in steede of stonie heartes to giue heartes of flesh, to write his lawe in the bowels of men: finally in renewing of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuall.

1.Cor.3.7.

5 Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose, if they be despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shalbe for a witnesse vnto them when they shall come to the iudgement seate of the Lord, yea and euen now alreadie they beat and strike their conscience: for howsoeuer the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disproue them: but thou wilt say, what may sillie miserable man do, if the softnesse of heart, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doeth he excuse himselfe, when he can impute the hardnes of hearte to none but to himselfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly readie to mocke them out if they might, are throwen downe with the force of them whether they will or no. But the chiefe profite towardes the faithfull is to be considered: in whome as the Lord worketh all things by his spirite, so he leaueth not the instruments of his word, & vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stande which is true, that all the strength of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I wil giue them a new heart, ỹ they may walk in them. But thou wilt say, Why are they now admonished of their duetie, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? why are they mooued with exhortation, sith they can make no more haſt than the ſtirring forwarde of the holy ghoſt worketh? why are they chaſtiſed if at any time they be gone out of the way, ſith they fell by the neceſſarie weakeneſſe of the fleſh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleaſure, that wee be prepared by exhortation to receiue the ſelfe ſame grace, whereby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what haſt thou in this order to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukings did nothing elſe profit with the godly, but to reproue them of ſinne, they were euen for that thing onely to be counted not altogether vnprofitable. Now, foraſmuch as by the holy Ghoſt working inwardly, they much auaile to enflame the deſire of goodneſſe, to ſhake of ſlugliſhneſſe, to take away the pleaſure and wenimous ſweeteneſſe of wickedneſſe, and on the other ſide to engender a hatred of irkeſomneſſe thereof: who dare cauil that they are ſuperfluous? If any man require a plainer anſwere, let him take this: God worketh after two ſortes in his elect, inwardly by his ſpirite, outwardly by his worde: By his ſpirite, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their hearts to the loue and keeping of iuſtice, he maketh them a new creature: By his word, he ſtirreth them to deſire, to ſeeke & attaine the ſame renuing, by them both he ſheweth foorth the effectuall working of his hand, according to the proportion of his diſtribution. When he ſendeth the ſame word to the reprobate, though not for their amendement, yet he maketh it to ſerue for an other vſe: that both for the preſent time they may be preſſed with witneſſe of conſcience, and may againſt the day of iudgement be made more inexcuſable. So though Chriſt pronounce Iohn. 6. 44. that no man commeth to him, but whome the father draweth, & that the elect do come when they haue heard and learned of the Father: yet doeth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whome it neceſſarily behoueth to bee inwardly taught by the holy

The vse of exhortations both vnto vvicked and to godly men.

2. Cor. 2. 16. Ghoſt, that they may any thing profite. And Paul teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, becauſe it is to them the ſauour of death to death, but a ſweete ſauour to God.

The lacke of free will in man and of abilitie to performe the lawe doth not proue the lawe to be giuen in vaine.

6 They be verie laborious in heaping together of teſtimonies of ſcripture: and that they do of purpoſe, that when they cannot oppreſſe vs with weight, they may yet with number. But as in battels, when it commeth to hande ſtrokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and ſhewe ſoeuer it hath, is with a fewe ſtripes diſcomfited and put to flight: ſo ſhall it be verie eaſie for vs to ouerthrowe them with all their route. For, becauſe the places that they abuſe againſt vs, when they are once diuided into their orders, doe meete vpon a fewe ſpecial points, we ſhal with one aunſwere ſatiſfie many of them: therefore it ſhall not be needefull to tarrie vpon diſſoluing euerie one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they ſet in the commandements, which they thinke to be ſo tempered to our ſtrengthes, that whatſoeuer is proued to be required by the one, it neceſſarily followeth, that it may bee performed by the other. And therefore they runne through euerie of the commaundementes, and by them doe meaſure the proportion of our ſtrength. For (ſay they) either God mocketh vs when hee chargeth vs with holineſſe, godlineſſe, obedience, chaſtitie, loue and meekeneſſe: and when hee forbiddeth vs vncleanneſſe, idolatrie, vnchaſtneſſe, neſſe, wrath, robberie, pride, and ſuch like: or he requireth only thoſe things that are in our power. Now, we may diuide into three ſortes in manner all the commaundements that they heape together. Some require our firſt conuerſion to God, ſome ſpeake ſimply of the keeping of the law: ſome command vs to continue in the grace of God that we haue receiued. Firſt let vs ſpeake of them all in generaltie, and then deſcend to the ſpeciall ſortes. To extend the power of man to the commandementes of the lawe, hath in deede long agoe begun to be common, and hath ſome ſhewe: but it proceeded from moſt rude ignorance of the law. For they that thinke it a heinous offence, if it be ſaid that the keeping of the lawe is impoſſible, doe reſt forſooth vpon this moſt ſtrong argument, that elſe the law was giuen in vaine. For they ſpeake in ſuch ſort, as if Paul had no where ſpoken of the lawe. For, I beſeech them, what meane theſe ſayings, that the lawe was ſet becauſe of tranſgreſſions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of ſinne: That the lawe maketh ſinne: that the lawe entred, that ſinne might abound: was it meant that the lawe was to be limitted to our ſtrengthes, leaſt it ſhoulde be giuen in vaine? or rather that it was ſet farre aboue vs to conuince our weakeneſſe? Truely by the ſame mans definition, the ende and fulfilling of the lawe is charitie. But when he wiſheth the mindes of the Theſſalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth ſufficiently confeſſe, that the law ſoundeth in our eares without profite, vnleſſe God inſpire the whole ſumme thereof in our heartes.

Gal.3.10. Rom.3.20. Rom.7.7. 1Tim.1.5. 1.Theſſ.3.12.

7 Truely, if the ſcripture did teach nothing elſe, but that the lawe is a rule of life whereunto we ought to frame our endeuour, I would alſo without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doeth diligently and plainly declare vnto vs the manifold vſe of the lawe: it is conuenient rather to conſider by that interpretation, what the lawe may doe in man. For ſo much as concerneth this preſent cauſe: it teacheth that ſo ſoone as it hath appointed what we ought to do, the power to obey commeth of the goodneſſe of God, & therefore moueth vs to prayer, whereby we may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundement and no promiſe, then were our ſtrengths to be tried whether they were ſufficient to aunſwer the commaundement, but ſith there are promiſes ioyned withall, which crye out, ỹ not only our aid, but alſo all our whole power conſiſteth in the help of Gods grace, they do teſtifie ynough and more, that we are altogether vnfit, much more inſufficient to keepe the lawe. Wherefore let this proportion of our ſtrengthes with the commaundements of Gods lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had meaſured the rule of iuſtice, which he purpoſed to giue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakeneſſe. Rather by his promiſes we ought to conſider, how vnreadie wee are of our ſelues which in euery behalfe do ſo much neede his grace. But who (ſay they) ſhalbee perſwaded that it is like to be true, that the Lord appointed his lawe to ſtocks and ſtones? Neither doth any man go about to perſwade it. For the wicked are neither ſtockes nor ſtones, when being taught by the lawe that their luſtes do ſtriue againſt God, they are proued guiltie by their owne witneſſe. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakneſſe they flye vnto grace. For which purpoſe ſerue theſe ſayings of Auguſtine. The Lord commandeth those things that we cannot do, that we may know what wee ought to aske of him. Great is the profite of the commaundementes, if so much be giuen to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commandeth, yea the lawe therefore commaundeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commaunded by the law: yea, God requireth faith it selfe of vs, and findeth not what to require, vnlesse he giue what to finde. Againe, Let God giue what hee commandeth, and commaund what he will.

The vſe which the lawe of God ſtandeth vs in, although our weakneſſe doe not ſerue to fulfil it.

Eph. 24.

Our first conuersion vnto God, our obedience vvhen vve are conuerted, and our continuance in obeying, commaunded in the Lavv, and yet his gift vvhich doth commaund them.

8 That shall more plainly be seene in rehearsing the three sortes of commaundements which we touched before. The Lord oftentimes commaundeth both in the lawe & in the Prophets, that wee be conuerted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Conuert me Lord, and I shal be conuerted: for after that thou didst conuert me, I repented, &c. He commaundeth vs to circumcise the vncircumcised skinne of our heart: and by Moses he declareth that this circumcision is done by his owne hand. He each where requireth newnesse of heart, but in an other place he testifieth that it is giuen by himselfe. That which God promiseth (saith Augustine) we do not by free will or nature, but he himself doth it by grace. And this is the same note that hee himselfe rehearseth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that wee well make difference betweene the lawe and the promises, or betweene the commaundements and grace. Now let them go that gather by the commaundements whether man be able to do any thing toward obedience in such sort that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commaundements themselues are fulfilled. The commaundements of the second sort are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serue & cleaue vnto his wil, to keepe his commaundementes, to followe his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that doe testifie that it is his gifte whatsoeuer righteousnesse, holinesse, godlinesse, or puritie may be had. Of the thirde sort was that exhortation of Paul and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they should abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paul teacheth in another place. That remaineth, saieth he, brethren, be yee strong thorough the Lorde. In another place hee forbiddeth vs, that wee doe not grieue the spirite of God, wherewith wee are sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that he there requireth, could not be perfourmed by men, therefore he wisheth it to the Thessalonians, from God, namely that he would reckon them worthie of his holy calling: & fulfill all the purpose of his goodnes, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, hee oftentimes commendeth their good & godly wil, yet a little after, he thanketh God that put it in the heart of Titus, to take vpon him to giue exhortation. If Titus could not so much has vse the office of his mouth, to exhort other, but onely so far as God did put vnto him, howe should other haue beene willing to doe, vnlesse God himselfe had directed their hearts?

The shifts vvhich defenders of free-vvill vse to delude the foresaid testimonies of scripture.

9 The craftier sort of them doe cauill at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that wee may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weake endeuours. They bring also places out of the Prophets, where the effect of our conuersion seemeth to be parted in halfe betweene God and vs. Turne ye to me, and I will turne to you. What manner of helpe the Lord bringeth vs, we haue aboue shewed, & it is not needefull here to repete it. This one thing I would haue graunted mee, that it is vainly gathered, that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, because God doth commaunde the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the commaundements of God, the grace of the lawe giuer is both necessarie for vs and promised vnto vs. Thereby then it appeareth, that at the least there is more required of vs than we are able to pay. And that saying of Hieremie cannot be wiped away with any cauillations: that the couenant of God made with the auncient people was voide, because it was onely literall, and that it coulde no otherwise be stablished, than when the spirite commeth vnto it, which frameth the harts to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Turne ye to mee, and I will turne vnto you, fauour their errour. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he renueth our hearts to repentance, but wherewith he by prosperitie of things doth declare himselfe fauourable and mercifull: as by aduersitie he sometime sheweth his displeasure. Whereas therefore the people being vexed with many sortes of miseries, and calamities, did complaine that God was turned away from them: he answereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they returne to vprightnesse of life, & to himselfe that is the paterne of righteousnes: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, and it is drawen to this purpose, that the worke of our conuersion should seeme to be parted betweene God and men. These things we haue comprehended so much the shortlier, because the proper place for this matter shalbe where we entreat of the law.

10 The second sort of their arguments is much like vnto the first. They alleadge the promises whereby God doeth couenaunt with our will, of which sorte are: Seeke good and not euill, and yee shall liue. If yee will and doe heare, yee shall eate the good things of the earth: but if yee will not, the sworde shall deuoure you, because the Lordes mouth hath spoken it. Againe, if thou put away thine abhominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driuen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and doe all his commaundementes which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lorde thy God will set thee on high aboue all the nations of the earth. And other like. They doe inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefites which the Lorde doeth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne will: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easie it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaints, that the Lorde doeth cruelly mocke vs, when hee pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vppon our will, if the same will bee not in our power: And that this liberalitie of GOD shoulde be a goodly thing forsooth, if hee so set his benefites before vs, that wee haue no power to vse them: and a maruellous assuredneſse of his promises, which hang vppon a thing impossible, so as they might neuer be fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adioyned, wee will speake in an other place: so that it shall be plaine, that there is no absurditie in the impossible fulfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place I denye that God doeth vngently mocke vs, when hee mooueth vs to deserue his benefites, whome hee knoweth to be vtterly vnable to doe it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they haue their vse with both sortes. As God with his commaundementes pricketh the consciences of the wicked, that they shoulde not too sweetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his iudgementes: so in his promises hee doeth in a manner take them to witnesse, howe vnworthie they are of his goodnesse. For who can denye that it is moste rightfull and conuenient, that the Lorde doe good to them of whome hee is honoured, and punish the despisers of his Maiestie, according to his seueritie? Therefore God doeth well and orderly when in his promises hee adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bounde with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then onely enioy his benefites, if they departe from their wickednesse: or for this purpose onely, that they may vnderstande that they are worthily excluded from these things, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, because hee seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithful to call vppon his grace, it shall not bee inconuenient, if hee attempt the same thing also by promises, which we haue shewed that hee hath done to great profite with commaundementes towarde them. Being enformed of the will of God, by his commandements, wee are put in minde of our miserie, which doe withall our heart too farre dissent from the same, and wee bee therewithall pricked forwarde to call vpon his spirite, whereby wee may be directed into the right way. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiently sharpened with commaundements, there are added promises which with a certaine sweetenesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that wee haue of righteousnesse, wee may be the more feruent to seeke the fauour of God. Lo how in these requestes, (if you will: If you shall heare,) the Lorde neither giueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

The vnthankefull may iustly be vpbraided with refusing the offer that God doth make of all good things, though without his grace which offreth they haue no power to attaine the things that are offred.

Num. 14.43. Iere. 32 13. Iere. 32.

11 The thirde sort of their argumentes, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring foorth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthankefull people, and saieth that they themselues onely were the cause that they receiued not of his tender loue all kinde of good thinges. Of which sort are the places: Amaleck and the Chananee are before you, with whose sworde you shall fall, because yee woulde not obey the Lorde, because I called and yee aunswered not, I will doe to this house as I did to Silo. Againe, this nation hath not heard the voice of the Lorde their God, nor hath receiued discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde. Againe, because yee haue hardened your heart and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euils are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) coulde such reproches be layde against them which might readily aunswere? As for vs, wee loued prosperitie, and feared aduersitie. But where as for to obteine the one and auoide the other wee obeyed not the Lorde, nor hearkened to his voyce: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, because we were subiect to the dominion of sinne. Vainely there-therefore are these euils layde to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoide. But leauing the pretence of necessitie, wherein they haue but a weake & sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge themselues of al fault. For if they be found guiltie of any fault, then the Lord doth not without cause reproche them, that it came to passe by their peruersnes, that they felt not the fruite of his clemencie. Let them aunswere therefore, whether they can denie, that their frowarde will was the cause of their stubbourneſſe. If they finde the spring head of the euill within themselues, why gape they to finde out foreine causes, that they might seeme not to haue beene authors of their own destruction? But if it be true that by their owne fault and none others, sinners are both depriued of the benefits of God, & chastised with punishments, then is there great reason why they shoulde heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they goe obstinatly forward in their faultes, they may learne in their miseries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vniust crueltie: that if they haue not cast off al willingnesse to learne, they may be werie of their sinnes, by the deseruings whereof they see themselues miserable & vndon, and may returne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lorde rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solemne prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidings of the Prophets which are alleged, did anaile with the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Iewes, to whome Hieremie is commaunded to declare the cause of their miseries, whereas yet it should not haue fallen otherwise than the Lorde had foresaide. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these wordes, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not aunswere thee. To what ende then did they sing to deafe men? that being euen loth and vnwilling, yet they shoulde vnderstand ỳ it was true that they heard, that it were wicked sacriledge if they should lay vpon God the blame of their euils which rested in themselues. By these fewe solutions thou maist easily deliuer thy selfe from the infinite heap of testimonies, which, for to erect an image of free will, the enimies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as wel out of the commandments as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochfully spoken in the Psalme concerning the Iewes: A froward generation that haue not made their heart streight. Also in another Psalm, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their hearts, and that because all the fault of obstinacie remaineth in the peruersnesse of men. But it is fondly gathered thereof, that the heart is pliable to either side, the preparing whereof is only of God. The Prophet saith: I haue enclined my heart to keepe thy commaundements, because he had willingly and with a cherefull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet hee doeth not boast himselfe to be the author of his owne inclination, which he confesseth in the same Psalme to be the gift of God. Therefore wee must holde in minde the admonition of Paul, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne saluation with feare and trembling, because it is the Lord that worketh both the willing and the perfourming. In deede hee assigneth them offices, to be doing, that they shoulde not giue themselues to sluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that he commaundeth them to haue feare and carefulnesse, he so humbleth them, that they may remember that the same thing which they are commaunded to do, is the proper worke of God, wherein plainly he expresseth, that the faithfull worke passiuely, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from heauen, that they should claime nothing at all to themselues. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs

2. Pet. 1. 5. that wee should adde power in faith, he graunteth not vnto vs a second office, as if we should do any thing seuerally by our selues, but onely hee awaketh the slothfulnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paul: Extinguish not the
1. Thess. 1. 9. spirite, for slothfulnesse doeth oftentimes creepe vpon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choise to cherish the light being offred them, his ignorance shalbe easily confuted: because the selfe same diligence that Paul requireth, commeth
2. Cor. 7. onely from God. For wee are also oftentimes commaunded to purge our selues from all filthinesse: whereas the holy Ghost doeth claime to himselfe alone the office of making holy. Finally, that by way of granting, the same thing is conueyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plaine by the
1. Iohn. 5. 18. wordes of Iohn: Whosoeuer is of God, saueth himselfe. The aduaunсers of free will take holde of this saying, as if wee were saued partly by the power of God, and partly by our owne: as though wee had not from heauen the verie same safe keeping, whereof the Apostle maketh mention. For which cause, Christ also prayeth his Father to saue vs from euill, and wee knowe
Ioh. 17. 15. that the godly, while they warre against Satan, doe get the victorie by no other armour & weapons, but by the armour and weapons of God Wherefore when Peter commaunded vs, to purifie our soules in the obedience of
1. Pet. 1. 22. trueth, hee by and by addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finaly, how all mens strength are of no force in the spirituall battell, Iohn briefely sheweth, when hee sayeth, that they which are begotten of God,
1. Iohn. 3. 9. cannot sin, because the seede of God abideth in them. And in another place
1. Iohn. 5. 4. he rendreth a reason why: for that our faith is the victorie that ouercommeth the worlde.

Vvhē Moses doth seeme to intimate a kind of facilitie in man to fulfil the lavv of God: he meaneth by the lavv the promises of the Gospell, vvhich are easily receiued not in respect of our habilitie but of Gods mercie vvhich vvorketh mightily in framing our hearts.

12 Yet there is alleged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which seemeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of the lawe, he protesteth vnto the people in this maner. The commaundement that I commaund thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre of: It is not in heauen, but hard by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest do it. Truely, if this be taken to be spoken of the bare commandementes, I graunt they be of no smal weight to this present matter. For though it were easie to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse & readinesse of obseruation, but of knowledge: yet euen so, peraduenture it would also leaue some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositor, taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake of the doctrine of the Gospel. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paul violently wrested those words, ỹ they might be drawen to the Gospel, although his boldnes so to say shal not be without impietie, yet is there sufficiēt matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to conuince him withal. For if Moses

ſpake of the commaundements onely, then he puffed vp the people with a moſt vaine confidence. For what ſhould they elſe haue done, but throwen themſelues downe hedlong, if they had taken vpon them the keeping of the law by their own ſtrength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that ſo readie eaſineſſe to keepe the law, where there is no acceſſe vnto it, but by a hedlong fall to deſtruction? Wherefore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moſes in theſe words did meane the couenant of mercie, which he had publiſhed together with the ſtreight requiring of the law. For in a fewe verſes before he had taught, that our hearts muſt be circumciſed by ỹ hand of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed that eaſineſſe, whereof he ſtreightway after ſpeaketh, not in the ſtrength of man, but in the help & ſuccor of the holy Ghoſt, which perfourmeth his worke mightily in our weakeneſſe. Albeit the place is not ſimply to be vnderſtanded of the commandements, but rather of the promiſes of the Goſpel, which are ſo far frō ſtabliſhing a power in vs to obtaine righteouſneſſe, that they vtterly ouerthrowe it. Paul conſidering that ſame, proueth by this teſtimonie, that ſaluation is offred vs in the Goſpel, not vnder that hard & impoſſible condition, wherewith the law dealeth with vs, that is, that they onely ſhal attaine it which haue fulfilled all the commaundements, but vnder a condition that is eaſie, readie, & plaine to come vnto. Therefore this teſtimonie maketh nothing to chalenge freedome to the will of man. Deu. 30. 8.

13 There are alſo certaine other places wont to be obiected, whereby is ſhewed that God ſometime, withdrawing the ſuccor of his grace, trieth mē, and waiteth to ſee to what ende they will apply their endeuours, as is that place in Oſee: I will go to my place till they put it in their heart & ſeeke my face. It were a fond thing (ſay they) if the Lord ſhould conſider whether Iſrael would ſeeke his face, vnleſſe their minds were pliable that they might after their own wil incline themſelues to the one ſide or ỹ other. As though this were not a thing commonly vſed with God in the Prophets, to make a ſhewe as if he did deſpiſe and caſt away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduerſaries gather out of ſuch threatnings? If they meane to gather, that the people being forſaken of God, may purpoſe their owne ſaluation: all the Scripture ſhall crye out againſt them in ſo doing. If they confeſſe that the grace of God is neceſſarie to conuerſion, why ſtriue they with vs? But they ſo graunt it neceſſarie, that ſtill they will haue mans power preſerued vnto him. Howe proue they that? truely not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aſide from man, and to looke what he will do being giuen ouer and left to himſelfe, and another thing to helpe his litle ſtrength after the meaſure of his weakeneſſe. What then (wil ſome man ſay) do theſe manners of ſpeaking meane? I anſwer that they are aſmuch in effect, as if God had ſaid: Foraſmuch as I preuaile nothing with this ſtubborne people by admoniſhing, exhorting and rebuking, I will withdraw my ſelfe awhile: and ſit ſtil and ſuffer them to bee afflicted: I will ſee if at length, after long miſeries, they will begin to remember mee, to ſeeke my face. The Lordes going farre away, ſignifieth the taking away of Prophecy: his looking what men will doe, ſignifieth that hee keeping ſilence, and as it were hiding himſelfe, doeth for a time exerciſe them with

That God is ſaid to withdraw himſelfe, and to trie whether mē will ſeeke after him, is no argumēt that of themſelues they can ſeeke vnto him: but that he by hiding his face doth bring them to ſee that without his grace they are nothing. Oſee. 5. 14.

diuerſe afflictions. Both theſe things he doeth to humble vs the more. For wee ſhoulde ſooner bee dulled than amended with the ſcourges of aduerſitie, vnleſſe he did frame vs to that tractableneſſe by his ſpirite. Now whereas the Lord being offended, and in a manner wearied with our obſtinate ſtubborneſſe, doeth for a time leaue vs (that is by taking away his worde in which he is wont to giue vs a certaine preſence of himſelfe) and doeth make a proofe what we would do in his abſence, it is falſly gathered hereof that there is any ſtrength of free will that he ſhould beholde & trie, foraſmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to driue vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

As the euil vvorkes vvhich vve do are ours, ſo the good vvorkes vvhich are termed ours vve do: howbeit, ſo that to do is ours by nature, but to doe vvell by grace vvhich is giuen vs from aboue.

14 They bring alſo for their defence the continuall manner of ſpeaking, that is vſed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good works are called ours, and it is no leſſe ſayde that wee doe the thing that is holy and pleaſing to God, than that wee committe ſinnes. But if ſinnes be iuſtly imputed to vs, as proceeding from vs, truely in righteous doings alſo ſome. what by the ſame reaſon ought to be aſſigned vnto vs. For it were againſt reaſon that it ſhould be ſayd that we do thoſe things, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motion, we are moued by God like ſtones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe part to the grace of God, yet theſe manners of ſpeaking doe ſhewe that our endeuour hath alſo yet a ſeconde parte. If that thing onely were ſtill enforced, that good workes are called ours, I would obiect againe, that the bread is called ours, which wee pray to haue giuen vs of God. What wil they get by the title of poſſeſſion, but that by the bountifulneſſe and free gift of God, the ſame thing becommeth ours, which otherwiſe is not due vnto vs? Therefore either let them laugh at the ſame abſurditie in the Lords prayer, or let them not recken this to bee laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no propertie, but by the liberalitie of God. But this is ſomewhat ſtronger, that the Scripture oftentimes affirmeth that we our ſelues do worſhip God, obey the law & apply good works. Sith theſe ar the ductics properly belonging to the minde and wil: how could it agree that theſe things are both referred to the holy Ghoſt, and alſo attributed to vs, vnleſſe there were a certaine communicating of our endeuour with the power of God? Out of theſe ſnares we ſhal eaſily vnwinde our ſelues, if we well conſider the manner how the ſpirite of the Lorde worketh in the holy ones. The ſimilitude wherewith they enuiouſly preſſe vs is from the purpoſe, for who is ſo fond to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the caſting of a ſtone? Neither doth any ſuch thing follow of our doctrine. We recken among the naturall powers of man, to allowe and refuſe, to will & not to will, to endeuour and to reſiſt, that is, to allow vanitie and to refuſe perfect goodneſſe, to will euill and to be vnwilling to good, to endeuour our ſelues to wickednes, & to reſiſt righteouſneſſe What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vſe that peruerſeneſſe as an inſtrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what ende he will, that he by an euil hand may execute his good worke. Shal we then compare a wicked man that ſo ſerueth the power of God, when he laboureth only to obey his own luſt, to a ſtone that being throwne by the violence of an other, is caried neither with mouing nor ſenſe nor will of his owner

Mat. 6.

We

We see how much difference there is. But what doeth he in good things, of which is our principal question: when he erecteth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restraineth mans will, that it be not caried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: and that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousnes, he boweth, frameth, fashioneth and directeth it to the rule of his righteousnes: and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth stablish & confirme it with the strength of his spirit. For which reason Augustine saith: Thou wilt say vnto me: then are we wrought & work not. Yea, thou both workest & art wrought, and thou workest wel when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirite of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first part he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the mouing of the Holy ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where hee byandby addeth, that by the name of helpe, may be gathered that wee also doe worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing seuerally to vs: but because he would not cherish slouthfulnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of Grace. Therefore he said a little before, Vnlesse God help vs, wee shal not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct & gouerne the wil of man. And it cannot gouerne it, vnlesse it correct it, reforme it, and renewe it (from whence wee say that the beginning of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) and vnlesse it moue it, stirre it, driue it forward, cary it and hold it. Whereupon wee do truely say, that all the doings that proceede from it, are wholy the only worke of the same grace. In the meane time we denie not that it is verie true that Augustine teacheth, that wil is not destroied by grace, but rather repaired. For both these things do stand verie well together: that mens wil be said to be restored, when the faultinesse and peruersnesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of iustice: and also that a new wil be said to be created in man, forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted, that it needeth vtterly to put on a new nature. Now is there no cause to the contrarie, but that we may well be saide to do the same thing that the spirite of God doeth in vs, although our own will do of it selfe giue vs towarde it nothing at all that may be seuered from his grace. And therfore we must keepe that in minde, which wee haue elsewhere alleged out of Augustine, that some do in vaine trauaile to find in the will of man some good thing that is properly her owne. For whatsoeuer mixture men studie to bring from the strength of free will to the grace of God, it is nothing but a corrupting of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirtie and bitter water. But although whatsoeuer good is in the will of man it proceedeth from the meere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to wil, it is not without cause said, that wee doe those things whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe. First, because it is ours whatsoeuer by his goodnes he worketh in vs, so that we vnderstand it to be not of our selues: and then because the minde is ours, the will is ours, the

Those things vvhich the grace of the Spirite vvorketh in vs, vve our selues are said to do, because the faculties vvhereby vve vvorke and the very act of vvorking are ours although the moving & the framing them to good be vvholy & meerely his.

That vvhich is ſpoken to Cain concerning the ſubiection of appetite u farre from proouing freevvill. Gen. 4. 7.

16 Thoſe other teſtimonies beſide theſe, that they ſcrape togither here and there, ſhall not much trouble euen meane wittes that haue wel conceiued onely the ſolutions aboue ſaide. They alleage that ſaying out of Geneſis, Thine appetite ſhalbe vnder thee, and thou ſhalt beare rule ouer it. Which they expound of ſinne, as if the Lorde did promiſe to Cain, that the force of ſinne ſhould not get the vpper hand in his minde, if he would labour in ſubduing of it. But wee ſay that it better agreeth with the order of the text, that this be taken to be ſpoken of Abel. For there Gods purpoſe was to reproue the wickednes of the enuie that Cain had conceiued againſt his brother. And that he doth two wayes. One, that in vaine he imagined miſchiefe to excel his brother in Gods ſight, before whom no honour is giuen but vnto righteouſneſſe: the other, that he was too much vnthankfull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued, which could not abide his brother, although he had him ſubiect vnder his authoritie. But leaſt we ſhould ſeeme therefore to embrace this expoſition, becauſe the other is againſt vs: let vs admit that God ſpake of ſinne. If it be ſo, then God either promiſeth or commandeth that which he there declareth. If he command, then haue we alreadie ſhewed, that thereby followeth no proofe of the power of man. If he promiſe, where is the fulfilling of the promiſe? for Cain became ſubiect to ſinne, ouer which he ſhould haue had dominion. They will ſay, that in the promiſe was included a ſecret condition, as if it had bin ſaid, that he ſhould haue the victorie if he would ſtriue for it. But who wil receiue theſe crooked compaſſes? For if this dominion be meant of ſinne, then no man can doubt that it is ſpoken by way of commandement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be aboue our power. Albeit both the matter it ſelfe & the order of Grammar do require, that there be a compariſon made of Cain & Abel, becauſe the elder brother ſhould not haue beene ſet behind the yonger, vnleſſe he had become worſe by his owne wicked doing.

S. Pauls vvords ſpeaking in one place of mans vvil & Gods mercie, in another of their labour vvith God vvhoſe ſeruice god vſeth, foullie abuſed by vpholders of freevvill. Rom. 9. 16. Li. 7. in Epi. ad Rom. Hiero. dial. in Pela.

17 They vſe alſo the teſtimonie of the Apoſtle, which ſaith, that it is not of him ỹ willeth, nor of him ỹ runneth, but of God that hath mercie. Whereby they gather that there is ſomewhat by mans wil and endeuour, which of it ſelfe though it be weake, being holpen by the mercie of God, is not without proſperous ſucceſſe. But if they did ſoberly wey what matter Paul there intreateth of, they would not ſo vnaduiſedly abuſe this ſentence. I knowe that they may bring foorth Origen and Hierome for maintainers of their expoſition: and I could on the other ſide ſet Auguſtine againſt them. But what they haue thought it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that ſaluation is prepared onely for them, to whome the Lord vouchſafeth to graunt his mercy: and that ruine & deſtruction is prepared for all thoſe that he hath not choſen. He had vnder the example of Pharao declared the ſtate of the reprobate, and had alſo confirmed the aſſuredneſſe of free election by the teſtimonie of Moſes, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy. Now he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercie. If it be thus vnderſtanded, ỹ will or endeuour are not ſufficient, becauſe they are too weake for so great a weight, that which Paul saith had not bin aptly spoken: Therefore away with these subtleties, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is more simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running that get vs the way to saluation, herein is onely the mercie of God. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that ỹ good. Tit. 3. 4.

nesse and kindnesse of God appeareth not by the workes of righteousnesse which we haue don, but for his infinite mercie. They themselues that make this argument, that Paul meant that there is some will and some running, because he said, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, would not giue me leaue to reason after the same fashion, that we haue don some good workes, because Paul saith, that we haue not attained the goodnesse of God by the good works that we haue done. If they see a fault in this argument, let them open their eyes, and they shal perceiue that their owne is not without the like deceit. For that is a sure reason that Augustine resteth Epi. 107. ad Vitalem.
vpon, if it were therefore saide that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the wil nor the running is sufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrary part that it is not of the mercie of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurditie, Augustine doth rightfully conclude, that this is spoke to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that wee ought both to wil and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs. No lesse vnaptly do some wrest that saying of Paul: We are the workers with God, which out 1. Cor. 3. 9.
of doubt ought to be restrained onely to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of themselues, but because God vseth their seruice, after that he hath made them meete and furnished with necessarie giftes.

18 They bring foorth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not vnknowen, is a writer of whose authoritie is doubted. But although wee refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully doe) what doth he testifie for free will? He saith, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hande of his own counsell: that Eccl. 15. 14.
commandements were giuen him, which if he obserued, he shoulde againe be preserued by them: that before man was set life and death, good & euill: that whatsoeuer he would, should be giuen him. Bee it, that man receiued from his creation power to obtain either life of death. What if on the other side we answere that he lost it? Truely my minde is not, to speake against Eccl. 7. 30.
Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create vpright, and he forged vnto himselfe many inuentions. But because man in swaruing, lost as it were by shipwracke both himselfe and al his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answere, not to them only, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attaine saluation, thy authoritie is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any preiudice, be it neuer so small, against ỹ vndouted word of God. But if thou only study to restraine the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euils vpon God, vseth to seeke a vaine defence for it selfe, and therefore thou answerest that vprightneſſe was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himſelfe was cauſe of his owne deſtruction, I willingly agree vnto it: ſo that againe thou agree in this with mee, that nowe by his owne fault he is ſpoyled of thoſe ornaments, wherewith God had clothed him at the beginning: and that ſo wee confeſſe together, that nowe he more needeth a Phiſitian than a defender.

The vvill of man through the vvound of originall ſinne vvas not left half dead and halfe aliue, as ſome vvould gather by the parable of the vvaifaring man vvho theeues left lying in the high vvaie. Luk. 10. 30.

19 Yet they haue nothing oftener in their mouth than the parable of Chriſt of the wayfaring man, whom theeues laide abroad halfe dead in the way. I knowe that it is common almoſt with all writers, that the calamitie of mankind is repreſented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Thereupon do our aduerſaries gather an argument, that man is not ſo maymed with the robberie of ſinne and the diuel, but that he keepeth ſtill remaining the leauings of his former good things, foraſmuch as it is ſaide, that he was left halfe aliue. For where is that halfe life, vnleſſe ſome portion both of right reaſon and wil remained? Firſt, if I would not giue place to their allegorie, I beſeech you, what would they doe? For there is no doubt that it was deuiſed by the fathers beſide the naturall ſenſe of the Lords words. Allegories ought to goe no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before them: ſo farre is it off, that they be by themſelues ſufficient to grounde any doctrines. And there want not reaſons, whereby I can, if I liſt, ouerthrowe this deuiſe, for the worde of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is vtterly dead, foraſmuch as concerneth bleſſed life. And Paul when he ſpeaketh of our redemption, doeth not ſay that we were healed, when we were halfe dead and halfe aliue, but that wee were raiſed vp againe when we were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe aliue to receiue the light of Chriſt, but them that ſleepe and are buried. And in like manner ſpeaketh the Lorde himſelfe, when hee ſaith, that the houre is come when the dead ſhall riſe againe at his voyce. With what face woulde they ſet this light alluſion againſt ſo many plaine ſentences? But let this allegorie haue the force of a certaine teſtimonie, yet what ſhall they wring out of vs thereby? Man is halfe aliue, therefore he hath ſomwhat left ſafe. I graunt: he hath a wit capable of vnderſtanding, although it pearce not to the heauenly and ſpiritual wiſedome: he hath true iudgement of honeſtie: he hath ſome feeling of the godhead, howbeit that he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpoſe come all theſe things? Truely they bring not to paſſe that the ſame ſaying of Auguſtine be taken from vs, which is alſo approued by common conſent of the Scholes: that after mans fall the freely giuen good things, whereupon ſaluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall giftes are corrupted and defiled. Let therefore this trueth remaine with vs vndoubted, which can bee ſhaken by no engines, that the minde of man is ſo eſtranged from the righteouſneſſe of God, that it conceiueth, coueteth, and enterpriſeth all wickedneſſe, filthineſſe, vncleanneſſe, and miſchiefe: that his heart is ſo throughly ſoked in poyſon of ſinne, that it can breath out nothing but corrupt ſtinke: But if at any time they do vtter any goodneſſe in ſhewe, yet ſtill the mind remaineth alway wrapped in hypocriſie and deceitfull crookedneſſe, and the heart entangled with inward peruerſeneſſe.

The

The vi. Chapter.

That man being loſt, muſt ſeeke for redemption in Chriſt.

SIth all mankinde hath periſhed in the perſon of Adam, that excellencie and nobilitie of beginning which we haue ſpoken of, would ſo little profite vs, that it woulde rather turne to our greater ſhame, till God appeare the redeemer in the perſon of his onely begotten ſonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with ſin to be his worke. Therefore ſith wee are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creatour whereof wee haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnleſſe there followed alſo faith ſetting foorth God a father vnto vs in Chriſt. Truely this was the naturall order that the frame of the worlde ſhoulde be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godlineſſe, from whence might be made a paſſage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicitie: but ſince our falling away, whither ſoeuer we turne our eyes, vpward and downward, the curſe of God ſtill preſenteth it ſelfe vnto our ſight, which while it poſſeſſeth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, muſt needes ouerwhelme our owne ſoules with deſperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly fauour towarde vs doe ſtill many wayes appeare: yet by beholding of the worlde we cannot gather that he is our Father when our conſcience inwardly pricketh vs, and ſheweth that there is in ſin iuſt cauſe of forſaking, why God ſhoulde not account or recken vs for his children. Beſide that there is in vs both ſlouthfulneſſe and vnthankfulneſſe: becauſe both our mindes, as they bee blinded, doe not ſee the trueth, and alſo as all our ſenſes be peruerſe, wee maliciouſly defraude God of his glorie. Therefore wee muſt come to that ſaying of Paul: becauſe in the wiſedome of God, the worlde knewe not God by wiſedome, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſſe of preaching to ſaue them that beleeue. The wiſedome of God hee calleth this honourable ſtage of heauen and earth, furniſhed with innumerable miracles, by beholdinge whereof we ought wiſely to haue knowen God. But becauſe wee ſo ill profited therein, hee calleth vs backe to the faith of Chriſt, which for that it ſeemeth fooliſh, the vnbeleeuers do diſdaine. Wherefore although the preaching of the croſſe doe not agree with mans wit, yet ought wee humbly to embrace it, if we deſire to returne to God our creator & maker, that he may beginne againe to be our father. Truely ſince the fall of the firſt man, no knowledge of God auailed to ſaluation, without the Mediatour. For Chriſt ſpeaketh not of his owne age only, but comprehendeth all ages, when hee ſaith that this is the eternall life, to knowe the father the one true God, and him whome he hath ſent Ieſus Chriſt. And ſo much the fowler is their ſluggiſhneſſe, which take vpon them to ſet open heauen to all prophane & vnbeleeuing men, without his grace, whome the Scripture ech where teacheth to be the only gate whereby wee enter into ſaluation. But if any will reſtraine that ſaying of Chriſt onely to the publiſhing of the Goſpell, wee haue in readineſſe wherewith to confute him. For this hath beene a common ſentence in all ages and among all nations, that without reconciliatiō they that are eſtranged from God, & pronounced accurſed, & the children of

Except wee knowe the fatherly goodneſſe of God ſhining in the face of Ieſus Chriſt, vvhich knowledge is attained vnto by the Goſpel, other knowing of God ſo farre foorth as he may be knowen by his creatures, neither hath been to any ones ſaluation ſince the fall of Adam, neither can be to ours ſufficiently auailable.

of wrath, cannot pleaſe God. And here may be alſo alleaged that which Chriſt aunſwered to the woman of Samaria: Ye worſhip what ye know not, but we worſhip that which wee knowe: becauſe the ſaluation is from the Iewes. In which wordes he both condemneth of falſhod all the religions of the Gentiles, and alſo aſſigneth a reaſon why, for that the Redeemer was promiſed vnder the lawe to the onely choſen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worſhip euer pleaſed God, but that which had reſpect vnto Chriſt. For which cauſe alſo Paul affirmeth that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and voide of the hope of life. Nowe where as Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Chriſt, and that al the worlde fell from it, we muſt returne to the ſame fountaine Chriſt. And therefore Chriſt, in ſo much as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himſelfe to be the life. And truely the entrance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the children of God. But it is not meete that they be accounted in the place and degree of children, that are not grafted into the bodie of the only begotten ſonne. And Iohn plainly teſtifieth, that they which beleeue in his name, are made the children of God. But becauſe it is not directly my purpoſe yet to diſcourſe of faith in Chriſt, therefore it ſhall for this time be ſufficient to haue touched it by the way.

Ephe.2.12

That the fathers vnder the lawe neuer promiſed any happines to the Church otherwiſe then by Chriſt.

2 And therefore God neuer ſhewed himſelfe merciful to the olde people, nor euer did put them in any hope of grace without the mediatour. I omit to ſpeake of the ſacrifices of the lawe, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that ſaluation is no where elſe to be ſought, but in the cleanſing which was perfourmed by Chriſt alone. Only this I ſay, that the bleſſed & happie ſtate of the church hath bin alway grounded vpon the perſon of Chriſt. For though God comprehended al the iſſue of Abraham in his couenant, yet doth Paul wiſely reaſon, that Chriſt is properly that ſeede in whom all nations were to be bleſſed, foraſmuch as we know that not al they were reckened his ſeede that were begotten of him according to the fleſh. For (to ſpeake nothing of Iſmael and other) howe came it to paſſe, that of the two ſonnes of Iſaac, that is Eſau and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was choſen, the other refuſed? Yea, how came it to paſſe that the elder was reiected and the yonger only tooke place? And how alſo came it to paſſe, that the greater part ſhoulde be forſaken? It appeareth therefore, that the ſeede of Abraham was principally reckened in one perſon, and that the promiſed ſaluation did neuer ſtande ſure till it came to Chriſt, whoſe office is to gather together the things that were ſcattered abroad. Therefore the firſt adoption of the choſen people did hang vpon the grace of the Mediatour. Which though it be not in ſo plaine wordes expreſſed by Moſes, yet it ſufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knowen to all the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuel entreating of the felicitie of the godly, euen then ſaide thus in her ſong: God ſhall giue ſtrength to his king, and ſhall exalt the horne of his annoynted. In which wordes ſhee meaneth that God ſhall bleſſe his Church. Wherewith alſo agreeth the oracle that is within a little after adioyned: The Prieſt whom I ſhall appoint ſhal walke before mine annointed.

Nei-

Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heauenly father was to haue the liuely image of Christ to be seene in Dauid & his posteritie. Therfore meaning to exhort the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kisse the Sonne. Wherewith this saying of the Gospel also agreeth: He that honoureth not the sonne, honoureth not the father. Therefore although by falling away of ten tribes the kingdome decaied: yet it behooued the couenant to stand which God had made in Dauid and his successours: as also he said by the Prophets: I wil not altogether cut of the kingdome, for Dauid my seruants sake, and for Hierusalems sake, whome I haue chosen: but there shal remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the seconde and third time. It is also expressely added: I will afflict the seede of Dauid, but not for euer. Within a little space of time after, it is said: For Dauid his seruants sake God hath giuen a light in Hierusalem, to raise vp a sonne and to keepe Hierusalem in safetie. Now when the state grewe towarde destruction, it was saide againe: God would not scatter Iuda for Dauid his seruants sake, because hee had spoken that hee woulde giue a light to him and his sonnes for euer. Finally, this is the summe, that all other being passed ouer, only Dauid was chosen, vpon whome the good pleasure of God shoulde rest As in another place it is said: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, & the tabernacle of Ioseph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. Hee hath chosen his seruant Dauid to feede Iacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. To conclude, it pleased God so to saue his church, that the safetie and preseruation thereof should hang vpon that one head, & therefore Dauid crieth out, The Lord, the strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a praier: Saue thy people & blesse thine inheritance: meaning that the state of the Church is with vnseparable knot ioyned to the gouernement of Christ. And in the same meaning in an other place: Lord saue vs: Let the king heare vs in the day that we shal call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithfull did vpon none other confidence flie to the helpe of God, but because they were hidden vnder the succour of the king. Which is gathered by an other Psalm. Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lorde. Where it is plainly inough, that ỹ faithful are called backe vnto Christ, that they may hope that they shalbe saued by the hand of god. The same respect hath the other praier, where al the Church calleth vpon the mercie of god. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hande, vpon the sonne of man, whom thou hast preserued (or appointed) to thy self. For though the author of the Psalme bewaileth the scattering abroad of the whole people, yet hee praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, & al things to mans seeming destroyed, Ieremie lamenteth the ouerthrow of the Church, he doeth principally complaine that by destruction of the kingdome all hope was cut off from the faithful. Christ (saith he) the spirite of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom we said: In thy shadow we shal liue among the nations. Hereby nowe it sufficiently appeareth that because God cannot be merciful to mankinde without the Mediatour, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fathers in time of the law to whom they might direct their faith.

The ancient Prophets neuer spake of the churches deliuerance out of miserie, but they taught withall, that through Christ they were deliuered.

3 Now, where comfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliuerance of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance & hope is auaunced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, sayeth Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophets make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call back the people to the promise made to Dauid, concerning the euerlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no maruell. For otherwise there had beene no assurance of the couenant. For which purpose serueth that notable answere of Esay. For when he sawe that the vnbeleeuing king Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the raising of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safetie, as it were sodainly, he passed ouer to Messias. Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a sonne, meaning indirectly that though ỹ king & his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselues to discredite the trueth of God, yet the couenant should not be voide, but that the redeemer shoulde come at his appointed time. Finally, it was the care of all the Prophets, to the ende they might shewe that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdome of Dauid, whereupon hanged the redemption and euerlasting saluation. So Esay saith: I will make a couenant with you the faithfull mercies of Dauid. Behold I haue giuen him for a witnesse vnto nations, that is, because the faithfull when their state is at the worst, could not otherwise haue any hope, but by the meanes of him being witnesse, that God woulde be appeasable toward them. Likewise Hieremie, to raise them vp being in despaire, sayeth: Beholde the dayes come, wherein I will raise vp vnto Dauid a righteous branche, and then shall Iuda be saued, and Israel shall dwell in safetie. And Ezechiel saith, I wil raise vp one sheepeheard ouer my sheepe, euen Dauid my seruant. I the Lord wil be a God to them, and my seruant Dauid for a sheepheard. And I will make a couenant of peace with them. Also in another place, after he had entreated of the incredible renuing, he saith: my seruant Dauid shal be their king, and there shalbe one sheepeheard ouer all, and I will make an euerlasting couenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places out of many, because I onely meane to haue the readers put in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway beene reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophets also speake agreeably hereunto, as it is saide in Osee. The children of Iuda and the children of Israel shalbee gathered together, and shall appoint to themselues one head. Which he afterwarde more plainely expoundeth, The children of Israel shall returne, and shall seeke for the Lorde their God and Dauid their king. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressely sayeth, The king shall go before them, and the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to praise the renuing of the people saith: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of Dauid that is fallen downe, and I will hedge vp the gappes, and raise vp the places ouerthrowen, euen because that was the onely standard of saluation, to haue the royall glorie to rise vp againe on high in the stocke of Dauid, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was neerer to the appearing of Christ, so doeth he more plainly crie out: be glad thou daughter of Sion, reioyce thou daughter of Hierusalem. Beholde thy king commeth, righteous and saued. Which agreeth with the place of the Psalme before alleaged: The Lorde the strength of the saluations of his annointed, Lord saue vs. Where saluation is deriued from the head to the whole bodie. Psa.28.8.

4 It was Gods will to haue the Iewes instructed with these prophecies, that to seeke for their deliuerance, they should bend their eyes directly to Christ. And though they had shamefully swarued, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle bee abolished, that God by the hande of Christ, as he had promised to Dauid, woulde be the deliuerer of the Church, and so the couenant should be of his own free graunt, whereby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this song sounded in the mouth of the children when Christ a litle before his death entred into Hierusalem, Hosianna, to the sonne of Dauid. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowen and spoken of, and according to common vse that they song that the onely pledge of Gods mercie remained vnto them, in the coming of the Redeemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainely and perfectly beleeue in God, biddeth them to beleeue on himselfe, Beleeue ye in God (saith he) then beleeue also in mee. For though (to speake properly) faith climmeth vp from Christ to the father, yet hee meaneth that the same faith, albeit it rest vpon God, doeth by litle & litle vanish away vnlesse he become a meane to hold it in assured stedfastnesse. Otherwise the maiestie of God is too high for mortall men, which creepe vpon the grounde like wormes, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that common saying, that God is the obiect of faith, but in such sort that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the inuisible Image of god, but by this title we are put in minde, that if wee finde not God in Christ, saluation cannot be knowen vnto vs. For although among the Iewes, the Scribes and Pharisees had darkened with false inuentions, that which the Prophets had spoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ tooke it for a thing confessed as receiued by common consent, that there was none other remedie in a dispeired case, & none other meane of deliuering the Church, but by giuing the Mediatour. In deede that was not commonly knowen among the people as it ought to haue bin, which Paul teacheth, that Christ is the end of the lawe. But how true and assured it is, doeth plainly appeare by the law & the Prophets. I speake not yet of faith, beeause there shall be elsewhere a more conuenient place for it. Onely let the readers hold this as fast stablished, that the first degree of godlinesse be, to acknowledge God to be a Father vnto vs, to defende, gouerne and cherish vs, till he gather vs together into the euerlasting inheritance of his kingdome: & that hereby it plainly appeareth which we said euen now, ỹ the knowledge of god which bringeth saluation, standeth not without Christ, & that therefore from the beginning he hath beene set foorth vnto all the elect, that they shoulde looke vpon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. According to this meaning writeth Irenæus, that the Father which is vnmeasurable, is in his Sonne measured, because he hath applied himself to the measure of our capacitie, least he should drowne our mindes with the vnmeasurablenes of his glorie. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, doe wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasie, as though there were in Christ but a portion of the godhead deriued from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone. That saying of Iohn hath alwayes beene true. Hee that hath not the sonne, neither hath he the Father. For though in olde time many did boast that they worshipped the soueraigne God, the maker of heauen & earth: yet because they had no Mediator, it was impossible that they shoulde truely taste of the mercie of God, & so be persuaded that he was their father. Therfore because they knewe not the head that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them, whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into grosse and filthie superstitions, they bewrayed their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turkes although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heauen & earth is their God, yet do they thrust an idole in place of the true God while they swarue from Christ.

It vvas a common principle generally receiued amongest the Iewes, though not so perfectly vnderstood as behoued, that their deliuerer should be Christ, vvithout vvhose knowledge all other nations vainly vvorshipped God.

1. Iohn. 2. 31.

The vii. Chapter.

That the lawe was giuen, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ, vntil hu comming.

The lawe was giuen by Moses to nourish men in hope of saluation by Christ, as appeareth by the often mention which he maketh of the couenant, and by the whole forme of ceremonies and seruice therein prescribed, which without spirituall relation vnto thu were vaine and idle.

BY this continuall processe that we haue rehearsed, may be gathered, that the Law was added about foure hundred yeares after the death of Abraham, not for this entent to lead away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe their mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a desire of him, and to confirme them in looking for him, that they shoulde not waxe faint with long tariance. I meane by this worde Law, not only the tenne commaundements, which prescribe a rule howe to liue godlily and righteously, but also the forme of religion deliuered by the hande of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawgiuer to abolish the blessing promised to the kindred of Abraham: but rather wee see howe euery where hee putteth the Iewes in remembrance of ỳ free couenant made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if hee had beene sent to renue the same. That was most plainely set foorth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fond, than for men to offer vp loathsome stinke of the fatte of cattell, to reconcile themselues to God thereby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloud to wash away their filthinesse? Finally, all the seruice of God appointed in the lawe (if it be considered by it selfe, and doe not containe shadowes and figures, which the trueth should answere vnto) shalbe but a verie mockerie. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermon, and in the Epistle to the Hebrewes is that place so diligently weyed. Where God commaundeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to ỳ paterne that had bene shewed him in the mount. For if there had not bene some spiritual thing appointed ỳ they should tende vnto, the Iewes shoulde no lesse haue fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men ỳ neuer earnestly applyed the study of godlines, cannot without lothsom tediousnes abide to heare so many sundry fashions of vsages: & they not only maruel why God wearied his people with such a heape

heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorne them as childrens playes. And the cause is, for that they consider not the ende, from which if the figures of the law be seuered, they must needes be condemned of vanitie. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore commaund sacrifices because he would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their mindes higher. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delighted with no other worshipping but spirituall. This doe the sayings of the Prophets testifie, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of sluggishnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expositours of the lawe, so they woulde by this meane haue mens eyes directed to the marke from which the common people strayed. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes it is certeinly gathered, that the lawe was not voide of Christ. For Moses did set foorth vnto them this ende of the adoption, that they should become a priestly kingdome to God. Which they could not obtaine vnlesse there were had for the meane thereof a great and more excellent reconciliation, than by the bloud of beasts. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondslaues of sinne, to be aduanced to royall dignitie, and so to become partakers of the glorie of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefite should come vnto them from elsewhere than from themselues? Also howe could the right of priesthood remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of sinnes were abominable to God, vnlesse they had beene consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth verie aptly turne that saying of Moses, where he teacheth, that the fulnesse of grace, the tast whereof the Iewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Christ: Ye are (saith he) a chosen kindred, a kingly priesthoode. For to this end tendeth that turning of ỹ words, to shewe that they, to whome Christ appeared by the Gospel, haue obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both with priestly and kingly honour, that trusting vpon their mediatour, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

Exod. 10. 6.

1. Pet. 2. 9.

3 And here by the way it is to bee noted, that the kingdome which at length was erected in the house of Dauid, is part of the lawe, and contained vnder the ministerie of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that as well in all the kindred of the Leuites as in the posteritie of Dauid Christ was set before the eyes of the olde people as in a double looking glasse. For, as I saide euen nowe, they could not otherwise be before god either kings or priests, which were both the bondslaues of sinne and of death, and defiled by their owne corruption. Hereby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, that the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a scholemaster, til the seede came for whose sake the promise was giuen. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly knowen, they were like vnto children, whose weakenes could not yet beare a full knowledge of heauenly things, but how they were by ceremonies as it were lead by the hande to Christ, is spoken before, & may be better vnderstanded by many testimonies of the Prophets. For although it was commanded them to come daily with newe sacrifices to appease God:

How the lawe both ceremoniall and morall led the people of God vnto Christ.

Gal. 3. 24.

Esay.53. Daniel 9. yet Esay promiseth that all their sinnes shalbee cleansed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniel agreeably sayeth: The Priestes appointed of the tribe of Leui, did enter into the Sanctuarie: but of the only priest it was once

Psa.110.4. said, that by an oath hee was chosen of God to be a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the annointing with oile was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth that there shalbe another maner of annointing. And because I wil not tarrie vpon many examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues euen from the 4. chapter to the 11. doth largely and plainly ynough shewe, that the ceremonies are nothing woorth & vaine til we come to Christ. As concerning the ten commaundementes:

Rom.10.4. that lesson of Paul is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the ende of the law vnto saluation, to euerie one that beleeueth. And an other lesson,

2.Cor.3.6. that Christ is the Spirite that quickeneth the letter which of it self slaieth. For in the first of these two, he meaneth that righteousnesse is vainly taught by commaundements, vntill Christ do giue it both by free imputation and by the spirit of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the lawe. Because it shoulde nothing profite vs to knowe what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did succour vs fainting and oppressed vnder the yoke and vntollerable burden. In another place hee teacheth

Gal.3.19. that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie being proued guiltie of their owne damnation. And, because this is the true and onely preparation to seeke Christ, whatsoeuer hee teacheth in diuerse words do all verie wel agree together. But because he then was in contention with peruerse teachers, which fained that we do deserue righteousnes by the workes of the lawe, to confute their errour, he was compelled sometime to speake precisely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is cloathed with the couenant of free adoption.

Although the lavv do promise and vvould no doubt perform life vnto them that keepe the lavv, yet can vve looke for no fruite at all by those promises, but feele our ovvn miserie thereby the more increased because of our vveaknes vvhich answvereth not the righteousnes prescribed by the lavv.

3 But now it is good to knowe, how being taught by the morall lawe, wee are made more inexcusable, that our own guiltinesse may moue vs to craue pardon. If it be true that wee be taught perfection of righteousnesse in the lawe: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousnesse before God, that is, whereby a man may be deemed and accounted righteous before the heauenly throne of iudgement. Wherefore Moses when he had published the law, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had set before Israel life and death, good & euill. And we may not denie, but that the rewarde of eternall saluation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promised it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether wee perfourme that obedience, vpon desert whereof we may conceiue a trust of that reward. For to what small purpose is it, to see the rewarde of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse wee further knowe whether wee may by that way attaine to eternall life? But

Deut.30.19. herein the weakenesse of the lawe doth shewe it selfe. For because that keeping of the lawe is found in none of vs all, wee are excluded from the promises of life, and doe fall into curse onely. I do not now tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must come to passe. For whereas the doctrine of the lawe is farre aboue the power of man, he may in deede a farre off, look at the promises, but yet not gather any fruit of them. Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodneſſe of them he may the better weye his owne miſerie, while he conſidereth, that all hope of ſaluation being cut off, death doth certeinly hang ouer him On the other ſide do preſſe vs terrible penal lawes, which do hold entangled and faſt bound, not only a fewe of vs, but euery one without exception: they preſſe vs, I ſay, and doe purſue vs, with an vnappeaſable rigour, ſo that we may ſee moſt preſent death in the lawe.

4 Therefore if we looke only vpon the law, wee can doe nothing but be diſcouraged, be confounded, and diſpeire, foraſmuch as by it we are al damned & curſed, & kept farre off from the bleſſedneſſe that he offreth to them that worſhip him Wilt thou ſay then, Doth the Lord ſo mocke vs? For how ſmally doeth it differ from mocking, to ſhew forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhort men vnto it, to proteſt that it is layde open for vs, when in the meane ſeaſon the entrie vnto it is foreeloſed & impoſſible to be come to? I anſwere: although the promiſes of the lawe, in ſo much as they are conditionall, do hang vpon the perfect obedience of the law, which can no where be found, yet are they not giuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they ſhalbe void and of no effect vnto vs, vnleſſe God embrace vs with his free goodneſſe without regard of our works, & vnleſſe we do imbrace by faith the ſame goodneſſe giuen vs by the goſpel, then want they not their effectualnes, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doeth ſo freely giue al things vnto vs, that he addeth this alſo to the heape of his bountifulneſſe, that not refuſing our halfe full obedience, & remitting ſo much as it wanteth of ful performance, he ſo maketh vs to enioy the fruit of the promiſes of the law, as if we our ſelues had fulfilled the condition. But we wil at this preſent proceede no further in this matter, becauſe it ſhalbee more largely to be entreated of, when we ſhal ſpeake of the iuſtification of faith.

The premiſes of the lawe being conditionall, are not of no effect vnto vs, though wee be vnable to performe the condition, becauſe our not performing is through mercie pardoned, & our weake obedience accepted and rewarded, as if it were a full performance.

5 Whereas we ſaide that it is impoſſible to keepe the law, that is in fewe wordes to be both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accompted an opinion of great abſurditie, ſo farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accurſed: what Hierome thought, I do nothing ſtay vpon: as for vs, let vs ſearch what is trueth. I will not here make long circumſtances of diuerſe ſortes of poſſibilities. I call that impoſſible, which both neuer hath beene, and alſo is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If wee record from the fartheſt time of memorie, I ſay that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his ſoule, with all his power: Againe, that there hath bene none that hath not bin troubled with concupiſcence Who can ſay nay? I ſee in deed what maner holy men fooliſh ſuperſtition doth imagine vnto vs, euen ſuch whoſe pureneſſe the heauenly Angels do ſcarcely counteruaile: but againſt both the Scripture and proofe of experience. I ſay alſo, that there ſhall none hereafter be, that ſhall come to the marke of true perfection, vnleſſe hee be looſed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open teſtimonies of Scripture. Salamon ſaide, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that ſinneth not. And Dauid ſaide: euery liuing man ſhall not bee iuſtiiuſtified in thy ſight. Iob in many places affirmeth the ſame. But Paul moſt plainly of all: that the fleſh luſteth againſt the ſpirite, and the ſpirite againſt the fleſh. And by no other reaſon hee prooueth that all that are vnder the law are ſubiect to the curſe, but becauſe it is written, that curſed are all they that do not abide in all the commaundements thereof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confeſſed, that no man can abide in them. And whatſoeuer is foreſpoken by the Scriptures, that muſt bee holden for perpetuall, yea and neceſſarie. With ſuch ſuttletie did the Pelagians trouble Auguſtine, ſaying, that there is wrong done to God, to ſaye that hee doth commaund more than the faithfull are able by his grace to perfourme. Auguſtine, to auoide their cauillation confeſſed, that the Lorde might in deede, if hee woulde, aduaunce a mortall man to the pureneſſe of Angels: but that hee neither hath done ſo at any time, nor will do, becauſe he hath otherwiſe affirmed in the Scriptures. And that do I alſo nor denie. But I adde further, that it is inconuenient to diſpute of his power againſt his trueth, and that therefore this ſentence is not ſubiect to cauillations if a man ſhould ſay, that that thing is impoſſible to be, whereof the Scriptures doe pronounce that it ſhall not be. But if they diſpute of the worde: when the Diſciples asked the Lord, who may be ſaued, he aunſwered: with men in deede it is impoſſible, but with God all things are poſſible. Alſo Auguſtine with a moſt ſtrong reaſon ſtiffely defendeth, that in this fleſh we neuer yelde to God the due loue that we owe him. Loue (ſaith he) ſo followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath firſt fully knowen his goodneſſe. Wee, while we wander in this worlde, ſee by a glaſſe and in a darke ſpeache: it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controuerſie, that in this fleſh it is impoſſible to fulfill the lawe, if wee behold the weakneſſe of our owne nature, as it ſhal yet alſo in another place be proued by Paul.

Rom.8.3.

The firſt vſe of the moral lavv to make men knovv their ovvne vnrighteouſnes, that they be not beſotted through ſelfe-liking, nor deceiued vvith a vain ſhadovv of holineſſe in ſteede of that vvhich is ſound & perfect.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly ſet foorth: let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vſe of the law which they call Morall. Now, as farre as I vnderſtand, it is conteined in theſe three partes. The firſt is, that while it ſheweth to euery man the righteouſnes of God, that is, the righteouſneſſe which only is acceptable to God, it admoniſh, certifie, proue guiltie, yea & condemne euery man of his own vnrighteouſneſſe. For ſo is it needefull that man blinded & drunke with loue of himſelfe, be driuen both to the knowledge & the confeſſion of his owne weakeneſſe & vncleanneſſe: for aſmuch as if his vanitie be not euidently conuinced, he ſwelleth with mad affiance of his owne ſtrength, and can neuer bee brought to thinke of the ſlenderneſſe thereof, ſo long as he meaſureth it by the proportion of his own will. But ſo ſoone as he beginneth to compare his ſtrength to the hardneſſe of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For howſoeuer he before conceiued a great opinion of it, yet by & by he feeleth it to pant vnder ſo great a burden, & then to ſhake & falter, at laſt euen to fall down & faint. So being taught by the ſcholing of the law, he putteth off that arrogancie wherwith before he was blinded. Likewiſe he is to be healed of another diſeaſe of pride, whereof wee haue ſaide that hee is ſicke. So long as he is ſuffred to ſtande to his owne iudgement, hee deuiſeth

Hypo-

Hypocriſie in ſteede of righteouſneſſe, wherwith being contented, he riſeth vp in courage, by I wote not what forged righteouſneſſes, againſt the grace of God. But ſo ſoone as he is compelled to trie his life by the balance of the lawe, then leauing the preſumption of the counterfait righteouſneſſe, he ſeeth himſelfe to be an infinite ſpace diſtant from holineſſe: Againe, that he floweth full of infinite vices, whereof before he ſeemed cleane. For the euils of luſt are hidden in ſo deepe and crooked priuie corners, that they eaſily deceiue the ſight of man. And not without cauſe the Apoſtle ſaith, that he knewe not luſt, except the law had ſaid: Thou ſhalt not luſt: becauſe except it be by the law diſcloſed out of her lurking holes, it deſtroyeth miſerable man ſo ſecretely, that he feeleth not the deadly darte thereof. Rom.7.7.

7 So the lawe is like a certaine looking glaſſe wherein wee beholde, firſt our weakeneſſe, and by that our wickedneſſe, and laſt of all by them both our accurſedneſſe, euen as a glaſſe repreſenteth vnto vs the ſpottes of our face. For when power faileth man to followe righteouſneſſe, then muſt he needes ſticke faſt in the mire of ſinnes. And after ſinne by and by followeth curſe. And of how much the greater tranſgreſſion the lawe holdeth vs guiltie and conuict, with ſo much the more greuous iudgement it condemneth vs. For this purpoſe maketh the ſaying of the Apoſtle, that by the law is the knowledge of ſinne For there he ſpeaketh only of the firſt office of the lawe, the proofe wherof is in ſinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are theſe two ſayings, that the law entred that ſinne might abound, & therefore that it is the miniſtration of death that worketh wrath and ſlaieth. For without doubt ſo much more groweth iniquitie, with how much more vnderſtāding of ſinne the conſcience is ſtriken, becauſe vnto breach of lawe is added obſtinacie againſt the maker of the lawe. It followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the deſtruction of the ſinner, becauſe of it ſelfe it can doe nothing but accuſe, condemne and deſtroy. And as Auguſtine writeth, if the ſpirit of grace be abſent, the lawe is preſent with vs, onely to this end, to accuſe vs & kil vs. And yet when this is ſaide, neither is the lawe diſhonoured thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie therof. Truly if our will were wholy framed and diſpoſed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainely the onely knowledge of it were ſufficient to ſaluation. But foraſmuch as our fleſhly & corrupt nature fighteth, as an enimie with the ſpirituall lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the diſcipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was giuen for ſaluation, (if it had founde fit hearers) turneth to the occaſion of ſinne and death. For ſith wee are all proued tranſgreſſors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteouſneſſe of God, ſo much the more on the other ſide it diſcloſeth our iniquitie: the more ſurely that it confirmeth the rewarde of life and ſaluation laid vp for righteouſneſſe, ſo much the more aſſured it maketh the deſtruction of the wicked. So farre is it off therefore that theſe ſayings ſhould be to the diſhonour of the law, that they much auaile to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that wee are hindered by our owne wickedneſſe, and peruerſenes, that we enioy not the bleſſedneſſe of life ſet openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the ſuccour of the lawe, is made ſo much the

It is no dishonor to the lavv of god to say that it doth but represent vnto vs our inhabilitie to obey, our disobeying, & our cursed estate through disobedience: because in thu vvee are taught both hovv our ovvne vvickednesse hindereth vs from enioying the blessednesse of the lavv, & hovv the mercie of God aboundeth in giuing vs that blessednesse from vvhich our ovvn vvickednes doth in it selfe exclude vs.

ſweeter,& the mercie more louely that giueth it vnto vs, wherby we learne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new giftes vpon vs.

The end vvhy the lavv doth bring men to the ſight of their ovvne miſerie,is not that they might deſpaire,but that forſaking all confidence in themſelues,they might reſt vpon the mercie of God in Ieſus Chriſt alone.

8 And whereas the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is ſealed by the teſtimonie of the lawe,it is not done for this purpoſe (if at leaſt we well profit in it) to make vs fall down with deſpeire,or with diſcouraged mindes to tumble downe headlong. In deede the reprobate are amaſed after that maner, but that is by reaſon of their obſtinacie , but with the children of God there behoueth to be another ende of inſtruction. I graunt the Apoſtle teſtifieth that wee are all condemned by iudgement of the lawe, that euery mouth may be ſtopped, and that all the worlde may become bounde vnto God: but yet the ſame Apoſtle in another place teacheth, that God hath concluded all vnder vnbeliefe,not to deſtroye all,or to ſuffer all to periſh, but that he might haue mercie of all, that leauing the fooliſh opinion of their owne ſtrength , they might vnderſtande, that they ſtande and are vpholden by the onely hande of God : that they being naked and emptie, may flee to his mercy , that they may reſt themſelues wholy vpon it, hide themſelues wholly in it,take holde of it alone in ſteede of righteouſneſſe & merites , which is laide open in Chriſt for all men whoſoeuer they be that with true faith doe deſire and looke for it. For God in the commaundements of the law appeareth but a rewarder of perfect righteouſneſſe,wherof we all are deſtitute,and on the other ſide a rigorous iudge of euil doings. But in Chriſt, his face ſhineth full of grace and lenitie, euen towarde the wretched and vnworthie ſinners.

Man being condemned of ſinne by the lavv, the effect thereof in the good is the craving of helpe from God, in the bad their deſpairing of themſelues vvithout aſpiring to any helper.

9 Of profiting,to craue the grace of his helpe, Auguſtine ſpeaketh oft, as when he writeth to Hilarie, The lawe commaundeth that endeuouring to doe the thinges commanded, and being wearied with our weakeneſſe vnder the lawe,we ſhould learne to aske the helpe of grace. Againe to Aſelline: The profit of the lawe is to conuince man of his owne weakeneſſe,and compell him to craue the Phyſicke of grace that is in Chriſt. Againe to Innocent of Rome: The lawe commaundeth,and grace miniſtreth ſtrength to do. Againe to Valentine: God commaundeth thoſe things that wee cannot doe, that wee may learne to knowe what to aske of him. Againe: The lawe was giuen to accuſe you , that being accuſed you ſhould feare , that fearing you ſhoulde craue pardon , and not preſume of your owne ſtrengthes. Againe: The lawe was giuen for this purpoſe, of great to make litle, to ſhewe that thou haſt no ſtrength of thine owne to righteouſneſſe , that thou as poore, vnworthie and needy,ſhouldeſt flee vnto grace. After, he turneth his ſpeech to God and ſaith: Do ſo Lord,do ſo mercifull Lord, commaunde that which cannot be fulfilled: yea , commaund that which cannot but by thy grace be fulfilled, that when men cannot fulfill it by their own ſtrength, euery mouth may be ſtopped,and no man may thinke himſelfe great . Let all be little ones,and let al the worlde be guiltie before thee. But I am not wiſe to heap vp ſo many teſtimonies , ſith that holye man hath written a booke properly of that matter,which he hath intituled , Of the Spirite and Letter. The ſecond profiting he doeth not ſo liuely deſcribe, either becauſe he knewe that it did hang vpon the former,or becauſe he did not ſo wel vnderſtand derstand it, or because he wanted wordes wherewith distinctly & plainly to expresse his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceiued: but this first office of the law is not idle euen in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus farre forward with the children of God, that after the throwing down of their flesh they be renued & florish againe in the inward man, but amased with the first terrour do lie still in desperation: yet it serueth to shewe forth the equitie of Gods iudgement, that their consciences be tossed with such wayes. For they euer willingly desire to make shift against the iudgement of God. Now while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonished with the testimonie of the lawe and their conscience doe bewray in themselues what they haue deserued.

10 The seconde office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is iust & right, vnlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penal ordinances therein, may be restrained at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inwarde mind is moued or affected withal, but because being as it were bridled, they withhold their hand from outward worke, & do keepe in their peruersnesse within them, which otherwise they woulde haue outragiously poured out. Thereby they become truely neither the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practise which they haue conceiued in their mind, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a heart framed to the feare & obedience of God, yea, the more that they holde backe themselues, so much the stronglier within they are kindled, they burne, they boile, readie to doe any thing, & to break forth any whither, if this terror of the law did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spitefully hate the lawe, and do detest God the lawmaker, so that if they could, they would verie faine take him away, whome they cannot abide, neither when he commandeth rightfull things, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the despisers of his maiestie. In some in deede more darkly, & in some more plainly, but in all generally that are not regenerate, is this feeling, that they are drawen to the following of the law not by willing submission, but resisting and against their willes, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousnes is necessary for the publike common state of men, the quiet wherof is herein prouided for, while order is taken that all things be not confounded with vprore, which woulde come to passe, if all thinges were lawfull for al men. Yea, it is not vnprofitable for the children of God to be exercised with this Scholing, so long as they before their calling being yet destitute of the spirite of sanctification, are stil wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawen backe, though it be but from outward licentiousnes, by the terrour of Gods vengeance, although for ỹ they are not yet tamed in mind, they go for the present time but a litle forwarde, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yoke of Christ, so that whē they are called, they be not altogether rude and rawe to discipline, as to a thing vnknowen. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to haue touched, when he saith that the law was not set for the righteous man, but for the vnrighteous and disobedient, wicked and sinners, cuill doers and prophane men, slayers

The second office of the lawe is the bridling of their vnrulinesse through feare of punishment, whome the spirit of sanctification hath not yet endued with an inward hartie desire otherwise to serue God.

1. Tim. 1. 9.

slayers of their parents,& murtherers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children,lyers& periured men,& whatsoeuer else is against sound doctrine. For he saith,that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that else would stray abroad without measure.

Both sorts of men schooled by the terror of the lavv as vvel they that vvould othervvise thinke too highly of their ovvn righteousnes,as they vvhich too boldly vvoulde follovv the svvay of their ovvn lust. Gal.3.24.

11 But to both may that be applyed which hee saieth in another place, that the lawe was to the Iewes a schoolemaster to Christ, for there are two sortes of men,whome with her schooling she leadeth by the hand to Christ. The one sort, of whome we first spake, because they are too full of affiance of their owne strength or righteousnes, are not meete to receiue the grace of Christ, vnlesse they be first emptied: therefore the lawe bringeth them downe to humilitie by knowledge of themselues,that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sort neede a bridle to be holden backe, least they so giue loose the reines to the wantonnesse of their flesh,that they fall off altogether from all studie of righteousnesse. For where the spirite of God doeth not yet gouerne, there sometime lustes do so boile,that it is in great peril least they throwe downe the soule that is subiect to them into the forgetfulnesse & despising of God: and so would it come to passe if God did not with this remedie prouide for it. Therfore those whome he hath appointed to the inheritance of his kingdome,if he do not by and by regenerate them,he kepeth them by the works of the lawe vnder feare,vntil the time of his visitation, not that chaste and pure feare such as ought to be in children,but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie bee taught by introduction to true godlinesse. Of this we haue so many proues, that it needeth no example. For whosoeuer haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will confesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare & obedience of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirite,they began heartily to loue him.

The third office of the lavv respecting properly them that are regenerated by the spirit of grace.is first to instruct them vvhat the vvill of God is,& secondly to breede in them eger desire still more & more to go forvvard in obseruing it.

12 The third vse,which is also the principal vse, & more nearely looketh vnto the proper end of the law,concerneth the faithful, in whose hearts alreadie liueth & reigneth the spirit of God. For although they haue the lawe written & grauen in their hearts by the finger of God,that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirit that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two wayes profite in the lawe. For it is to them a very good meane,whereby they may daily better & more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto,and may be confirmed in the vnderstanding thereof. As if a seruant be alreadie bent with all the affection of his heart,to please his Lord: yet hath he neede diligently to search out & marke the fashions of his Lord, that he may frame & apply himselfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt himself from this neede. For no man hath hitherto attained to so great wisedome, but that he may by daily instruction of the law get new profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then because wee neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profite shall the seruaunt of God take by the lawe, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slipperie way of offending. For after this manner, must these holy ones driue forwarde themselues, which with howe great cheerefulneſſe ſo euer they trauaile to Godwarde according to the ſpirite, yet they are alwaye loden with the ſluggiſhneſſe of the fleſh, that they proceede not with ſuch full readineſſe as they ought. To this fleſh is the lawe giuen as a whippe, that like a ſlowe and dull Aſſe it may be pricked forward to worke. Yea to the ſpirituall man, becauſe he is not yet diſpatched of the burden of the fleſh, it ſhalbe a continuall pricke that ſuffereth him not to ſtande ſtill. Eueu to this vſe Dauid had reſpect, when he did ſet foorth the lawe with thoſe notable praiſes: The lawe of the Lorde is vndefiled, conuerting ſoules: the iuſtices of the Lorde are vpright, and chearing heartes: the commandement of the Lord is bright, that giueth light to the eyes, &c. Pſa.19.8.

Againe: A lanterne to my feete is thy worde, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearſeth in all that Pſalme. Neither are theſe things againſt the ſayings of Paul, wherein is ſhewed, not what vſe the lawe miniſtreth to the regenérate, but what it is able to giue to man of it ſelfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with howe great profite the Lorde doth inſtruct them by reading of his lawe, to whome hee inwardely inſpireth a readineſſe to obey. And he taketh holde not of the commandements only, but alſo the promiſe of grace annexed to the things which only maketh the bitterneſſe to waxe ſweete. For what were leſſe amiable than the lawe, if it ſhould onely with requiring & threatning trouble ſoules carefully with feare, and vexe them vith terror? But ſpecially Dauid ſheweth, that he in the lawe conceiued the Mediatour, without whome there is no delite or ſweeteneſſe. Pſa.119.105.

13 Which while ſome vnskilfull men can not diſcerne, they boldely ſhake away all Moſes, and bidde the two tables of the lawe farewel, becauſe they thinke it is not agreeable for Chriſtians to cleaue to that doctrine that conteineth the miniſtration of death. Let this prophane opinion depart farre out of our mindes. For Moſes taught excellently well, that the ſame Lawe which with ſinners can engender nothing but death, ought in the holy to haue a better and more excellent vſe. For thus, when he was readie to die, he openly ſaid to the people: Lay your hearts vpon all the words that I do teſtifie to you this day, that ye may committe them to your children, that yee may teach them to keepe, to doe, and to fulfil all the thinges that are written in the volume of this lawe, becauſe they are not vainely commaunded you, but that euery one ſhoulde liue in them. But if no man can denie that there appeareth in it an abſolute paterne of righteouſneſſe, then either wee muſt haue no rule at all to liue iuſtly and vprightly, or elſe it is not lawfull for vs to depart from it. For there are not many but one rule of life, which is perpetuall and cannot be bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous man continually buſied in the meditation of the lawe, let vs not referre that to one age onely, becauſe it is moſt meete for all ages to the ende of the worlde: and let vs not therefore bee frayed awaye, or flye from being inſtructed by it, becauſe it appointeth a much more exact holyneſſe than wee ſhall perfourme, while we ſhall carrie about the perſon of our body. For nowe it executeth not againſt vs the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be ſatisfied, but with his full taske perfourmed: but in this perfection whereunto it exhorteth vs, it ſheweth

The lavv becauſe it ingẽdreth death is not therefore to be shakẽ off, but muſt be followed as a rule vvhich ſerueth to direct all the actions of our life.

ſheweth vs a marke, towarde which in all our life to endeuour, is no leſſe profitable for vs, than agreable with our dutie. In which endeuour if wee faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the ſpace whereof being runne out, the Lord will graunt vs to attaine to that marke, toward which our endeuours do trauaile a farre off.

The abrogating of the lawe of God, to the faithfull is their deliuering from the curſe threatened in the lawe, not from the dutie of continuall endeauouring to fulfill that vvhich the lawe inioyneth.

14 Nowe therefore, whereas the lawe hath toward the faithful a power to exhort, not ſuch a power as may binde their conſciences with curſe, but ſuch as with often calling on, may ſhake off ſluggiſhneſſe and pinch imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expreſſe this deliuerance from the curſe thereof, do ſay, that the lawe is abrogate to the faithfull. (I ſpeake yet of the law moral) not that it doth no more command them that which is right, but onely that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it doe no more, by making afraide and confounding their conſciences, damne and deſtroy them. And truly ſuch an abrogation of the lawe, Paul doeth plainly teach, and alſo that the Lorde himſelfe ſpake of it, appeareth by this that he would not haue confuted that opinion that he ſhould diſſolue the lawe, vnleſſe it had beene commonly receiued among the Iewes. But foraſmuch as it could not riſe cauſeleſly and without any colour, it is likely that it grewe vpon falſe vnderſtanding of his doctrine, as in a manner all errours are wont to take occaſion of trueth, but leaſt we ſhould alſo ſtumble at the ſame ſtone, let vs diligently make diſtinction, what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lorde proteſteth that he came not to deſtroy the lawe, but to fulfill it: and that til heauen and earth paſſe away, no one iote of the lawe ſhould paſſe away, but that all ſhould be fulfilled: he ſufficiently confirmeth that by his comming nothing ſhould be taken away from the due keeping of the lawe. And for good cauſe: ſith he came rather for this end, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the lawe remaineth for all Chriſtians, inuiolable, which by teaching, admoniſhing, rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to euery good worke.

The bonds of the lawe frō vvhich vve are looſed are thoſe exactiōs, the rigor and extremitie vvhereof, if it vvere not mitigated, vvoulde cauſe deſpaire, & not thoſe inuuctions of obediēce, the authoritie vvhereof doth & muſt ſtande in force for euer.
Gala.3.10.
Gal.3.12.& 5.4.

15 As for thoſe things that Paul ſpeaketh of the curſe, it is euident that they belong not to the verie inſtruction, but onely to the force of binding the conſcience. For the law not onely teacheth, but alſo with authoritie requireth that which it commaundeth If it be not performed, yea if dutie be ſlacked in any part, it bendeth her thunderboult of curſe. For this cauſe the Apoſtle ſayth, that all they that are of the workes of the lawe, are ſubiect to the curſe, becauſe it is written: Curſed is euery one, that fulfilleth not all. And he ſaith, that they be vnder the works of the law, that doe not ſet righteouſneſſe in the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, by which we are looſed from the rigour of the lawe. He teacheth therefore that we muſt be looſed from the bondes of the lawe, vnleſſe wee will miſerably periſh vnder them. But from what bonds? the bondes of that rigorous and ſharp exacting, that releaſeth nothing of the extremitie of the law, & ſuffreth not any offence vnpuniſhed. From this curſe (I ſay) that Chriſt might redeem vs, he was made a curſe for vs. For it is written: Curſed is euery one that hangeth vpon the tree. In the chapter following in deede he ſaith, that Chriſt was made ſubiect to the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe: but all in one meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption wee might receiue the right of children. What is that? that we should not be oppressed with perpetual bondage, that should hold our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshaken, that there is nothing withdrawen of the authoritie of the lawe, but that it ought still to be receiued of vs with the same reuerence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which wee abrogate not in effect, but in vse onely. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an ende of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they should haue giuen but a vaine shewe to the olde people, vnlesse the power of the death and resurrection of Christ had bin shewed therin, so if they had not ceased, we could not at this day discerne to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paul, to proue that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes whereof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore howe in the abolishing of them, the trueth shineth better than if they did still a farre off, and as it were with a veile spred before, shew a figure of Christ that hath alreadie plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the Temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces & fell downe: because now the true & expresse image of the heauenly good things was come to light, which before had bin but vnperfectly begun with darke rude draughtes, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith. Hereunto serueth that saying of Christ, that the lawe and the Prophets were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forward, the kindome of God began to be ioifully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that containeth the hope of saluation, and of eternall life, but because a farre off, & vnder shadowes only they did behold that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behoued that the Church of God should climbe vp higher from those first instructions, Iohn the Baptist declareth, for that the law is giuen by Moses, but grace and trueth began by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truely promised in the olde sacrifices, and the Arke of the couenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauour of God, yet all this had bin but a shadowe, if it had not bin grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is sound, perfect, and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the ceremoniall vsages of the law haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the end of them it is the better knowen how great was the profit of them before Christs comming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

The exercise of the lawe ceremonial taken away yet the holinesse thereof confirmed by the performāce of that which was therein shadowed.

17 Somewhat more harde is the point that Paul noteth. And hee hath renued you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgiuing you al your offences, blotting out ỹ handwriting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse &c. For it seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the law somwhat further that nowe we haue nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expounde it of the lawe morall, whose vnappeasable rigor rather then doctrine thereof they thinke thinke to be taken away. Some more deepely waying the words of Paul, do espie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremoniall, and doe shewe that this word Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paul. For to the Ephesians he sayeth thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the lawe of commaundements consisting in the decrees, that hee might make two in himselfe into one new man. It is no doubt that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Iewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherefore I graunt that those first expositors are rightfully reproued by these: but yet mee thinkes that these do not sufficiently well set foorth the mind of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to haue these two places compared together in all points, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, whereby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the vsages of washings and sacrifices, wherewith the Iewes were made holye vnto the Lorde, doe seuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a hygher mysterie? In deede the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall obseruations whereunto the false Apostles did labour to driue the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galathians he fetcheth that controuersie further off, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing else but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to cal it a hand writing against vs? moreouer to set the whole summe in a maner of our redemption in this, ỳ it should be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it selfe trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered And I trust that I haue attained the naturall vnderstanding of it if at least this be granted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine wordes of the Apostle, that in the Iewish ceremonies was rather a confession than a cleansing of sinnes. For what did they else by sacrifices, but confesse themselues in their conscience guiltie of death, that did put cleansings in their place? What did they with their clensings, but testifie themselues to be vncleane? And so was the handwriting of their sinne & vncleannes oft renued by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying therof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was perfourmed the redemption of the offences that remained vnder the old Testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily call the ceremonies handwritings against those ỳ obserue them: forasmuch as by them they did openly seale to their own damnatiõ & vncleannes. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obteined in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doth seuer from Christ, because being at that time vsed, they did obscure the glorie of Christ. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselues, are well & fitly called handwritings against the saluatiõ of men, because they were as solemne instrumẽts ỳ testified their being bound. When the false Apostles went about to bind the Christian Church to them againe: Paul did not without cause admonish the Collossians, by fetching the signification of them further off, to what point they ſhould fall backe againe, if they ſuffered themſelues in ſuch ſorte to be yoked by them. For therewithall was the benefite of Chriſt wreſted away from them, in aſmuch as he hauing once performed the eternall clenſing, hath vtterly aboliſhed thoſe daily obſeruations which were onely of force to ſeale ſinnes, but coulde doe nothing to the putting away of them.

The viii. Chapter.

An expoſition of the Morall lawe.

HEre I thinke it ſhal not be from the purpoſe, to enterlace the tenne commaundementes of the lawe with a ſhort expoſition of them, becauſe thereby both that ſhall better appeare which I haue touched, that the ſame keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then alſo wee ſhall haue beſides that a proofe of the ſeconde point, that the Iewes did not onely learne by it what was the true force of godlineſſe, but alſo by the terrour of the iudgement, ſith they ſawe themſelues vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they woulde or no, to be drawen to the Mediator. Nowe in ſetting foorth the ſumme of thoſe things that are required in the true knowledge of God, wee haue alreadie taught, that wee cannot conceiue him according to his greatneſſe, but that by and by his maieſtie preſenteth it ſelfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worſhip of him. In the knowledge of our ſelues wee haue ſet this for the chiefe point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne ſtrength, and cleane ſtripped of the truſt of our owne righteouſneſſe, and on the other ſide diſcouraged & beaten downe with conſcience of our owne needineſſe, wee ſhould learne perfect humilitie and abaſement of our ſelues. The Lorde ſetteth foorth both theſe pointes in the lawe, where firſt chalenging to himſelfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reuerence of his diuine maieſtie, and appointeth out vnto vs wherein it ſtandeth and conſiſteth: and then publiſhing a rule of his righteouſneſſe, (againſt the righteouſneſſe whereof our nature as it is peruerſe & crooked, doeth alway ſtriue, and beneath the perfection whereof our power as of it ſelfe it is weake & feeble to doe good, lieth a great way below) he reproueth vs both of weaknes & vnrighteouſnes. Moreouer, that inward law which we haue before ſaid to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the hearts of al men, doth after a certaine maner enforme vs of the ſame things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conſcience doeth not ſuffer vs to ſleepe a perpetuall ſleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witneſſe and admoniſher of thoſe things that wee owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and ſo accuſeth vs when wee ſwarue from our duetie. But man being wrapped in ſuch darkeneſſe of errours as he is, ſkarſe euen ſlenderly taſteth by that lawe of nature, what worſhip pleaſeth God: but truely hee is verie farre diſtant from the right knowledge therof. Beſide that, he is ſo ſwollen with arrogancie & ambition, & ſo blinded with ſelfeloue, that he cannot yet looke vpon, and as it were, deſcend into himſelfe to learne to ſubmit and humble himſelfe, and confeſſe his owne miſerie. Therefore (as it was neceſſarie both for

The worſhip due to God, & the vnrighteouſneſſe which is in vs, becauſe the inward lawe naturally written in our hearts cannot ſufficiently teach, therefore God himſelfe hath giuen a lawe which doth our dulneſſe and ſtubborneſſe) the Lorde hath ſet vs a lawe written, which ſhould both more certainly teſtifie that which in the lawe naturall was too obſcure, and alſo ſhould ſhake away our drouſineſſe, and more liuely touch our minde and remembrance.

By the lavv vve vnderſtand that vve ovv Godobedience & that he loueth righteouſnes vvhich vve muſt ſeeke after, not excuſing our ſelues by our inhabilitie vvhich is no excuſe.

2 Nowe it is eaſie to vnderſtande what is to be learned of the law, that is, that as God is our creator, ſo of right he hath the place of our father and Lorde, and that by this reaſon wee owe to him glorie, reuerence, loue and feare. Yea, and alſo that we are not at our owne libertie, to followe whither ſoeuer that luſt of our minde doth moue vs, but that wee ought to hang vpon his becke, and to reſt onely vpon that which pleaſeth him. Then wee learne, that he delighteth in righteouſneſſe, that hee abhorreth wickedneſſe, and therefore that vnleſſe wee will with wicked vnthankefulneſſe fall away from our creator, wee muſt neceſſarily obſerue righteouſneſſe all our life long. For if then onely wee yeld vnto him the reuerence that wee owe, when wee preferre his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worſhip of him, but the obſeruation of righteouſneſſe, holyneſſe and cleanneſſe. Neither may wee pretende this excuſe that wee want power, and like waſted detters be not able to pay. For it is not conuenient that wee ſhoulde meaſure the glorie of God by our owne power: for whatſoeuer wee bee, he alway abideth like to himſelfe, a louer of righteouſneſſe, a hater of wickedneſſe. Whatſoeuer he requireth of vs (becauſe hee can require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature wee muſt of neceſſitie obey: but that wee are not able, is our owne fault. For if wee bee holden bounde of our owne luſt wherein ſinne reigneth, ſo that we are not loſe at libertie to obey our father, there is no cauſe why wee ſhould alledge neceſſitie for our defence, the euill whereof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our ſelues.

The lavv bringeth men by ſhipvvracke to the hauen.

3 When wee haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the law, then muſt wee by the teaching of the ſame lawe alſo deſcende vnto our ſelues: whereby at length we may carrie away two things. The firſt is, by comparing the righteouſneſſe of the law with our life, to learne, that we are farre off from being able to ſatisfie the will of God, and that therefore wee are not worthie to haue place among his creatures, much leſſe to be reckened among his children. The ſeconde is, in conſidering our ſtrength, to learne that it is not onely inſufficient to fulfill the lawe, but alſo vtterly none at al. Hereupon followeth both a diſtruſt of our owne ſtrength, and a care and fearefulneſſe of minde. For conſcience cannot beare the burthen of iniquitie, but that by and by the iudgement of God is preſent before it: and the iudgement of God cannot be felt, but that it ſtriketh into vs a dreadful horrour of death. And likewiſe being conſtrained with prooues of her owne weakeneſſe, it cannot chooſe but by and by fall into diſpaire of her owne ſtrength. Both theſe affections doe ingender humilitie and abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to paſſe, that man made afraide with feeling of eternal death, which hee ſeeth to hang ouer him by the deſeruing of his owne righteouſneſſe, turneth himſelfe to the onely mercie of God, as to the onely hauen of ſaluation: that feeling that it is not in his power to pay that hee oweth vnto the lawe, deſpeiring in himſelfe, hee may take take breath againe and beginne to craue and looke for helpe from elſe where.

The vſe of the promiſes and threatnings of the lawe.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reuerence of his righteouſneſſe hath alſo added promiſes and threatenings to fil our hearts with loue of him, and with hatred of wickedneſſe. For, becauſe our minde is too blinde, to be moued with the only beautie of goodneſſe, it pleaſed the moſt mercifull Father of his tender kindneſſe, to allure vs with ſweeteneſſe of rewardes to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewards laid vp for vertue, & that he ſhall not ſpend his labour in vaine, whoſoeuer he be, that ſhall obey his commaundements. He proclaimeth on the other ſide, that he not onely abhorreth vnrighteouſneſſe, but alſo that it ſhall not eſcape vnpuniſhed, for that hee wil be a reuenger of the contempt of his maieſtie. And to exhort vs by all meanes, hee promiſeth as well the bleſſings of this preſent life as alſo eternall bleſſedneſſe, to their obedience that keepe his commandements: & to the transgreſſors thereof, he threatneth both preſent miſeries and the puniſhment of eternall death. For the ſame promiſe, (hee that doth theſe things ſhal liue in them:) and alſo the threatening that anſwereth it, (the ſoule that ſinneth, that ſame ſhal die) do without doubt belong to the immortalitie or death that is to come, & ſhall neuer be ended. Albeit, whereſoeuer is mentioned the good wil or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternitie of life, vnder the other eternal deſtruction. Of preſent bleſſings & curſes there is a longer regiſter rehearſed in the law. And in the penal ordinances appeareth the ſoueraigne cleanneſſe of God, that can ſuffer no iniquitie: but in his promiſes, beſides his great loue of righteouſnes, (which hee cannot finde in his heart to defraud of her rewarde) there is alſo proued by his maruelous bountifulnes. For wheras we & al ours are indetted vnto his Maieſtie, by good right what ſoeuer he requireth of vs, he demandeth it as due det, but ỹ paiment of det is not worthie of reward Therefore he departeth with his own right, when he offreth reward to our obediences, which we do not yeld of our ſelues as things that were not due: but what thoſe promiſes do bring vnto vs, is partly ſaide alreadie, & partly ſhall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It ſufficeth for this preſent, if we remember & conſider, that there is in the promiſes of the law, no ſmall commendation of righteouſneſſe, that it may the more certainly appeare how much the keeping thereof pleaſeth God: that ỹ penal ordinances are ſet for the more deteſtation of vnrighteouſnes, leaſt the ſinner delited with the ſweete flatterings of vices, ſhould forget that the iudgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

Leu. 18. 5. Eze. 18. 4. & 20.

Leu. 26. 4. Deu. 28. 1.

God by making his vvill and preſcription the only rule of our obedience, excludeth all our owne by-inuentions of pleaſing him as vnpleaſant & vnacceptable.

5 Nowe whereas the Lorde giuing a rule of perfect righteouſneſſe, hath applied all the partes therof to his own wil, therin is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obediẽce, which is ſo much more diligently to be marked, as the wantonnes of mans minde is more readie to deuiſe now and then diuerſe ſortes of worſhipping to winne his fauour withall For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religiõ, becauſe it is naturally planted in the witte of man, hath ſhewed and yet doeth ſhewe forth it ſelfe, that men do alway delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteouſneſſe beſide the word of God, wherby it commeth to paſſe that the commandements of the law haue but ſmall place among the works that are commonly called good workes, while that innumerable route of mens workes occupieth almoſt al the roome. But what other thing meant Moſes than to reſtraine ſuch licentiouſneſſe, when after the publiſhing of the lawe he ſpake thus to ỹ people: Deut.12.28. Giue heede, & heare all the things that I commaunde thee, that it may bee wel to thee and to thy children after thee for euer, when thou ſhalt doe that which is good and pleaſant before thy God. What I commaund thee, that onely do: adde not vnto it, nor diminiſh it. And before, when he had proteſted, that this was his wiſedome and vnderſtanding before other nations, that he had receiued iudgements, righteouſnes & ceremonies of the Lord, Deut.4.9. he ſaid further, Keepe therefore thy ſelfe and thy ſoule carefully, that thou forget not the words which thine eyes haue ſeene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, becauſe God did foreſee, that the Iſraelites would not reſt, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beſide it trauaile in bringing forth new righteouſneſſe, if they were not ſeuerely holden backe: therefore he pronounceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteouſneſſe, which ſhould haue bin the ſtrongeſt ſtay to hold them back, & yet they did not ceaſſe from that boldneſſe ſo much forbidden them. But what of vs? wee are ſurely comprehended within the ſame charge: for it is no doubt that that continueth ſtil whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his law the abſolute doctrine of righteouſneſſe, yet we not contented therwith, do monſtrouſly trauaile with forging & coyning of newe good workes one vpon another. For the healing of this fault, the beſt remedie ſhalbe, if this thought ſhalbe ſtedfaſtly ſetrled in vs, that the law is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteouſneſſe: that therein is taught no righteouſneſſe, but the ſame that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of workes are vainly attempted to winne the fauour of God, whoſe true worſhip ſtandeth in onely obedience: but rather that ſuch ſtudy of good workes as wandreth out of the law of God, is an intollerable defiling of Gods righteouſnes & of the true righteouſnes. Auguſtine alſo ſaith moſt truely, which calleth the obedience that is don to God, ſometime the mother and keeper, ſometime the originall of all vertues.

The firſt rule for right vnderſtanding of the lawe is that it requireth not onely outwarde but inward holineſſe: which is plaine to him that noteth the difference betwene God and mortall lawmakers.

6 But when we haue expounded the lawe of the Lorde, then more fitly and with more profite ſhall that be confirmed which I haue before ſpoken of the office and vſe of the law. But before that i beginne to diſcuſſe euery ſeuerall commaundement by it ſelfe, it ſhalbe good now to giue ſuch leſſons as ſerue to the vniuerſall knowledge thereof. Firſt let vs holde for determined, that the life of man is inſtructed in ỹ law not onely to outward honeſty, but alſo to inward & ſpiritual righteouſnes, Which thing wheras no man can denie, yet there be few that rightly marke it. That commeth to paſſe, becauſe they looke not vpon the lawmaker, by whoſe nature the nature of the law alſo ought to be weied. If any king do by proclamation forbid to cõmit fornication, to kill, or to ſteale: in this caſe I grant that if a man doe only conceiue in his minde a luſt to commit fornication, to ſinne, or to ſteale, & do not commit any of theſe things in deede, hee is out of the compaſſe of this prohibitiõ. And the reaſon is, for that becauſe the foreſight of a mortall lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuilitie: his cõmandements are not broken,but when the outward offences are committed.But God(whose eye nothing escapeth,& which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleannes of the heart)vnder the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter & theft,forbiddeth lust,wrath,hatred, coueting of another mans, guile, & whatsoeuer is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spirituall lawmaker,he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule,are wrath & hatred: the theefe of the soule, is euil desire & couetousnesse: the fornication of the soule,is lust, But mans lawes also(wil some man say)haue regard to intents & willes, & not to successes of fortune. I grant, but yet they are such intents & willes,as haue outwardly broken out. They weye with what intent euery outward act hath been done, but they search not the secrete thoughts. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his hands from offending. On the other side,because the heauenly law is made for our mindes,therefore the restraint of mindes is principally needefull to the keeping therof. But the common sort of men, euen when they mightily dissemble there contempt of the lawe, doe frame their eyes, their feete, their hands, and all the partes of their bodies to some obseruation of the lawe, in the meane time they holde their heart most farre off from all obedience, and thinke themselues well discharged,if they keepe close from men that which they do in the sight of God. They heare it saide: thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adulterie: Thou shalt not steale: they drawe not out their sworde to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlotes: they lay not their hands vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole heartes they breath out murders, they boyle in lust, they cast their eyes aside at all mens goods, and deuour them with coueting. Nowe wanteth that which was the cheefe point of the lawe. Whence,I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leauing the lawmaker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their own wit? Against these doeth Paul mightily crie out, affirming that the lawe is spirituall, whereby hee meaneth, that it not onely demaundeth an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angelike pureneſſe, which hauing all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may sauour nothing but of the spirite. Rom.7.14.

This Christ sheweth by expounding the lawe,not by teaching a newe & another lawe perfecter & better as some perniciously imagin.

7 When we say that this is the meaning of the law, wee thrust not in a newe exposition of our owne,but we follow Christ the best expositor of the law.For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinió,that he performeth the lawe that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the lawe,he reproueth this most perilous errour, and pronounced that vnchast looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslayers that hate their brother,for he maketh them guiltie of iudgemẽt that haue but conceiued wrath in their mind,and them guiltie of the counsell that in murmuring or grudging haue vttered any token of a displeased minde: and them guiltie of Hell fire, that with tauntes and railing breake foorth into open anger. They that haue not espied these things, haue fayned Christ to be an other Moses, the giuer of the lawe of the Gospell which supplied the imperfection of the lawe of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of perfection of the lawe of the Gospell, which farre Mat.5.21.

passeth the olde lawe, which is a most pernitious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the commaundementes, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonour the law of God. Truely it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrisie, and it leadeth vs away from that onely and perfect rule of righteousnesse. But it is verie easie to confute that errour: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the law, whereas he did but restore the law to her integritie, while he made it free, and clensed it being obscured with lies, & defiled with leauen of the Pharises.

The second rule to vnderstand the lavv by, is that in euery commaundement, more is ment then the naked vvords do literally import, & hovv much more the scope of eche commandement compared vvith the matter thereof together vvith the contrarie vvill shevv.

8 Let this bee our seconde note, that there is alway more conteined in the commaundementes and prohibitions, than is by wordes expressed, which yet is so to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentiously wresting the Scriptures, wee may make of euery thing what wee list. For many bring to passe by this vnmeasured libertie of running at large, that with some the authoritie of Scripture groweth in contempt, and othersome despeire of vnderstanding it. Therefore if it bee possible, wee must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, wee must I say search howe farre our exposition may exceede the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeare that it is not an addition of mens gloses knit to the worde of God, but rather that the pure and natural meaning of the lawegiuer is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commaundementes it is so manifest, that there are figuratiue speaches, meaning more in expressing part that hee may worthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the lawe to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober exposition doeth passe beyonde the wordes: but howe farre, that remaineth harde to iudge, vnlesse there bee some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to be the best measure, that if it be directed to the intent of the commandement, that is, that in euery commaundement be weyed, why it was giuen vs. As for example: Euery commaundement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding the trueth of both sortes shall foorthwith bee founde, if wee consider the intent or the ende thereof. As the end of the fifth commandement is, that honour is to be giuen to them to whome God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commaundement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that wee honour them to whome hee hath ginen any excellencie, & that hee abhorreth contempt and stubbornesse against them. The intent of the first commaundement is, that God alone be honoured. The summe therefore of the commaundement shall bee, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worshippe of his maiestie pleaseth God, and that hee abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euerie commaundement wee must looke vppon what matter it treateth: then must we search out the ende, till wee finde what the lawmaker doeth testifie therein properly to please or displease him: and last of all must wee drawe an argument from the same to the contrarie, after this manner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrarie displeaseth him: if this displease him, then the contrarie pleaseth him: if he commaund this, then he forbiddeth the contrarie, if hee forbid this, then he commandeth the contrarie.

9 That which is now some what darkely touched, shall in expounding of the commandements become very plaine by practice, wherfore it sufficeth to haue touched it, sauing that this last point, is to be shortly cõfirmed with some proofe thereof, becausse otherwise either it shoulde not be vnderstanded, or being vnderstand, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurditie. This needeth no proofe, that when a good thing is commaunded, the euil is forbidden that is contrarie to it: for there is no man but he will graunt it mee. And common iudgement will not much sticke to admit, that when euil things are forbidden, the contrarie dueties are commaunded. It is an vniuersal opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrarie vices are condemned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speach do signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most part take the vertue contrarie to any vice, to be the abstaining from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrarie dueties and doings. Therefore in this commandement, Thou shalt not kill, the cõmon sense of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine from all hurt doing, or lust to do hurt. I say that there is further contained, that we should by all the helpes that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I prooue it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or misused, becausse he willeth that our neighbours life be deare and precious vnto vs: he doth therefore require withall those duties of loue that may be done by vs for the preseruation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commaundement doth alway disclose vnto vs all that we are therein commaunded or forbidden to do.

That the forbidding of euil in the lawe, implyeth a commaunding of the contrarie duties which are good.

The cause why God hath forbidden the verie secret motion vnto sinne by the name of the grosse and actuall deede, is that the foulnes of such termes might make vs the better to vnderstand the outlines of those faults, which being expresst by more proper and soft names, we would make lesse accounte of.

10 But why God, in such as it were halfe commaundements, hath by figures rather secretely signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reasons rendred thereof, this one reason pleaseth me aboue the rest. Becausse the flesh alway endeuoureth to extenuate the filthines of sin, & to colour it with faire pretenses, sauing where it is euen palpable for grossenes, he hath set foorth for an example in euerie kinde of offence that which was most wicked & abhominable, at the hearing wherof our verie senses might be moued with horror, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more haynous detesting of euerie sort of sinne. This many times deceiueth vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secrete, wee make them seeme small. These deceits the Lord doth disclose, when hee accustometh vs to referre al the whole multitude of vices to these principal heads, which do best of all shew, how much euery kind is abhominable. As for example, wrath & hatred are not thought so haynous euils, when they are called by their own names, but when they are forbidden vs vnder the name of manslaughter, we better vnderstand how abhominable they are before god, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horrible an offence: and wee moued by his iudgement, do accustome our selues better to weigh the haynousnes of those faultes that before seemed but light vnto vs.

The reason of diuiding the lawe into two parts or tables, whereof the former contayneth the duties which we owe properly vnto god, & for that his worship is the fountaine, head and foundation without which there can no good or acceptable duties passe from man to man.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will iudge that there is sometime mention made not vnfitly from the purpose, nor without cause. And wee haue a cause readie, that doth not suffer vs to remaine in doubt of this this matter. For God so deuided his law into two partes, in which is contained the whole righteousnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the dueties of religion that do peculiarlie pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the dueties of Charitie which belong vnto men. The first foundatiō of righteousnes is the worship of God: which being once ouerthrowē, all the other members of righteousnesse are torne in sunder and dissolued, like to the partes of an house vniointed and fallen downe. For what maner of righteousnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not men with robbery & extortions, if in the meane time by wicked sacriledge thou spoylest Gods maiestie of his glory? that thou defilest not thy bodie with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou trauaile to destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteousnesse is vainely boasted of without religion, and maketh no better showe, than if a mangled body with the head cut off, should be brought foorth for a beautifull sight. And religion is not onely the principall part of righteousnesse, but also the verie soule wherewith it breatheth, and is quickened. For men keepe not equitie & loue among themselues without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning & foundation of righteousnesse, because when it is taken away, all the equitie, continence and temperance that men vse among thēselues, is vaine and trifling before God. We say also that it is the springhead and liuely breath of righteousnesse, because hereby men doe learne to liue among themselues temperately and without hurt doing one to another, if they reuerence God as the iudge of right and wrong. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth vs to godlinesse & the proper dueties of religion, wherewith his maiestie is to be worshipped: in the other he prescribeth howe for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lorde (as the Euangelists rehearse it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall pointes, the one that wee should loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strength: the other, that wee loue our neighbour as our selues. Thus thou seest howe of the two partes wherein he concludeth the whole lawe, he directeth the one towarde God, and appointeth the other toward men.

Mat.22.37. Luk.10.27.

That in the former table besides a generall preface to the lawe foure commandements are contained, in the later table sixe.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principal points, yet, to the ende to take awaie all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God, to declare in the ten commandementes more largely & plainly al thinges that belong both to the honor, feare & loue of himselfe, and also to that charitie which he commaundeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy studie is not il spent to knowe the diuision of the commaundements, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherin euery man ought to haue his iudgement free, for which we ought not contentiouslie to striue with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needes touch this point, least the readers should either scorne or marueil at the diuision that we shall vse, as new and lately deuised. That the law is deuided in ten words, because it is oft approued by the auctoritie of God himselfe, it is out of controuersie, wherefore there is no doubt of the number, but of the maner of diuiding. They that so diuide them, that they giue three commandements to the first table, & put other 7. into the seconde, doe wipe out of the number the commandement concerning images, or at least they hide it vnder the first: whereas without dout it is seuerally set by the Lord for a commandement, & the tenth commandement of not coueting the things of his neighbour, they doe fondly teare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to vnderstande, that such manner of diuiding was vnknowen in the purer age. Other do recken, as we doe, foure seuerall commaundementes in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commandement. As for me, because vnlesse I be conuinced by euident reason, I take the ten words in Moses for ten commandements, me thinks I see so many diuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I wil follow that which I best allowe, that is, that the same which these later sort make the first cõmandement, shalbe in steede of a preface to the whole lawe, and then shall followe the commaundements, foure of the first table, and sixe of the second, in such order as they shalbe rehearsed. Augustine also to Boniface agreeth with vs, which in rehearsing them keepeth this order: that God only be serued with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of the Lorde be not taken in vaine, when hee had before seuerally spoken of the shadowish commandement of the Sabbat. In another place in deede that first diuision pleaseth him, but for too slender a cause, that is, because in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commandementes, the mysterie of the Trinitie more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place hee sticketh not to confesse that otherwise hee rather liketh our diuision. Besides these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vppon Mathew is of our side. Iosephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table fiue commaundements. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion and charitie, and also is confuted by the authoritie of the Lorde himselfe, which in Mathew reckeneth the commaundement of honouring our parentes, in the number of the seconde table. Nowe let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

Lib. 2. quæst. vet. Testa.

Mat. 19. 19

The first Commaundement.

I am the Lord thy God, which hath brought thee out of the land of Ægypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt haue no strange Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a parte of the first commendement, or reade it seuerally, it is indifferent vnto mee, so that you do not denie mee that it standeth in steede of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heede to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the maiestie of the law that he shall make, may neuer at any time come in contempt. For stablishing whereof he vseth three maner of arguments. First he chalengeth to himself power & right of dominion, whereby he may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessitie obey him: then he setteth foorth a promise of grace with sweetnes therof to allure thẽ to study of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefit that he did for them, to reproue the Iewes of vn-thankfulnes, if they do not with obedience answere his kindnes. Vnder the name of Iehouah, the Lord, is meant his authoritie & lawful dominion. And if all things be of him & doe abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paul saith Therefore we are with this word alone sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of Gods maiestie, because it were monstrous for vs to seeke to withdrawe our selues from vnder his gouernement, out of whom we cannot be.

The second, a manifestation of his loue towardes them vnto whom he gaue the lavv, signifying in gratious vvordes that he had betaken himselfe to bee vvholy theirs.
Ier.31.33.
Mat.22.32.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to command, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to draw by only necessitie, he also allureth with sweetenesse in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speech a mutual relation, which is contained in the promise: I wil be to them a God, and they shalbe to me a people. Whereupon Christ proueth that Abraham, Isaac & Iacob haue immortal life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I haue chosen you to be my people, not only to do you good in this present life, but also to giue you the blessednesse of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in diuerse places in the lawe For when the Lorde doeth vouchsafe to deale thus mercifully with vs, to cal vs into the company of his people, he choseth vs (saith Moses) that we should be a peculiar people vnto himself, a holy people, and should keepe his commaundements. From whence also commeth this exhortatiõ: Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is deriued that protestation that is in the Prophet: The sonne honoureth the father, and the seruant honoureth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

The third, a rehearsall of such a benefite as could not but be vnto them that receiued it, an euerlasting bond of dutiful obedience.

15 Now followeth the rehearsal of his benefite, which ought to be of so much more force to moue vs, as the fault of vnthankfulnes is more detestable euen among men. He then did put Israel in remembrance of a benefite lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse thereof being worthie to be had in remembrance for euer, should remaine in force with their posteritie. Moreouer it is most agreeable for this present matter. For the Lord seemeth to say that they were deliuered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, ỹ they should with obedience & readines of seruice honour him, the author of their deliuerãce. He vseth also, (to the end to hold vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himself with certain titles, wherby he maketh his sacred maiestie to be differently knowen frõ al idols & forged gods. For, as I said before, such is our ready inclination to vanitie, ioyned with rash boldnes, ỹ so soone as God is named, our mind cannot take heede to it selfe, but that it by and by falleth away to some vaine inuention. Therfore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedie for this mischiefe, he setteth out his own godhead with certaine titles & so doth compasse vs in, as it were within certaine grates, least we should wander hither & thither & rashly forge our selues some new God, if forsaking the liuing God, we should erect an idol. For this cause, so oft as the Prophets meane properly to point out him, they cloth him, & as it were enclose him, within those marks, wherby he had opened himself to the people of Israel. And yet when he is called the God of Abraham, or the God of Israel, when hee is set in the temple of Hierusalem among the Cherubins, these & like formes of speach do not bind him to one place or to one people, but are set onely for this purpose, to stay the thoughts of the godly in that God, which by his couenant, that he hath made with Israel, hath so represented himselfe, ẏ it is no way lawfull to varie from such a paterne. But let this remaine stedfastly imprinted, that there is mention made of the deliuerance to this end, that the Iewes might ẏ more cherefully giue themselues to the God that doth by right claime them vnto him. And we (least we should think that the same nothing belongeth to vs,) ought to consider, that the bondage of Ægypt is a figure of the spiritual captiuitie, wherein we are all holden bounde, vntill our heauenly deliuerer doe make vs free by the power of his arme, and conuey vs into the kingdome of libertie. As therefore when in the olde time he minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intollerable dominion of Pharao, wherewith they were oppressed: so all those to whome at this day hee professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliuer from the deadly power of the diuel, which was in a shadow signified by that corporall bondage. Wherefore there is no man, but his mind ought to be enflamed to harken to the law which hee heareth to haue proceded from the soueraigne king. From whome as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they haue also their end appointed and directed to him. There is no man (I say) but he ought to be rauished to embrace the lawmaker, to the keeping of whose commaundements, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: from whose bountie he loketh both for flowing store of all good things, and also the glorie of immortall life: by whose maruellous power & mercie, hee knoweth himselfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

Habac. 2. 2ª. Psa. 80. 2. 99. 1 Esay. 37. 16.

16 After that he hath grounded & stablished the authoritie of his lawe, he setteth forth the first commandement, That we haue no strange Gods before him. The ende of this commandement is, that God will onely haue preeminence, and wholly enioy his owne authoritie among his people. And that it may so be, he commandeth that there be farre from vs all vngodlinesse & superstition, whereby the glorie of his godhead is either diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commaundeth, that we worship & honor him with true endeuour of godlines. And the verie simplicitie of the words themselues do in a manner expresse the same. For we cannot haue God, but we must also comprehende therein all things that properly belong to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth thereby, that we should not giue away elsewhere that which is proper to him. For although the things that we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly they may be brought vnto four principal points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioyned spiritual obedience of conscience: Affiance, Inuocation, & Thanksgiuing. Adoration I call the reuerence & worship which euery one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when hee submitteth himselfe vnto his greatnes: wherefore I doe not without cause make this a part thereof, that we yeld our consciences in subiectiō to his law. Affiance is an assurednes of resting in him by reknowledging of his powers, when reposing all wisedom, righteousnes, power, trueth and goodnes in him, we thinke

The first commandement wher in to establish his sole preeminence ouer his people, he requireth that which is due to be giuen him, & him alone, as adoration, affiance, inuocation, and thanksgiuing: which if we do not yeeld vnto him or do vnto others with him, either in whole or in part, he hath a reuenging eye to behold it, be it neuer so small or secret.

our selues blessed with only partaking of him. Inuocation, is a resorting of our minde to his faith and helpe as to our onely succour, so oft as any necessitie presseth vs. Thankesgiuing is a certaine thankfulnesse whereby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God suffereth nothing to be conueyed away else where, so he commaunded all to be wholy giuen to himselfe. Neither shal it be enough to abstaine from hauing any strange God, vnlesse thou restraine thy selfe in this, that many wicked contemners are wont, which thinke the readiest waye, to scorne all religions: but true religion must goe before, whereby our mindes may be directed to the liuing God, with knowledge whereof they being endued may aspire to reuerence, feare and worship his maiestie, to embrace the communicating of all his good things, euery where to seeke for his helpe, to reknowledge and aduance with confession of praise the magnificence of his workes, as to the onely marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swaruing from the true God, are drawen hither and thither as it were vnto diuerse gods. Wherefore, if wee bee contented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before said, that all forged gods are to be driuen farre away, & that the worship is not to be torne in sunder, which hee alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glorie, be it neuer so litle, but that all things that belong to him may wholy remaine with him. The parcel of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hainousnes: for that God is prouoked to iealousie, so oft as wee thrust our own inuentions in his place, as if an vnchast woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes should the more vexe his mind. Therfore when God testified that with his present power and grace hee looked vpon the people that he had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, hee giueth them warning that there can bee no new gods brought in, but that he is witnes & beholder of their sacrilege For this boldnesse is encreased with much wickednes, that man thinketh that in his flyings away he can beguile the eyes of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer we purpose, whatsoeuer wee go about, whatsoeuer we practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our conscience bee cleane euen from the most secrete thoughtes of swaruing from him, if wee will haue our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glorie of his godhead whole and vncorrupted not onely in outward confessiō, but also in his eyes, which do behold the most secret corners of hearts.

The ende of the second commandement being to keep the worship of God pure from prophanation, he forbiddeth first to make any image for representation of God, & secondly to worship any image made.

The second Commaundement.

Thou shalt not make to thee any grauen image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heauen aboue or in earth beneath, or in the waters vnder the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serue them.

17 As in the first commandement he pronounced that he is the one God beside whome there are no other gods to be deuised or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kind of worship he is to be honoured: that wee may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The ende therefore of this commaundement is, that hee will not haue haue the lawfull worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our fooliſh minde is wont to inuent, when it conceiueth God according to her owne groſſeneſſe. And therefore hee frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the ſpirituall worship, and which is appointed by him. Hee ſpeaketh of the groſſeſt fault that is in this offence, namely outward idolatry. And there be two partes of this commandement. The firſt reſtraineth our libertie, that we do not preſume to make ſubiect to our ſenſes or by any forme to repreſent God, which is incomprehenſible. The ſecond part forbiddeth vs to honour any images for religions ſake. Moreouer he ſhortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expreſſed in ſhape, by the prophane & ſuperſtitious nations. By thoſe things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, & peraduenture alſo birds, as expreſſing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomie he meaneth as well birds as ſtarres. Which note I would not haue ſpoken of but that I ſawe ſome vnskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other partes, becauſe they are ſufficiently knowen of themſelues. And we haue alreadie in the firſt booke taught plainly enough, that whatſoeuer viſible formes of God man doth inuent, they are directly contrarie to his nature, and that therefore ſo ſoone as images come foorth, true religion is corrupted and defiled. Deu. 4. 15.

18 The penall ordinance ẏ followeth ought not a litle to auaile to ſhake off our ſlouthfulneſſe. For he threateneth: That he is the Lorde our God, a ſtrong & ielous God, that viſiteth the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and ſheweth mercie vnto thouſandes to them that loue him and keepe his commandements. This is as much in effect, as if he ſhould haue ſaid, that it is he only vpon whom we ought to ſtick. And to bring vs thereunto, he ſpeaketh of his power, that doth not without puniſhment ſuffer it ſelfe to be contemned or diminiſhed. Here is in deede ſet the name El, which ſignifieth God. But becauſe it is deriued of ſtrength, to expreſſe the ſenſe the better, I did not ſtick ſo to tranſlate it, or to put it into the text. Then he calleth himſelf ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly, he affirmeth that he wil be a reuenger of his maieſtie & glorie if any do transferre it to creatures or to grauen images, & that not with a ſhort or ſlender reuenge, but ſuch as ſhall extend to the children & childrens children, & childrens childrens children, that is ſuch as ſhalbe followers of their fathers vngodlineſſe: as alſo he ſheweth a perpetuall mercie & bountifulneſſe vnto long continuance of poſteritie, to thoſe that loue him & keepe his lawe. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the perſon of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himſelfe vnto vs, when he receiueth vs into the boſome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that muſt ſtande by mutuall faithfulneſſe. As he doth all the duties of a faithfull & true husband, ſo againe he requireth of vs ſuch loue and chaſtitie as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yelde not our ſoules to Satan, to luſt, & to filthie deſires of the fleſh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apoſtaſie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throwe away chaſtitie, and were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaſt that he himſelfe is, the more is he kindled to anger if he ſee his wiues minde encline to a ſtrange louer: ſo the Lorde that hath wedded vs vnto himſelfe in trueth, teſtifieth that he hath a moſt feruently burning ielouſie, ſo oft as neglecting the pureneſſe of his holy mariage, wee are defiled with wicked luſtes, but ſpecially then when we transferre to any other, or do infect with any ſuperſtition the worſhip of his name, which ought to bee moſt vncorrupted: Foraſmuch as by this meane we do not only breake the faith giuen in wedlocke, but alſo ſo defile the verie wedding bed with bringing into it adulterers.

That by the punishment vvhich God doth threatē to the children of the disobedient for their fathers fault, that ſpiritual curſe is meant vvherby as the father being deſtitut of the ſpirit liueth vvickedly, ſo the ſonne likevviſe forſaken of God, followeth the ſame vvay to deſtruction.

19 In the threatening is to be ſeene what he meaneth by this, when he ſaith, that he will viſite the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third & fourth generation. For, beſide that it ſtandeth not with ỹ equitie of Gods iuſtice, to puniſh the innocent for an others offence, God himſelfe alſo ſaith, that he will not make the ſonne to beare the wickednesſe of the father. But this ſentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the puniſhment of the ſinnes of the anceſtors vpō the generation to come. For ſo doth Moſes oftentimes ſpeake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that rendreſt the iniquitie of the fathers to the children, vnto the third and fourth generation. Likewiſe Hieremie: Thou that ſheweſt mercie in thouſandes, that rendereſt the iniquite of the fathers into the boſome of the children after them. Manie, while they trauaile much in loſing this knot, thinke that it is to be vnderſtanded only of temporal puniſhments, which if the children ſuffer for the parents faults, it is no abſurditie, foraſmuch as they are oftentimes laid vpon them for their ſaluation, which is in deede true. For Eſay declared to Ezechias, that his ſonnes ſhould be ſpoiled of the kingdome, & carried into exile for the ſinne that he had committed The houſes of Pharao & Abimelech were plagued for offending Abraham. But when that is alleged for aſſoiling of this queſtion, it is rather a ſhift than a true expoſition. For here & in like places he threatneth a more greeuous reuenge than that it may be limitted within the boundes of this preſent life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that the iuſt curſe of the Lord, lieth not only vpon the head of ỹ wicked man himſelf, but alſo vpon his whole familie: when the curſe once lieth vpon them, what is elſe to be looked for, but that the father being deſtitute of the ſpirit of God, liue moſt wickedly, & the ſonne likewiſe forſaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, do follow the ſame way of deſtruction: and finally the childes childe, and the child of the childes child, the curſed ſeede of deteſtable men do fall headlong after them?

Exe.18.20. Num.14.8. Ier.32.18. Eſay.39.7. Gen.12.17.& 20.3

That for God ſo to plague men in their poſteritie, it is neither vniuſt nor repugnant vnto that vvhich the Prophet hath vvhere he teacheth hovv childrens teeth are not ſet on edge by the ſovver grapes vvhich their fathers haue eaten.

20 Firſt let vs ſee, whether ſuch reuenge be vnſeemely for the iuſtice of God. If all the nature of man be damnable, we know that deſtruction is prepared for them, to whome the Lorde vouchſafeth not to communicate his grace Neuertheleſſe they do periſh by their own vnrighteouſnes, & not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cauſe to quarell, Why they be not holpen by the grace of God to ſaluation as other are. Whereas therefore this puniſhment is laide vpon wicked men & euill doers for their offences, that their houſes are depriued of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuſe God for this moſt iuſt reuenge? But the Lord

on the other side pronounceth, that the punishment of the fathers sin shall not passe ouer vnto the sonne. Note what is there intreated of. Whē the Israelites had bin long & cōtinually vexed with manie calamities, they began to vse for a Prouerb, that their fathers had eaten a sower grape, wherewith the childrens teeth were set on edge: wherby they meant that their fathers had committed sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, & not deseruing it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappeasable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate seueritie. The Propher pronounceth vnto them that it is not so: becausse they are punished for their own offences, and that it standeth not with the iustice of god, that the righteous sonne should suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if the visiting, whereof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the Lord taketh away frō the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his trueth & other helpes of saluation: in this that the children being blinded & forsaken of him, doe goe on in the steps of their fathers, they susteine curses for their fathers offences. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, & at last to eternal destruction, herein they are punished by the iust iudgement of God, not for ỹ sinnes of other, but for their own iniquitie. Eze.18.20.

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of god into a thousand generations, which promise is also often found in the scriptures, and is set in the solemne couenant of the Church: I will be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hauing respect vnto, writeth that the children of the righteous shalbe blessed after their death, not onely by reason of holy bringing vp, which also not a little auayleth therevnto, but also for that blessing promised in the couenant, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupon groweth great comfort to the faithful, great terrour to the wicked. For if euen after death, the remembrance both of righteousnes and wickednes be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posteritie, much more shal it light and rest vpon the heads of the doers themselues. But it maketh nothing against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times commeth to good proofe, & the issue of the faithful swarueth out of kinde: becausse the lawmaker meant not here to stablish such a perpetual rule as should derogate his free election. For it sufficeth for the comfort of the righteous and for the terrour of the sinner, that the penaltie is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For as the temporal punishments that are laid vpō a fewe wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the iudgement that shal one day be giuen vpon al sinners, although many escape vnpunished euen to ỹ ende of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercie and bountifulnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a proofe of his constant and perpetuall fauour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, hee sheweth what iudgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which assurednesse he had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largenesse of his mercie, which hee extendeth vnto a thousand generations, whereas hee assigned but onely foure generations to vengeance.

The thirde commaundement.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

The end of the third commaundement is the holy estimation of gods name which excludeth all conceipts & speeches concerning him which are not according to his highnes: all irreuerend mentioning of his word, all carping at his workes: & of all rash, much more al impious abusing thereof.

22 The end of this cõmaundement is, that his will is to haue the maiestie of his name to be holy among vs. Therefore the summe shal be that wee doe not defile it with contemptuously and irreuerently vsing it. With which prohibition the commaundement hangeth orderly together, that we take studie and care godlily to reuerence it. Therefore wee ought so to order our selues both in our mindes and our tongues, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his mysteries, but reuerently and with much sobrietie: that in weying his workes, wee conceiue nothing but honorable toward him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that whatsoeuer our minde conceiueth of him, whatsoeuer our tongue vttereth, it may sauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may serue to aduaunce his magnificence. That wee doe not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy worde and reuerende mysteries either to ambition, or to couetousnesse, or to our owne triflings: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name imprinted in them, so they may keepe their honour and estimation among vs. Last of all, that wee doe not carpe against or speake euill of his workes, as these wretched men are wont to babble reprochfully against them: but that what soeuer wee rehearse done by him, we report it with wordes of praise of his wisedome, righteousnesse and goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is defiled with vaine and peruerse abuse, because it is violently carried from the right vse whereunto onely it was appointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoyled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much euill in this rash readinesse to vse the name of God out of season, much more mischiefe is in this, if it be employed to euil vses, as they doe that make it to serue the superstitions of Necromancie, cruell execrations, vnlawfull coniurations, and other wicked enchantementes. But swearing is cheefly mentioned in the commaundement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable, that thereby wee may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commaundement giuen of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the trueth and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he afterwarde in the second table condemneth periurie and false witnesse, whereby hurt is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repeate it againe, if this commaundement intreated of the duetie of charitie. And also the diuision of the lawe it selfe requireth it, because as it is saide, God did not in vaine appoint two tables for his law, whereby is gathered that in this commaundement he chalengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holinesse of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

23 First is to be learned what is an othe. It is a taking of God to witnesse, to confirme the trueth of that which we speake. For those cursed speaches that conteine manifest reproches against God, are vnworthie to be reckened among othes. That such taking to witnesse, when it is rightly done, is a kinde of worshipping of God, is shewed in diuerse places of the Scripture. As when Esay propheceth of the calling of the Assyrians and Ægiptians into fellowship of the couenant with Israel, They shall speake (saith he) in the tongue of Chanaan, and shall sweare in the name of the Lorde. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lord, they shall yeeld a confession of his religion. Againe, when he speaketh of the enlargement of his kingdome, he saith: Whosoeuer shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithful: and he that shall sweare in the land shall sweare in the true God. Ieremie saith, If they shall teach ỹ people to sweare in my name as they haue taught them to sweare by Baal, they shalbe builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is said, that when we call vpon the name of the Lorde to witnesse, we do witnesse our religion toward him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall & vnchangeable trueth, whome we call vpon, not onely as a most substantiall witnesse of trueth aboue all other, but also as the onely defence thereof, which is able to bring foorth hidden things into light, and then as the knower of hearts. For where testimonies of men do faile, there we flee to God for witnesse specially where any thing is to be prooued that lieth secrete in conscience. For which cause the Lord is bitterly angry with them that sweare by strange gods, & he iudgeth that manner of swearing to be an argument of manifest falling from his allegeance: Thy sonnes haue forsaken me, & do sweare by them that are no gods. And he declareth the hainousnesse of this offence by threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that sweare by the name of the Lord, & sweare by Melchan.

24 Now when we vnderstand that it is the Lords will that there bee in our othes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent heede is to bee taken, that in steede of worshipping they doe not conteine dishonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no small dishonor, when periurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the law, Profanation. For what is left to the Lorde when he is spoiled of his trueth? he shall then ceasse to be God. But truely he is spoiled thereof, when he is made an affirmer & approuer of falshod. Wherefore, when Iosua minded to driue Achan to confesse the trueth, he said: My sonne, giue glorie to the Lorde of Israel, meaning thereby, that the Lorde is grieuously dishonoured if a man sweare falsly by him. And no maruel. For we do as much as in vs lieth, in a manner, to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speach was vsed among the Iewes so oft as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospel of Iohn. To this heedfulnes the formes of othes that are vsed in ỹ Scriptures do instruct vs: The Lord liueth, The Lord do these things vnto me, and adde these things, The Lord be witnesse vpon my soule. Which do proue, that we cannot call God for witnesse of our sayings, but that wee also wish him to take vengeance of our periurie, if we speake deceitfully.

superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shall not be sufficient to abstaine from swearing falsly, vnlesse we do also remember, that swearing was sufferred and ordained not for lust or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they goe beyond the lawfull vse thereof, that applie it to things not necessarie. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serue either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men doe too much licentiously offende, and so much the more intollerably, for that by verie custome it hath ceassed to be reckoned for any offence at all, which yet before the iudgement seate of God is not slenderly weyed. For euery where without regarde, the name of God is defiled in trifling talkes, and it is not thought that they doe euil, because by long suffered and vnpunished boldnesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednesse. But the commaundement of the Lorde remaineth in force, the penaltie abydeth in strength, & shall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall reuenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commaundement is also transgressed in an other point, that in our othes we put the holy seruants of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodlinesse, for so we transferre the glorie of his godhead to them. Neither is it without cause that the Lord hath giuen a special commandement to sweare by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that wee shoulde not be heard sweare by any strange gods. And the Apostle euidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing do call vpon a higher than themselues, & that God which had none greater than his owne glorie to sweare by, did sweare by himselfe.

Exo. 23. 13.

The folly of Anabaptistes in collecting the simple vnlawfulnes of all oathes out of the vvordes of our Sauiour Christ.

Mat. 5.
Iacob. 5.

26 The Anabaptists not contented with this moderation of swearing, doe detest all othes without exception, because the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, sweare not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, whatsoeuer is more than this, is of euil. But by this meane, they do without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his father, and as if he had come downe from heauen to repeale his fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth not onely in the lawe permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were ynough: but also in necessitie doeth cõmaund it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father: that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commaunded him, ỹ his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterwarde forbidde and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, which he hath before allowed by commaunding it? But because there is some difficultie in the wordes of Christ, let vs a little weigh them. But herein wee shall neuer attaine the trueth, vnlesse wee bende our eyes vnto the intent of Christ, and take heede vnto the purpose that hee there goeth about. His purpose is not either to releasse or restraine the law, but to reduce it to the true and naturall vnderstanding, which had beene very much depraued by the falsse glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if wee hold in minde, wee shall not thinke that Christ did vtterly condemne othes, but onely those othes which do transgresse the rule of the law. Therby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbeare no manner of

ſwearing but periuries, whereas the law doth not only forbid periuries, but alſo all idle & ſuperfluous othes. The Lord therfore the moſt ſure expoſitor of the law, doth admoniſh them, that it is not only euil to forſweare, but alſo to ſweare. But howe to ſweare? in vaine. But as for theſe othes that are commended in the law, he leaueth them ſafe and at libertie. They ſeeme to fight ſomewhat more ſtrongly when they take earneſt holde of this worde At al, which yet is not referred to the word Sweare, but to ỹ formes of ſwearing that are after rehearſed. For this was alſo part of their error, that when they did ſweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence againſt this commandement, the Lorde doeth alſo cut off from them all byſhiftes that they ſhould not thinke that they haue eſcaped, if not ſpeaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witneſſe. For here by the way it is alſo to be noted, that although the name of God be not expreſſed, yet men by indirect formes doe ſweare by him, as if they ſweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptiſme or other tokens of gods liberalitie towardes them. Neither doeth Chriſt in that place where hee forbiddeth them to ſweare by heauen and earth and Hieruſalem, ſpeake it to correct ſuperſtition, as ſome men falſely thinke, but he rather confuteth their ſophiſticall ſuttletie, which thought it no fault babblingly to throwe out indirect othes, as though they ſpared the holy name of God, which is ingrauen in all his benefites. But otherwiſe it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deuiſed that ſtinking forme of ſwearing by the life or ſoule of the king: for then the falſe making of Gods doth obſcure & miniſh the glorie of the one onely God. But when wee meane onely, to procure credite to our ſaying by the holy name of God, although the ſame be indirectly done, yet in all ſuch trifling othes his maieſtie is offended. Chriſt taketh from this licentiouſneſſe, all pretenſe of excuſe, in this that hee forbiddeth to ſweare at all. And Iames to the ſame purpoſe, reciting the ſame wordes of Chriſt which I haue before alleaged, becauſe the ſame raſh boldneſſe hath alwayes beene in the worlde, which is a prophane miſuſing of the name of GOD. For if yee referre this worde, At all, to the ſubſtance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to ſweare: wherefore ſerueth that expoſition which is added afterwarde: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Whereby it ſufficiently appeareth that thoſe cauillations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their fault to be excuſed.

Mat. 5. 34.

Iac. 5. 12.

Oathes not only publique but alſo priuate ſoberly & reuerently taken allowable & according both to reaſon and to approued examples.

17 Therefore it cannot nowe be doubtfull to ſounde iudgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reproue thoſe othes that were forbidden by the lawe. For he himſelfe which ſhewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that he taught, did not ſticke to ſweare when occaſion required And his diſciples, who (wee doubt not) did obey their maſter in all things, followed the ſame example: who dare ſaye that Paul woulde haue ſworne, if ſwearing had beene vtterly forbidden: but when the matter ſo required, he ſware without any ſticking at it, yea, ſometime adding an execration. But this queſtion is not yet ended, becauſe ſome do thinke that only publike othes are excepted out of this prohibition, as those othes that wee take when the Magistrate doeth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vse to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they sweare allegeance to their Prince, or the Souldiar when he is put to an othe for his true seruice in the warre, and such like. And to this sort they adioyne, and that rightfully, such othes as are in Paul, to confirme the dig-Heb.6.16. nitie of the Gospel, for asmuch as the Apostles in their office are not priuate men but publike ministers of God. And truely I denie not that those are the safest othes, because they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The Magistrate is commaunded in a doubtful case to drive the witnesse to an othe, and he on the other side to aunswere by othe: and the Apostle saith, that mens controuersies are by this meane ended. In this commaundement both these haue a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea, and wee may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publike and solemne othe was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were vsually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or verie little regarded, because they thought that in these they had not to doe with the maiestie of God at all. But yet it were too much dangerous to condemne priuate othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holily, & reuerently taken, which are maintained both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for priuate men in a weightie and earnest matter to appeale to God as iudge between them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnesse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breach of faith, thou endeouurest to purge thy selfe according to the dutie of charitie, and he by no meanes wil suffer him selfe to be satisfied. If thy good name come in peril by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offence appeale to the iudgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocencie knowen. Nowe if the weight of the wordes be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnesse. Therefore I see not why in this case wee should affirme, that the calling him to witnesse is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech be saide

Gen.21.24.& 26.31.& 31.53. not to serue for our purpose, because it was made in the name of a publick companie, yet Iacob and Laban were private men, which stablished a co-
Ruth.3.13. uenant with mutuall othe betweene themselues. Booz was a priuate man which by the same meane confirmed his promise of mariage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate man, a iust man and fearing God, which affirmed vnto E- 1.Re.18.10. lias by oth, the thing that he meant to perswade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that othes be so tempered, that they be not vnaduised, that they be not common without regarde, that they be not vsed of raging lust, nor trifling, but that they serue iust necessitie, as where the Lords glory is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to which ende the commandement of the law tendeth.

The fourth Commaundement.

Remember that thou keepe holy the Sabbat day. Sixe dayes shalt thou worke & doe all thy workes. But on the seuenth day is the Sabbat of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no worke. &c.

28 The end of this commandement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, shoulde bee busied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation should be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordained. But because this commandement hath a peculiar and seuerall consideration from the rest, therfore it must haue also a seueral manner of exposition. The olde writers vse to call it a shadowish commandement, for that it conteineth the outward obseruation of the day, which by the cõming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherein I graunt they say truely, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore wee must fetch the exposition of it further off. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, whereupon this commandement consisteth. For first the heauenly lawmaker meant vnder the rest of the seuenth day, to set out in figure to the people of Israel the spiritual rest, wherby the faithfull ought to cease from their own works, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondarily, his wil was to haue one appointed day, wherein they should meete together to heare the lawe, and execute the ceremonies, or at least bestowe it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlines. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest graunted to seruants, & such as liued vnder the gouernement of other, wherein they might haue some ceasing from their labour.

Three causes considerable in the fourth commandement concerning the obseruation of the sabeth day.

29 But we are many wayes taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principal point in the Sabbat. For the Lorde required the keping of no commaundement in a manner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophets to declare that all religion is ouerthrowen, then he complaineth that his Sabbates are polluted, defiled, not kept, not sanctified: as though that peece of seruice being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honoured. He did set foorth the obseruing thereof with high praises. For which cause the faithfull did among other oracles maruellously esteeme the reueiling of the Sabbat. For in Nehemiah thus spake the Leuites in a solemne conuocation, Thou hast shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbat, & hast giuen them the commaundements and the ceremonies, and the law by the hand of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commaundements of the lawe. All which things do serue to set foorth the dignitie of the mysterie, which is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus, See that yee keepe my Sabbat day, because it is a token betweene mee and you in your generations: that you may knowe that I am the Lorde that sanctifie you: keepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israel keepe the Sabbat and celebrate it in their generations, it is an euerlasting couenant betweene me and the children of Israel, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe thereof commeth to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israel should knowe that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our own wil, then appeareth a most apt relation of the outward signe with the inward thing it self: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne will, wee must resigne vp our heart, wee must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, nally, we muſt ceaſſe from all the doings of our own wit, that wee may haue God working in vs, that we may reſt in him, as the Apoſtle alſo teacheth.

Gods appointing the ſeuenth day for the ſabath, & his ratifying the ſame by his owne example, was to confirme the perfection of that euerlaſting reſt whereof the ſabath day being a figure is appointed on a daye which following in orderly numeration beareth the name of a perfect number.

30 This perpetuall ceaſſing was repreſented to the Iewes, by the keeping of one day among ſeuen: which day, to make it be obſerued with greater deuotion, the Lord commaunded with his owne example. For it auaileth not a little to ſtirre vp mans endeuour, that hee may knowe that hee tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man ſearch for a ſecret ſignification in the number of ſeuen: Foraſmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cauſe choſen to ſignifie euerlaſting continuance. Wherewith this alſo agreeth that Moſes in the day that he declared that the Lord did reſt from his workes, maketh an end of deſcribing the ſucceeding of dayes and nightes. There may be alſo brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lorde thereby meant to ſhewe that the Sabbat ſhould neuer be perfectly ended, til it came to the laſt day. For in it we beginne our bleſſed reſt, in it we do daily proceede in profiting more and more. But becauſe we haue ſtil a continuall warre with the fleſh, it ſhal not be ended vntil that ſaying of Eſaie be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of newe Moone with newe Moone, of Sabbat with Sabbat, euen then when God ſhalbe all in all. It may ſeeme therefore that the Lorde hath by the ſeuenth day ſet foorth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbat at the laſt day, that our whole life might by cõtinuall meditation of the Sabbat, aſpire to this perfection.

1.Cor.15.28.

The principall thing in the ſabath is the myſterie of perpetual reſt: the ceremonial vſe thereof abrogated, the ſuperſtitious obſeruation to be auoided.

31 If any man miſlike this obſeruation of the number as a matter too curious, I am not againſt him, but that he may more ſimply take it: that the Lord ordeined one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the ſchooling of the lawe be exerciſed to the continuall meditation of the ſpirituall reſt: And that he aſſigned the ſeuenth day, either becauſe he thought it ſufficient, or that by ſetting foorth the likeneſſe of his own example, he might the better moue the people to keepe it or at leaſt to put them in mind, that the Sabbat tended to no other end, but that they ſhould become like vnto their creator. For it maketh ſmall matter, ſo that the myſterie remaine which is therein principally ſet forth, concerning the perpetuall reſt of our workes, to conſideration whereof the Prophets did now and then call back the Iewes that they ſhould not thinke themſelues diſcharged by carnall taking of their reſt. Beſide the places alreadie alleaged, you haue thus in Eſay:

Eſa.58.13.

If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbat, that thou do not thine owne will in my holy day, and ſhall call the Sabbat delicate and holy of the glorious Lord, and ſhalt glorifie him while thou doeſt not thine owne wayes, & ſeekeſt not thine owne will to ſpeake the worde, then ſhalt thou be delited in the Lorde &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lord Chriſt, ſo much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the trueth, by whoſe preſence all figures do vaniſh away, he is the bodie at ſight whereof the ſhadowes are left, he, I ſay, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbat, wee being buried with him by Baptiſme, are graffed into the fellowſhip of his death, that we being made partakers of the reſurrection, we may walke in newnes of life. Therefore in another place the Apoſtle writeth, that the Sabbat was a ſhadow of a thing to come: and that the true bodie, that is to ſay, the per-perfect substance of trueth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath wel declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, vntill that wee being vtterly dead to our selues, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious obseruing of dayes ought to be farre from Christians.

Although the first vse of the sabboth which was to signifie spirituall rest being ceremoniall be done away, yet the second and thirde, whereby it was appointed for the people of God to meete and for labourers to cease on doth stil remaine.

32 But forasmuch as the two latter causes ought not to bee reckened among the olde shadowes, but do belong alike to all ages: since the Sabbat is abrogate, yet this hath still place with vs, that wee should meete at appointed dayes to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mystical bread, and to publike prayer: and then that to seruants and labourers be granted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commaunding the Sabbat, the Lorde had care of both these things. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the onely vse of the Iewes to proue it. The seconde, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man seruant and thy maide seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Ægypt. Againe, in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can denye that both these things doe serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commaunded vs by the worde of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knowen in the verie experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appointed and haue their ordinarie dayes, howe can they bee kept? All things by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comely and in order among vs. But so farre is it off, that comlinesse and order can bee kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hande present trouble and ruine of the church, if it be dissolued. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releefe whereof the Lorde appointed the Sabbat to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to prouide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt saye, why do wee not rather daily meete togither, that the difference of dayes may be taken away? I would to God, that were graunted, and truely spirituall wisedome was a thing woorthie to haue daily a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it cannot bee obtained of the weakenesse of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doeth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey ỹ order which we see layde vpon vs by the will of God?

Deu. 5. 14.
Exo. 23. 12.
1. Cor. 14. 40.

The difference betweene Iewes & Christians in obseruing the saboth daie: they keepe it as a shadow of a thing spirituall, we onely for politicall partly, and partly for Ecclesiasticall orders sake.

33 I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirites do raise trouble, concerning the sunday. They crie out that the Christian people are nourished in Iewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of dayes. But I answere, that we keepe those dayes without any Iewishnesse, because we do in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For wee keepe it not with straite religion as a ceremonie, wherin we think a spiritual mysterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessarie remedy to the keeping of order in the church. But Paul teacheth that in keeping therof they are not to be iudged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galathians, because they did stil obserue dayes. And to the Romaines hee affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betweene day and day. But who, ſauing theſe madde men onely doth not ſee, of what obſeruing the Apoſtle meaneth? For they had no regard to this politicall ende and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them ſtill as ſhadowes of ſpirituall things, they did euen ſo much darken the glorie of Chriſt & the light of the Goſpel. They did not therefore ceaſe from handie workes, becauſe they were things that did call them away from holy ſtudies and meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceaſing from worke they did dreame that they ſtil kept their myſteries of old time deliuered them. The Apoſtle, I ſay, inueieth againſt this diſordered difference of dayes, and not againſt the lawfull choiſe of dayes that ſerueth for the quietneſſe of Chriſtian fellowſhip, for in the Churches that he himſelfe did ordaine, the Sabbat was kept to this vſe. For hee appointeth the Corinthians the ſame daye, wherein they ſhould gather the collection to releeue the brethren at Ieruſalem. If they feare ſuperſtition, there was more danger thereof in the feaſt dayes of the Iewes, than in the Sundayes that the Chriſtians nowe haue. For ſo as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of ſuperſtition, the day that the Iewes religiouſly obſerued is taken away: and, ſo as was neceſſarie for keeping of comlineſſe, order, and quiet in the Church, an other day was appointed for the ſame vſe.

1. Cor. 16. 2.

The blameleſſe intent of Chriſtians, ſubſtituting the Sunday in ſteede of the Iewes ſabboth, & of others among Chriſtians hauing other feſtiuall dayes appointed for the ſame purpoſe: the principal exerciſes wherby the ſabboth is ſanctified: their trifling vanitie which ſee no difference betweene Iewes & Chriſtians but the change of the day, when in the vſe of the day in deede we principally differ.

Hiſt. trip. li. 9. c. 38.

34 Albeit the old fathers haue not without reaſon of their choiſe, put in place of the Sabbat day, the day that wee call Sunday. For whereas in the Reſurrection of the Lord is the ende and fulfilling of that reſt, whereof the old Sabbat was a ſhadowe: the Chriſtians are by the verie ſame day y made an ende of ſhadowes, put in minde that they ſhould no longer ſtick vnto the ſhadowiſh ceremonie. But yet I do not ſo reſt vpō the number of ſeuen, that I would binde the church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne thoſe Churches, that haue other ſolemne dayes for their meetings, ſo that they be without ſuperſtition, which ſhalbe, if they be onely applyed to the obſeruation of Diſcipline and wel appointed order. Let the ſumme hereof be this: as the trueth was giuen to the Iewes vnder a figure, ſo is it deliuered vs without any ſhadowes at all. Firſt, that in all our life long wee ſhoulde be in meditation of a continuall Sabbat or reſt from our owne workes, that the Lorde may worke in vs by his ſpirite: then that euery man priuately ſo oft as he hath leaſure, ſhould diligently exerciſe himſelfe in godly calling to minde the workes of God, and alſo, that we al ſhoulde keepe the lawful order of the Church appointed, for the hearing of the worde, for the miniſtration of the Sacraments and for publike prayer: thirdly, that wee ſhould not vngently oppreſſe them that be vnder vs And ſo doe the triflings of the falſe prophets vaniſh away that in the ages paſt haue infected the people with a Iewiſh opinion, that ſo much as was ceremoniall in this commandement is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the ſeuenth day, but that ſo much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing elſe in effect, than for reproche of the Iewes to change the day, and to keepe ſtill the ſame holineſſe in their mind. For there ſtill remaineth with vs the like ſignification of myſterie in the dayes as was among the Iewes. And truely we ſee what good they haue done by ſuch doctrine. For they that cleaue to their conſtitutions, doe by these as much exceed as the Iewes in grosse and carnal superstition of Sabbat: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, do no lesse fitly serue for the at these daies, than for those that the Prophet reprooued in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that least religion should fall away or waxe faint among vs, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outwarde helpes are to be vsed that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God. Es. 1.13. and 58. 13.

The fifth Commaundement.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou mayst liue long vpon the Lande which the Lord thy God shall giue thee.

35 The end of this commaundement is, that because the Lord deliteth in the preseruation of his order, therefore he willeth that those degrees of preeminence which he hath ordained be not broken, the summe therefore shall be that we reuerence those whom the Lord hath set ouer vs, that wee yeld to them honour, obedience and thankefulnesse. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden vs, to withdrawe any thing from their dignity, either by contempt or obstinacie or vnthankefulnesse. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie verie largely: as when the Apostle sayeth, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not onely that reuerence is due vnto them, but also such recompence as their ministerie deserueth. And because this commaundement of subiection, doeth most of all disagree with the peruersenesse of mans nature, which as it swelleth with greedinesse of climbing high, so it hardely abideth to be brought lowe: therefore he hath set that kind of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable & least enuious: because he might the easilyer meeken and reclaime our mindes to the vse of submission. Therefore the Lord doth by litle and litle traine vs to all lawfull subiection by that which is most easie to beare, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whom hee giueth any preeminence, he doth communicate his owne name with them, so far as is necessarie to preserue the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, do so belong vnto him alone, that so oft as wee heare one of them named, our minde must needs be touched with a feeling of his maiestie. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these thinges, he maketh to glister with a certaine sparke of his brightnesse, that they may be honorable euery one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we haue to consider somwhat of the nature of God, because he beareth not the name of God without cause. Hee that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

The end of the fift commandement is preseruation of order, for which God commandeth all thinges belonging to the honor, and forbiddeth any thing tending to the dishonor of superiors whom hee beautifieth with amiable names to meaken the mindes of men vnto obedience & subiection vnder them. 1. Tim. 2. 5.

36 Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a generall rule, that as we knowe any man to be by his ordinance set ouer vs, so we yeeld vnto him reuerence, obedience, thankefulnesse, & such other duties as it lieth in vs to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or vnworthie. For of what sorte soeuer they bee, they haue not without the prouidence of God atteined that place, by reason wherof the lawmaker woulde haue them to be honored. Yet namely he hath giuen commaundement of reuerence to parentes, that haue brought vs into this life, to which

Vnto parentes so rearmed in respect of their preeminence be they good or bad, as also vnto our natural parents the honor of reuerence, obedience and thankefulnesse is required at our hands.

Exod.21. Leui.20.9. Leui.10.9. Pro.10.10. Deu.21.18. Mat.15.4. Eph.5.1. Col.3.20.

reuerence very nature ought in a manner to instruct vs. For they are monsters and not men, that breake the authoritie of parentes with dishonour or stubburnnesse. Therfore the Lord commaunded al the disobedient to their parentes, to be slaine, as men vnworthie to enioy the benefite of light, that doe not reknowledge by whose meanes they came into it. And by manie additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three parts of honour that he here speaketh of, Reuerence, Obedience, and Thankefulnesse. The first of these the Lorde establisheth when he commaundeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The second hee confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children To the third belongeth that saying of Christ in the fifteenth of Matthew, that it is the commãdement of God that we do good to our parents. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of a commandement, hee expoundeth that therein obedience is required.

What ũ meant by the promise annexed to the fift commandement and howe it may stande with the shortnes of their liues that are most obedient.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in mind, how acceptable vnto God is the submissiõ ẏ is here cõmaunded. For Paule vseth the same pricke to stirre vp our dulnesse when he saith: that this is the first commaundement with promise. For the promise that went before in the first Table, was not special & properly belonging to one commandement, but extended to the whole lawe. Nowe this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the lande which hee had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of lande was a pledge of Gods bountifulnes: let vs not marueile if it pleased God to declare his fauour by giuing length of life, by which a man might long enioye his benefit The meaning therefore is thus, Honor thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayest enioy ẏ possession of that lande that shalbe vnto thee for a testimonie of my fauour. But sith all the earth is blessed to the faithfull, wee doe worthely reckon this present life among the blessinges of God. Therefore this promise doeth likewise belong vnto vs, forsomuch as the continuance of this life is a proofe of Gods good will. For it neither is promised to vs, nor was promised to the Iewes, as though it cõtained blessednes in it selfe, but because it is wont to be to the Godlie a token of Gods tender loue. Therefore if it chaunce that an obedient child to his parentes bee taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seene, yet doth God no lesse constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he should reward him with a hundred Acres of land, to whom he promised but one Acre. Al consisteth in this, that wee shoulde consider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blessing of God, & that it is his blessing so farre as it is a proofe of his fauour, which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnesse and shew in effect to his seruants.

The curses that fal vpon the disobedient, in vvhich number are all that vvithdravv their subiection from thẽ to vvhõ

38 Moreouer, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this present life to the children that honor their parents with such reuerẽce as they ought, he doth withall secretly say, that most assured curse hangeth ouer the stubborne and disobedient children. And that the same should not want execution: he pronounceth them by his lawe subiect to the iudgement of death, and cõmandeth them to be put to execution: and if they escape that iudgement, he himselfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see howe great a number of that sorte of men are slaine in battailes & in frayes, and some other tormented in straunge vnaccustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a proofe that this threatning is not vayne. But if any escape to olde age, sith in this life being depriued of the blessing of God, they do nothing but miserably languish, and are reserued for greater paines hereafter, they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children But this is also by the way to be noted, that wee are not commaunded to obey them but in the Lorde. And that is euident by the foundation before layed: for they sit on high in that place whereunto the Lorde hath aduaunced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is vsed toward them, ought to be a steppe towarde the honouring of that soueraigne Father. Wherefore, if they moue vs to transgresse the lawe, then are they woorthily not to bee accompted parents, but straungers that labour to withdrawe vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lordes, and all sortes of superiours. For it is shamefull and against conuenience of reason, that their preeminence should preuaile to presse downe his highnesse, sith theirs as it hangeth wholly vppon it, so ought onelie to guide vs vnto it.

they owe al submission in the Lord, but no other wise then in the Lord,

The sixt Commaundement.

Thou shalt not kill.

39 The ende of this commaundement is, that forasmuch as God hath bounde together all mankinde with a certeine vnity, that euery man ought to regarde the safetie of all men, as a thing giuen him in charge, in summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, whereby our neighbours body may be hurt, is forbidden vs. And therefore wee are commanded, if there be any power of succour in our trauaile to defend the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that wee procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them frõ hurt, and if they be in any daunger, that we giue them our helping hande. If thou consider that it is God the lawmaker that so saith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a fonde thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughtes of the heart, and principally resteth vpõ them, should instruct nothing but the bodie to true righteousnesse. Therfore the manslaughter of the heart is also forbidden in this lawe, and an inward affection to preserue our brothers life is here giuen in commaundement. The hand in deede bringeth forth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiueth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angrie with thy brother without burning in desire to doe him hurt If thou canst not be angry with him, then canst thou not hate him, forasmuch as hatred is nothing but an olde rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurte. If thou wilt

The sixt commaundement tending to the vnitie and therby to the safetie of al mankind, doeth vnder the name of murder both forbid al hurt and inioyn al furtherance vvhich may grovve from man to manne: vvhich rule, must bridle and direct not onelye outvvard deedes, but also invvarde thoughts.

wilt ſtill dally out with ſhiftes to defende it, it is alreadie pronounced by the mouth of the holy Ghoſt, that he is a manſlayer that hateth his brother in his heart. It is pronounced by the mouth of the Lorde Chriſt, that he is guiltie of iudgement that is angrie with his brother: that hee is guiltie of the counſell that ſaith Rhacha: that he is guiltie of Hell fire, that ſaith vnto him, Foole.

Two ſpeciall groundes of this commandement, the excellencie of mans creation, & the price of his redemption, in regard of which two, if ſo muche care bee due to his bodie, to hu ſoule how much more?

40 The Scripture noteth two points of equitie, vpon which this commaundement is grounded: becauſe man is both the image of God and our owne fleſh, wherefore vnleſſe we will defile the image of God, we muſt haue care to touche man none otherwiſe, than as a ſacred thing: and vnleſſe wee will put of all naturalneſſe of man, wee muſt cheriſh him as our owne fleſhe. That manner of exhortation that is fetched from ỹ redemption & grace of Chriſt, ſhall be intreated of in an other place. God willed theſe two things naturally to be conſidered in man, that might perſwade vs to the preſeruation of him, that we ſhould both reuerence the image of God imprinted in him, and embrace our owne fleſh. He hath not therefore eſcaped the crime of manſlaughter, that hath kept himſelfe from ſhedding of blood. If thou commit anie thing indeede, if thou goe about any thing with endeuour, if thou conceiue any thing in deſire and purpoſe that is againſt the ſafetie of an other, thou art holden guiltie of manſlaughter. And againe: If thou doe not trauaile to thy power and as occaſion may ſerue to defend his life, thou doeſt with like haynouſneſſe offende the lawe. But if there be ſo much care taken for the ſafetie of his bodie, let vs hereby gather, how much ſtudie and trauaile is due to the ſafetie of his ſoule, which in the Lordes ſight doth infinitely excell the bodie.

The ſeuenth Commaundement.

Thou ſhalt not commit adulterie.

In the ſeuenth commaundement chaſtitie & cleanneſſe being ſought, God by the name of actuall intemperance, doeth make hatefull whatſoeuer tendeth thervnto, & require a care of continuing our bodies and ſoules in puritie for preſeruation whereof mariage is eſtablished.

41 The ende of the commandement is, that becauſe God loueth chaſtitie and cleanneſſe, therefore all vncleanneſſe ought to depart farre away from vs. The ſumme therefore ſhal be, that we be defiled with no vncleanneſſe or luſtfull intemperance of the fleſh. Whereunto anſwereth the affirmatiue commaundement, that we chaſtly & continently order all the parts of our life. But fornication he forbiddeth by name, to which all vnchaſte luſt tendeth: that by the filthines of that which is more groſſe & ſenſible, forſomuch as it alſo defileth the body, he might bring vs to abhorre al filthy luſt. Sith man was created in this eſtate, not to liue a ſolitarie life, but to vſe a helper ioyned vnto him: and ſince that by the curſe of ſinne he is driuen the more to this neceſſitie, the Lord hath in this behalfe prouided help for him ſo much as was ſufficient, when hee ordained mariage, when he ſanctified with his bleſſing the fellowſhip begonne by his authoritie. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowſhip of man & woman out of mariage, is accurſed before him, & that the fellowſhip of mariage it ſelfe, was ordained for remedie of neceſſitie, that we ſhould not runne out into vnbridled luſt. Therfore let vs not flatter our ſelues, ſith we heare that man cannot be coupled with woman out of mariage, without the curſe of God.

42 Nowe forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more enkindeled since the fall of man, we are become doubtely subiect to desire of companie of women, except it be those whome God of his singular grace hath exempted from it: let euery man looke well what is giuen vnto him. Virginitie, I graunt, is a vertue not to be despised: but sith it is to some denied, and to some graunted but for a time, let them that are troubled with incontinencie, and striuing with it, cannot get the vpper hand, resort to the help of mariage, that so they may keepe chastitie in the degree of their vocation. For they that cannot conceiue this word, if they do not succour their owne intemperance with the remedie that is offered and graunted them, they striue against God and resist his ordinance. And let no man carpe against me (as many do at this day) that being aided with the helpe of God, he can do all things. For the helpe of God is present only with those, that walke in his wayes, that is in their vocation from which they do withdrawe themselues, which forsaking the helpes of God, do trauaile to ouercome & maister their necessitie with vaine rash boldnesse. The Lorde affirmeth that continencie is a singular gifte of God, and of that sort that are not giuen generally, nor vniuersally to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he saieth, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of Heauen, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely apply themselues to the affaires of the heauenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such gelding is in the power of man, he shewed a little before, that all men are not able to receiue it, but they to whome it is peculiarly giuen from heauen, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he writeth, that euery man hath his proper gift of god, one thus, and another thus.

To vvhome the guift of continencie is not giuen, they must vse the remedie vvhich God hath ordeined.

Psa. 19.1. & 14.

Mat. 19.12.

1. Cor. 7.7.

43 Whereas we are by open declaration admonished, that it is not in euery mans power to keepe chastitie in single life, although with studie & trauaile he endeuour neuer so much vnto it, & that it is a peculiar grace, which God giueth but to certaine men, that he may haue them the more readie to his worke: doe wee not striue against God and nature which he hath instituted, if wee doe not apply the kinde of life to the proportion of our power? Here the Lorde forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleanesse and chastitie of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way, that euery man measure himselfe by his owne measure. Neither let a man despise mariage as a thing vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise desire single life, vnlesse he be able to liue without a wife. And therein also let him not prouide only for the quiet & commoditie of the flesh, but only that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readines & prepared to all duties of godlinesse. And forasmuch as this benefit is giuen to many but for a time, let euery man so long absteine from mariage as he shalbe meete to liue to keepe single estate. If strength faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now layde vpon him a necessitie to marry. This the Apostle sheweth when he commandeth that to auoid fornication euery man haue his own wife, & euery woman haue her own husbād, that he that cannot liue continently should marrie in the Lord. First he declareth that the

They sinne grieuously against God vvhich vse it not although they keep them selues vnstained vvith any bodily vncleanenes.

1. Cor 7.1. & 2.

the most part of men are subiect to the vice of incontinence: and then of those that be subiect vnto it, he excepteth none, but commandeth al to that onely remedie, wherewith vnchastitie is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to help their infirmitie by this meane, they sinne euen in this that they obey not the commandement of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he could not be rebuked of vnchastitie, while in the meane season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paul defineth chastitie to be a cleanesse of the mind, ioyned with chastitie of the bodie. A woman vnmarried (saith he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as she is holy both in bodie & in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commandemẽt, he doth not only say, that it is better for a man to take a wife, than to defile himselfe with company of a harlot, but he saith, that it is better to marrie than to burne.

1.Cor.6.24.

Mariage to be vsed as an holy remedie against euil lust as a couert of dissolute lust, all aides causes and signes whereof must be auoided in thought, looke, rayment, speech, diet.

44 Nowe if married folkes doe confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lorde, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate & dissolute lust. For though the honestie of mariage do couer the filthines of incontinencie, yet it ought not foorthwith to be a prouocation therof. Wherefore let not maried folkes thinke, that all things are lawfull vnto them, but let euery husband haue his own wife soberly, & likewise the wife her husbande, and so doing, let them commit nothing vnseeming the honestie and temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure & modestie, & not to ouerflow into euery kind of extreme lasciuiousnes. This wantonnes Ambrose reproued with a saing verie sore in deede, but not vnfit for it, when he calleth the husband, the adulterer of his own wife, which in vse of wedlock hath no care of shamefastnes or honestie. Last of all, let vs consider what lawmaker doeth here condemne fornication, euen he which sith of his own right he ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth pureneſse of the soule, spirite & body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of bodie, with vncleanly gestures, and with filthie talke to laye wait to trap anothers chastitie. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboue measure wantonly and deintily clothed, that it made no matter in what part he were filthily vnchast, if we haue a regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthinesse in whatsoeuer part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of doubt, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastitie. If the Lorde require chastitie of vs, then he condemneth all that euer is against it. Therefore if thou couet to shewe obedience, neither let thy mind burne inwardly with euil lust, nor let thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body bee trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthie talke entise thy minde to like thoughtes, nor let thy glutonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blottes, wherewith the pureneſse of chastitie is bespotted.

The eight Commaundement.

Thou shalt not steale.

45 The end of this commandement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteousnes ouſneſſe, that euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The ſumme therefore ſhalbe, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goodes, and that therefore we are commaunded euery man to employ his faithfull trauaile to preſerue to each man his owne goods. For thus we ought to thinke that what euery man poſſeſſeth is not happened vnto him by chance of fortune, but by the diſtribution of the ſoueraigne Lord of all things: and therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by euil meanes, but that wrong be done to the diſpoſition of God. But of theftes there be many kindes: one ſtandeth in Violence, when the goodes of an other are by any manner of force and robbing licentiouſneſſe bereaued. The other kinde conſiſteth in malicious deceite, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other ſorte there is that ſtandeth in a more hidden ſuttletie, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other ſort in flatterie, where they are ſucked away by pretence of gift. But leaſt wee ſhoulde tarie too long vppon renting of all the ſeuerall kindes of theſte, lette vs knowe, that all craftie meanes whereby the poſſeſſions and money of our neighbours are conueied vnto vs, when they once go by crooked waies from ſyncerenes of hearte, to a deſire to beguile, or by any meane to doe hurt, are to bee accounted for theftes. Although by pleading the law, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwiſe weigh them. For he ſeeth the long captious ſuttleties, wherwith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the ſimpler minde, till at length he drawe him into his nettes. He ſeeth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherwith the mightier oppreſſeth and throweth downe the weaker. He ſeeth ỹ allurements, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh thee vnware. All which things are hidden from the iudgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not onely in monie, in wares, or in landes, but in euery mans right. For we defraud our neighbour of his goods, if we denie him thoſe dueties which we are bound to doe for him. If anie idle factor or Baylife do deuour his maſters ſubſtance, and is not heedful to the eare of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully ſpoyle, or do riotouſly waſte the ſubſtaunce committed vnto him, if a ſeruant doe mocke his maſter, if he diſcloſe his ſecretes by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe if the Lord doe cruelly oppreſſe his houſholde, they are before God guiltie of theſte. For hee both withholdeth and conucieth an other mans goods, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

That euerie man maye haue hir owne, vve are in the eight commãdement forbidden all practiſing vvhatſoeuer to the vnıuſt loſſe & daunger of others, and all vvithholding of anie duety vvherby vve are bound to doe them good foraſmuch as either of theſe doeth make vs guilty of theſe.

46 We ſhal therefore rightly obey this commaundement, if being contented with our owne eſtate, we ſeeke to get no gaine but honeſt & lawfull, if we couet not to wax rich with wrong, nor go about to ſpoile our neighbor of his goodes that our owne ſubſtance may encreaſe, if wee labour not to heape vp cruel riches and wrong out of other mens blood, if we do not immeaſurably ſcrape together euery way, by right & by wrong, that either our couetouſneſſe may be filled, or our prodigalitie ſatisfied. But on the other ſide, let this bee our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counſell and helpe to keepe their owne ſo farre as we may; but if we haue to do with falſe and deceitfull men, let vs rather bee ready to yeelde vp ſome of our owne, then to ſtriue with them. And not that only, but let vs communicate to their neceſſities, and with our ſtore relieue their neede, whom we ſee to be oppreſſed with hard and poore eſtate. Finally, let euery man looke howe much he is by duetie bound vnto other, & let him faithfully pay it. For this reaſon let the people haue in honor al thoſe that are ſet ouer them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes & commandements, refuſe nothing that they may beare, ſtil keeping God fauourable vnto them. Againe, let them take care of their people, preſerue common peace, defend the good, reſtraine the euil, and ſo order al things, as readie to giue account of their office to the ſoueraigne iudge. Let the miniſters of Churches faithfully apply their miniſterie, and not corrupt the doctrine of ſaluation, but deliuer it pure and ſyncere to the people of God, and let them inſtruct them not onely with learning, but alſo with example of life: finally, let them ſo be ouer them, as good ſhepeheardes be ouer the ſheepe. Let the people likewiſe receiue them for the meſſengers and Apoſtles of God, giue them that honor whereof the higheſt maſter hath vouchſafed them, and miniſter vnto them ſuch things as are neceſſarie for their life. Let parents take on them to feede, rule and teach their children, as committed to them of God, and grieue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with crueltie, but rather cheriſh and embrace them with ſuch lenitie and tendernes, as becommeth their perſon. After which manner, we haue alreadie ſaide, that children owe to their parents their obedience. Let yong men reuerence old age, euen as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men alſo gouerne ỹ weakneſſe of youth with their wiſedome and experience, wherein they excell yong men, not rating with rough and loude brawling, but tempering ſeueritie with mildneſſe and gentleneſſe. Let ſeruants ſhewe themſelues diligent & ſeruiſable to obey: & that not to the eye, but from the heart, as ſeruing God himſelfe. Alſo let maſters ſhewe themſelues not teſtie and harde to pleaſe, nor oppreſſe them with too much ſharpneſſe, nor reprochfully vſe them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow ſeruants vnder the heauenly Lorde, whom they ought mutually to loue and gently to intreat. After this maner, I ſay, let euery man conſider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Moreouer, our minde ought alwaies to haue reſpect to the lawmaker, that wee may knowe that this lawe is made as well for our mindes, as for our handes, that men ſhould ſtudie to defende and further the commodities and profite of other.

The ninth Commaundement.

Thou ſhalt not be a lying witneſſe againſt thy neighbour.

To vphold truth wee are in the ninth commandement forbidde the abuſe of the tongue in hindering our neighbour, & commanded to imploy it for his beneſite.

47 The end of this commandement is, that becauſe God which is truth abhorreth lying, we ought to obſerue trueth without deceitful colour. The ſumme therefore ſhall bee, that wee neither hurt any mans name eyther with ſlaunders or falſe reportes, nor hinder him in his goods by lying: finally, that wee offende no man, by luſt to ſpeake euill, or to be buſie: with which prohibition is ioyned a commaundement, that ſo farre as wee may, wee employ our faithfull endeuour for euery man in affirming the trueth, to defend the safetie both of his name and goods. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to expounde the meaning of his commaundement in the three & twentie Chapter of Exodus, in these wordes: Thou shalt not vse the voice of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hande to speake false witnesse for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in an other place hee doeth not onely call vs away from lying in this point that we bee no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceiue his brother, for hee forbiddeth them both in seuerall commaundements. Truely it is no doubt, but that as in the commaundementes before, hee hath forbidden crueltie, vnchastitie and couetousnesse, so in this he restraineth falshoode. Whereof there are two partes as we haue noted before. For either wee offend the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backebite, or in lying and sometime in euill speaking wee hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be vnderstanded solemne and iudicial testimonie, or common testimony that is vsed in priuate talkes. For we must alwaies haue recourse to this principle, that of all the generall kindes of vices one speciall sort is set for an example, wherevnto the rest may bee referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the faulte is moste apparaunt. Although it were conuenient to extende it more generallie to slaunders and finister backebitinges wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully greeued, for that falsehoode of witnessing which is vsed in iudiciall courtes, is neuer without periurie. But periuries insomuche as they doe prophane & defile the name of God, are alreadie sufficiently met withal in the thirde commaundement. Wherefore the right vse of this commaundement is, that our tongue in affirming the trueth, do serue both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equitie thereof is more than manifest For if a good name be more pretious than anie treasures, whatsoeuer they be: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoiled of the goodnesse of his name than of his goods. And in bereauing his substance sometime false witnesse doeth as much as violence of handes.

Exod. 23. 1. Leui. 19. 15.

48 And yet it is maruellous with how negligent careleſnesse men doe commonlie offende in this point, so that there are founde verie few that are not notablie sicke of this disease: we are so much delighted with a certaine poisoned sweetnesse both in searching out & in disclosing the euils of other. And let vs not thinke that it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes wee lie not. For he that forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled with lying, willeth also that it be preserued vntouched so far as the trueth wil suffer. For howsoeuer he taketh heede to himselfe onlie, so that hee tell no lie, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, ỳ God hath a care of it. Wherefore without doubt all euill speaking is vtterly condemned But wee meane not by euill speaking, that rebuking which is vsed for chastisement: nor accusation, or iudiciall processe, whereby remedie is sought for an euill, nor publike reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in feare, nor bewraying of faults to them for whose safetie it behoooueth ỳ they should be forwarned least they should be in danger by ignorance: but we meane onlie hateful accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnes & of a wāt̄o wil to backbite.

The great libertie which men giue thēselues in transgressing this lawe by their wanton delight to backbite, to scoffe, to iudge, or to heare them that doe so.

S. Also

Also this commaundement is extended to this point, that we couet not to vse a scoffing kinde of a pleasauntnesse, but mingled with bitter tauntes, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faultes vnder pretence of pastime, as manie doe that seeke praise of merie conceites with other mens shame yea and griefe: also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a litle reproched. Nowe if wee bende our eyes to the lawemaker, which must according to his rightfull authority beare rule no lesse ouer the eares and minde than ouer the tongue: truely wee shall finde that greedinesse to heare backebitings, & a hastie readinesse to euil iudgements are no lesse forbidden. For it were verie fonde if a man shoulde thinke that God hateth the faulte of euill speaking in the tongue, and doeth not disalow the fault of euill maliciousnesse in the heart. Wherefore if there be in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs indeuour so farre as wee may and as is expedient, and as charitie beareth, that wee giue neither our tongue, nor our eares to euill speakinges, and bitter iestinges, least wee rashly without cause yeelde our mindes to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expositours of all mens sayinges, and doinges, let vs both in iudgement, eares, & tongue gently preserue their honour safe.

The tenth Commaundement.

Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house, &c.

As the former cõmandementes haue deliuered a rule of charitie to gouerne our euill studies & vvorks: so the last commãdement requireth the verie first conceptions of the mind to be framed according to the same rule.

49 The ende of this commaundement is, that because the Lordes will is that our soule bee wholly possessed with the affection of loue: all lust is to bee shaken out of our minde that is contrarie to charitie. The summe therefore shall bee, that no thought creepe into vs, which may moue our mindes with a concupiscence hurtful and turning towarde an others losse: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commaundement, that whatsoeuer wee conceiue, purpose, will or studie vppon, bee ioyned with the benefite and commoditie of our neighbours. But heere, as it seemeth, ariseth a harde and combersome difficultie. For if it bee truely sayde of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are contained the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the coueting of other mens goodes shoulde afterwarde bee seuerally forbidden vs. But the distinction betweene purpose and couering, will easily lose vs this knotte. For purpose (as wee haue meant in speaking of it in the other commaundementes before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but couering may bee without any suche either aduisement or assent, when the minde is onely pricked and tickled with vaine and peruerse obiectes. As therefore the Lorde hath heeretofore commaunded, that the rule of charitie shoulde gouerne our willes, studies, and workes: so he nowe commaundeth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there bee none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde an other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and led into wrath, hatred, fornication, robberie, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be moued thereunto.

50 And not without cause doth hee require so great vprightnesse. For who

who can denie that it is righteous, that all the powers of the ſoule be poſſeſſed with charitie? But if any of them do ſwarue from the marke of charitie, who can denie that it is diſeaſed? Nowe whence commeth it that ſo manie deſires hurtfull to thy neighbour, doe enter in thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou careſt onely for thy ſelfe? For if thy mind were altogether throughly ſoked with charitie, no parcel therof ſhould be open to ſuch imaginations. Therefore it muſt needs be voide of charity, ſo far as it receiueth concupiſcence. But ſome man will obiect, that yet it is not meete that fantaſies that are without order toſſed in mans wit, and at length do vaniſh away, ſhould be condemned for concupiſcence, whoſe place is in the heart. I anſwere that heere our queſtion is of that kinde of fantaſies, which while they are preſent before our mindes, doe together bite and ſtrike our hearte with deſire, foraſmuch as it neuer commeth in our mynde, to wiſhe for any thing, but that our heart is ſtirred vp and leapeth withall. Therefore God commãdeth a maruelous feruentnes of loue which he willeth not to be entangled with neuer ſo ſmal ſnares of concupiſcence. He requireth a marueloufly framed mind, which he ſuffreth not ſo much as with ſlight prouocations to be any thing ſtirred againſt the law of loue. To this expoſition Auguſtine did firſt open me ỹ way: becauſe thou ſhouldeſt not think ỹ it is without conſent of ſome graue authority. And though the Lords purpoſe was to forbid vs al wrongful coueting: yet in rehearſing ỹ ſame, he hath brought forth for example thoſe things that moſt commonly doe deceiue vs with a falſe image of delight: becauſe he would leaue nothing to concupiſcence whẽ he draweth it from theſe things, vpon the which it moſt of al rageth and triumpheth. Loe, here is the ſecond Table of the law, wherin we are taught ſufficiently what wee owe to men for Gods ſake, vpon conſideration whereof hangeth the rule of charitie. Wherefore you ſhall but vainely call vppon thoſe dueties that are contained in this Table, vnleſſe your doctrine do ſtay vpon the feare and reuerence of God, as vpon her foundation. As for them which ſeeke for two cõmandements, in the prohibition of coueting, the wiſe reader, though I ſay nothing, will iudge that by wrong diuiſion, they teare in ſunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothing againſt vs, that this worde, Thou ſhalt not couet, is the ſecond time repeated, for after ỹ he had firſt ſet the houſe, then he renteth the partes thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainely appeareth, that (as the Hebrues do very well) it ought to be read in one whole ſentence, and that God in effect commandeth, that al that euery man poſſeſſeth, ſhould remaine ſafe and vntouched, not onely from wrong and luſt to defraud them, but alſo fom the very leaſt deſire that may moue our mindes.

The laſt commandement vvhich is by ſome rent amiſſe into tvvo, conteineth not bare conceptions or fancies, but ſuch as do bite & ſtirre the minde vvith deſire repugnant to that vvhich perfect charity requireth, of vvhich kind of concupiſcences thoſe are rehearſed for examples ſake vvhich are moſt vſuall in mens mindes.

The drifte of the lavve is to touch perfect holineſſe, vvhich conſiſteth in pure loue tovvards God and man, and not to ſet dovvne onelie certain rudiments that vvere after vvards to bee further perfected.

51 But now to what end the whole law tendeth, it ſhall not bee hard to iudge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteouſneſſe, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the pureneſſe of God. For God hath therein ſo painted out his owne nature, as if a man doe performe in deedes, that which is there commanded, he ſhall in a manner expreſſe an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moſes meant to bring the ſumme thereof into the mindes of the Iſraelites, he ſaide: And nowe Iſrael, what doth the Lord thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lord, and walke in his waies? loue him Deut. 10. 12.

him and ſerue him in all thy hearte, and in all thy ſoule, and keepe his commandements? And he ceaſſed not ſtil to ſing the ſame ſong againe vnto them, ſo oft as he purpoſed to ſhewe the ende of the lawe. The doctrine of the lawe hath ſuch reſpect hereunto, that it ioyneth man, or as Moſes in an other place termeth it, maketh man to ſticke faſt to his God in holineſſe of life. Nowe the perfection of that holineſſe conſiſteth in the two principall pointes alreadie rehearſed That we loue the Lord God with all our heart, all our ſoule, and all our ſtrength, and our neighbours as our ſelues And the firſt indeede is, that our ſoule be in all partes filled with the loue of God. From that by and by of it ſelfe foorth floweth the loue of our neighbour. Which thing the Apoſtle ſheweth when he writeth, that the end of the law is loue out of a pure conſcience, and a faith not fained. You ſee howe, as it were, in the head is ſet conſcience and faith vnfained, that is to ſaie in one word true godlineſſe, and that from thence is charitie deriued. Therefore he is deceiued, whoſoeuer thinketh that in the law are taught onelie certaine rudimentes and firſt Introductions of righteouſneſſe, wherewith men became to bee taught their firſt ſchooling, but not yet directed to the true marke of good woorkes: whereas beyond that ſentence of Moſes, and this of Paule, you can deſire nothing as wanting of the higheſt perfection. For howe farre I pray you, will hee proceede that will not bee contented with this inſtitution, whereby man is inſtructed to the feare of God, to ſpirituall worſhipping, to obeying of the commaundementes, to follow the vprightnes of the way of the Lord: finally to pureneſſe of conſcience, ſyncere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that expoſition of the lawe, which ſearcheth for and findeth out in the commaundementes thereof all the duties of godlineſſe and loue. For they that follow onelie the drie and bare pinciples, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods wil, know not the end therof, as the Apoſtle witneſſeth.

1.Tim.1.15.

The reaſon vvhy in the prophets & the Goſpel ſo oftentimes vvhen the keeping of the lavv is ſpoken of the dueties onelie of the ſecond Table are expreſly mentioned.

52 But whereas in rehearſing the ſumme of the lawe, Chriſt & the Apoſtle do ſomtime leaue out the firſt Table: many are deceiued therein while they would faine draw their words to both Tables. Chriſt in Mathew calleth the chiefe points of the law, mercie, iudgement & faith: vnder the word Faith, it is not doubtfull to mee, but that he meaneth truth or faithfulneſſe toward men. But ſome, that the ſentence might be extended to the whole law, take it for religiouſnes toward God. But they labour in vaine. For Chriſt ſpeaketh of thoſe works wherewith man ought to proue himſelfe righteous. This reaſon if we note, we will alſo ceaſſe to maruell why, when a yong man asked him what be the commandementes by keeping whereof we enter into life: he anſwered theſe things onelie: Thou ſhalt not kill. Thou ſhalt not cõmit adultery. Thou ſhalt not ſteale. Thou ſhalt beare no falſe witnes. Honour thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbor as thy ſelfe. For the obeying of the firſt Table conſiſted in manner all either in the affection of the heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, and as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually vſe. But the woorkes of charitie are ſuch, as by them we may declare a perfect righteouſneſſe. But this commeth eche where ſo oft in the prophets, that it muſt needes bee familiar to a reader, but meanely exerciſed in them. For in a maner alway, whe they they exhort to repentance, they leaue out the first Table, and onely cal vpon faith, Iudgement, Mercy & Equitie. And thus they do not ouerskip the feare of God, but they enquire the earnest proof thereof by the tokens of it. This is wel known, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they do for the most part rest vpon the second Table, because therein the studie of righteousnes & vprightnes is most openly seene. It is needlesse to rehearse the places, because euery man wil of himselfe easily marke that which I say.

Our charitie towards men is a proofe & exercise testifying our religion towardes God.

53 But thou wilt say, is it then more auaileable to the perfection of righteousnes, to liue innocently among men, than with true godlinesse to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily keepe charity in all pointes, vnles he earnestly feare God, therefore it is thereby proued, that he hath godlinesse also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifie by the Prophet: therfore he requireth not our duties to himself, but doth exercise vs in good works towarde our neighbor. Therfore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfection of the holy ones in charity. And not inconueniently in another place he calleth the same the fulfilling of the law: adding that hee hath performed the law that loueth his neighbour. Againe, That all the law is comprehended in one word, Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe, For he teacheth no other thing but the same which Christ doeth when hee saith: Whatsoeuer ye will that men doe to you, do ye the same to them, For this is the lawe and the Prophets. It is certaine that in the law and the Prophets Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, and that Loue is beneath it in the lower degree: But the Lords meaning is, that in the lawe is onely prescribed vnto vs an obseruation of right and equitie, wherein wee be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

Mat.7.12.

54 Heere therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shall bee best framed to Gods will and the rule of his lawe, when it shall bee euerie way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole law there is not reade one syllable that appointeth to man any rule of such thinges as hee shall doe or leaue vndone to the commoditie of his owne flesh. And surely sith men are soborne of such disposition naturally that they bee too much carried all headlong to the loue of themselues, and howe muche soeuer they fall from the trueth yet still they keepe that selfe loue, there needed no lawe anye more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyonde measure. Whereby it plainely appeareth, that not the loue of our selues, but the loue of God and of our neighbour is the keeping of the commaundements, and that he liueth best & most holily, that (so neere as may be) liueth & trauelleth least for himselfe, & that no man liueth worse & more wickedly than he that liueth & trauelleth for himself & only thinketh vpon & seeketh for thinges of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because hee had no other vehementer or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the manner of speaking is diligently to bee weyed. For hee doeth not, as certaine Sophisters haue foolishly dreamed, giue the first degree to the loue of our ſelues, and the ſeconde to charitie, but rather that affection of loue which we doe all naturally drawe to our ſelues, he giueth away vnto other, wherevpon the Apoſtle ſaith, that Charite ſeeketh not her owne. And their reaſon is not to be eſteemed worth a haire that the thing ruled is euer inferiour to his Rule. For God doth not make the loue of our ſelues, a rule whervnto charitie towarde other ſhould be ſubiect, but wheras by peruerſeneſſe of nature, the affection of loue was wont to reſt in our ſelues, he ſheweth that now it ought to be elſewhere ſpread abroad, that we ſhould with no leſſe cheerefulnes, feruentnes, and carefulnes be readie to doe good to our neighbour than to our ſelues.

1.Cor.13.5.

55 Now ſith Chriſt hath ſhewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour euerie man is contained bee hee neuer ſo ſtrange vnto vs: there is no cauſe why we ſhoulde reſtraine the commaundement of loue within the boundes of our owne friendſhips and acquaintances. I denie not that the neerer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarlie hee is to bee holden with our indeuours to doe him good. For ſo the order of humanitie requireth, that ſo many moe dueties of friendſhip men ſhoulde communicate together, as they are bounde together with ſtreighter bondes of kinred, familiaritie or neighbourhoode, and that without any offence of God, by whoſe prouidence wee are in a manner driuen thereunto. But I ſay that all mankinde without exception is to bee imbraced with one affection of charitie: and that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthie or vnworthie, of friend or foe, becauſe they are to be conſidered in God and not in themſelues: from which conſideration when wee turne awaie, it is no maruel if wee bee entangled wth manie errours. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of louing, we muſt not turne our eyes vnto man, the ſight of whom would ofter enforce vs to hate then to loue, but vnto God which commaundeth that the loue which wee offer him, be powred abroad among al men: that this bee a perpetuall foundation, that whatſoeuer the man bee, yet he ought to be loued becauſe God is loued.

Luc.10.36.

The commaundements of the lavv in ſpeaking of our neighbours, meant not that vvee ſhoulde reſtraine the dueties of loue and charity to our ſpecial acquaintance.

56 Wherefore it was a moſt peſtilent ignorance or malice, that the Schoolemen of theſe commaundements, touching not deſiring of reuengement, and louing our enimies, which in the olde time both were giuen to the Iewes and at the ſame time were commonly giuen to all Chriſtians, haue made Councels which it is in our libertie to obey or not to obey. And the neceſſarie obeying of them, they haue poſted ouer to Monkes which were thought but in this one point forſooth more righteous than ſimple Chriſtians, that they willingly bound themſelues to keepe the Councels. And they render a reaſon why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they ſeeme too burdenous and heauie, ſpecially for Chriſtians that are vnder the lawe of grace. So dare they preſume to repel the eternall law of God touching the louing of our neighbours. Is there any ſuch difference in anie leafe of the law? and are not therein the rather ech where founde commandementes that doe moſt ſeuerely require of vs to loue our enemies? For what manner of ſaying is that, where wee are commaunded to feede our enemie when he is hungrie: to ſet into the right waie his Oxen or Aſſes ſtraying straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint vnder their burdē? Shal we do good to his beasts for his sake without any good wil to himself? What? is not the word of the Lord euerlasting? Leaue vengeance to me, and I wil requite it. Which also is spoken more plainly at large in another place. Seeke not vengeance, neither be mindfull of the iniury of thy citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, & not lyingly faine that he was a counsel giuer.

Deu. 32. 35. Leu 19. 18.

57 And what I praie you meane these things that they haue presumed to mocke withall in their vnsauorie glose? Loue your enemies, doe good to them that hate you, pray for them that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that yee maie bee the children of your father which is in heauen. Who cannot heare reason with Chrisostome, that by so necessary a cause it plainlie appeareth that they are no exhortations but commandementes? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the number of the children of God? But by their opinion, only Monkes shalbe the children of the heauenlie father, they only shalbe bold to cal vpon God their Father: what shal the Church do in the meane season? it shal by like right be sent away to the Gētils & Publicans. For Christ saith: If yee be friendlie to your friends, what saiour looke you for thereby? do not the Gentiles & Publicans the same? But we shalbe in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen taken awaie from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touche the wife of thine enemie than of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leaue to steale nothing at all, either from thy friend or from thine enemie. But these two, not to steale, & not to commit fornication, Paul bringeth within the compasse of the rule of loue, yea & teacheth that they are contained vnder this commandement, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expositor of the law, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loued, euen by cōmandemēt, like as our friendes. Therfore they do truely bewray themselues to bee the children of Satan, ỹ do so licentiously shake off the common yoke of ỹ children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine with more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of the olde writers ỹ do not pronounce as of a thing certain, ỹ these are mere commandements. And that euē in Gregories age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmation, for he without controuersie taketh them for commandements And how fooliſh do they reason? They say ỹ they are too weightie a burdē for Christiās. As thogh there could be deuised any thing more weighty than to loue God with al our heart, with al our soule, with al our strength. In comparison of this law any thing may be compted easie, whether it be to loue our enimie, or to lay away al desire of reuenge out of our mind. In deed al things are high & hard to our weaknes euen the least title of the lawe. It is the Lord in whom we vse strength. Let him giue what he commandeth, & command what he wil, Christian men to be vnder the law of grace, is not vnbridledly to wander without lawe, but to be grafted in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the law, & by whose spirite they haue a

We are not cōselled onlie in the lawe, but cōmanded to loue, do good to, pray for, and blesse our enemies as the reason annexed, that ye may bee the children of your father doeth shewe: & so the fathers haue vnderstood it: neither is the reason anie thing against it, which they bring concerning the hardnes of performing it.

law written in their hearts. This grace Paul vnproperly called a lawe, alluding to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men do in the name of the law, dispute vpon a matter of nothing.

They doe in vaine diminishe the vvaight of sinne, vvho make venial sinnes of the secret vnaduised desires vvherein the heart of man doth not long rest.

58 Of like sort it is that they called Veniall sinne, both secret vngodlinesse that is against the first Table, & also the direct transgressing of the last commandement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without aduised assent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it cannot come at all into the heart, but by want of those thinges that are required in the law. We forbid to haue strange gods. When the minde shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere, when it is touched with a sodaine desire to remoue her blessednesse some other way: whence come these motions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule emptie, to receiue such tentations? And to the ende not to drawe out this argument to greater length, there is a commaundement giuen to loue God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then al the powers of our soule be not bent to the loue of God, we haue already departed from the obedience of the law, because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdom, & interrupt his decrees, do proue that God hath not his throne wel stablished in our conscience. As for the last commandement, wee haue already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guilty of coueting, and therwithall are made transgressors of the law, because the Lorde doth forbid vs, not only to purpose & practise any thing that may be to anothers losse, but also to be pricked & swell with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang ouer the transgression of the law. We cannot therfore proue euen the very least desires free from iudgement of death. In weying of sinnes (sayth Augustine) let vs not bring false balances to weigh what we list and how wee list at our own pleasure, saying: this is heauy & this is light: but let vs bring Gods balance out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lordes treasurie, and let vs therein weigh what is heauie: rather let vs not wey, but reknowledge thinges already weighed by the Lord. But what saith the Scripture? Truely when Paul saith that the reward of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this stinking distinction. Sith we are too much enclined to hypocrisie, this cherishment therof ought not to haue been added to flatter our slothfull consciences.

Lib. 2. de bap. contra Donatist. cap. 6.

Mat. 5. 19. Euery transgression euen of the least commaundement diminisheth his authority that commandeth, displeaseth him, prouoketh his vvrath and is not otherwise pardonable then by mercie, but deserueth in it self to bee punished vvith eternall death.

59 I would to God they would consider what that saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commandements, and teacheth men so, shalbe counted none in the kingdome of heauen. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the lawe, as if it were not woorthie of death? but they ought to haue considered, not only what is commanded, but what he is that commandeth, because his authority is diminished in euery transgression, how litle soeuer it be, of the law that he hath giuen in cõmandement. Is it a smal matter with thẽ, that Gods maiesty be offended in any thing? Moreouer if God hath declared his will in the lawe, whatsoeuer is contrarie to the lawe, displeaseth him. Will they imagin the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not foorthwith follow vpon them? And he himselfe hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their hearts to heare his voice, than to trouble the cleare trueth with their vnsauourie suttleties of argument. The soule (saith he) that sinneth, the same shall die. Againe, which I euen now alleaged, the reward of sinne is death. But albeit they grant it to be a sinne, because they cannot denie it: yet they stand stiffe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they haue hitherto too much borne with their owne madnesse, let them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, wee will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learne this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the wil of God, which of necessitie prouoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the lawe, vpon which the iudgement of God is pronounced without exception: and that the sinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtaine pardon by the mercie of God.

Eze. 18.20.
Rom. 6.23.

The ix. Chapter.

That Christ although he vvas knowen to the Iewes vnder the lavve, yet vvas deliuered onely by the Gospell.

BEcause it pleased God in the olde time not vainly by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselfe a Father, and not in vaine he did consecrate a chosen people to himselfe: euen then without doubt hee was knowen in the same image, wherein hee nowe appeareth to vs with full brightnesse. Therefore Malachie, after that hee had bidden the Iewes to take heede to the lawe of Moses, and to continue in studie thereof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruption of the office of the Prophets) did forthwith declare, that there should arise a sonne of righteousnesse. In which wordes he teacheth, that the lawe auaileth to this purpose, to holde the godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when hee should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophets did make search, & diligently enquire, of the saluation that is now opened by the Gospell: and that it was reueiled vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselues, nor to their owne age, but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in old time, or nothing auailed themselues: but because they enioyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And whereas they did but a little sip of it, there is offred vnto vs a more plentifull enioying thereof. Therfore Christ himselfe, which affirmeth that he had witnesse borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby wee excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples, he said: Blessed are the eyes that see that which ye see, & blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. For many kings and Prophets haue wished it, & haue not obteined it. This is no small commendation of the reueiling of the Gospel that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlines. With which sentence that other place disagreeth not, where it is saide, that Abraham sawe the day of Christ, and reioyced. For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, ye he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came Christ vvas knowen to the fathers vnder the lavv, but not so clearely as to vs he is manifested in the Gospel.

Iohn.1.18. saying of Iohn Baptist: No man hath seene God at any time, the only begotten that is in the bosome of the father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had bin dead before him, from the fellowship of the vnderstanding & light that shineth in the person of Christ: But comparing their estate with ours, hee teacheth that those mysteries, which they sawe but darkely vnder shadowes, are manifest to vs: as the author of the E-
Heb.1.1. pistle to the Hebrewes doth wel set out, saying, that God diuersly and many wayes spake in old time by the Prophets, but now by his beloued sonne, although therefore that only begotten one, which is at this day to vs ỹ bright nesse of the glorie, and the print of the substance of God the father, was in old time knowen to the Iewes, as we haue in another place alleaged out of Paul, that he was the guide of the old deliuerance: yet is it true, which the 2.Cor.4.6. same Paul els where teacheth, that God which cõmanded the light to shine out of darknesse, hath now shined vpon our hearts to set foorth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Iesus Christ: because when hee appeared in this his im ge, he did in a maner make himselfe visible, in comparison of the darke & shadowish forme that had bin of him before. And so much the more foule & detestable is their vnthankfulnes & peruersnes, that are here so blind at midde day. And therefore Paul saith, that their mindes are darkened by Sathan, that they shoulde not see the glorie of Christ shining in the Gospel, though there be no veile set betweene them and it.

Although in the lavv & the Prophets there be many promises concerning the free forgiuenes of sinnes, yet the name of the Gospel properly taken is not applyable vnto them but only to the publishing of grace nowv giuen in Iesus Christ.

2 Nowe I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the mysterie of Christ. I grant truely, that in that respect that Paul calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the lawe, concerning the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accounted partes thereof. For hee compareth faith against these terrors, wherwith the conscience should be troubled & vexed, if saluation were to be sought by workes. Whereupon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contained vnder it al the testimonies that God in old time gaue to his fathers, of the mercie and fatherly fauour: But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applyed to the publi-

Mar.1.1. the Gospell of the kingdome. And Marke maketh his preface in this maner, The beginning of the Gospell of Iesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to proue a thing sufficiently knowen. Christ therfore by his comming hath made cleere the life and immortalitie by the Gospell. By 2.Tim.1.10. which wordes Paul meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but claiming this prerogatiue of honour to the Gospel, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kind of message, whereby God performed those things that he had promised, that the truth of his promises should be fulfilled in the person of the Sonne. For although the faithful haue alway found by experience, that same saying of Paul to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, because they were sealed in their heartes: yet because hee hath accomplished all parts of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that self liuely deliuering of the things rightfully obteined a new & singuier title of praise Whereupon commeth that saying of Christ: Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open, and the Angels of God ascending & descending vpon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his comming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie therof may stande familiarly open to all men. Iohn. 1 52.

3 But yet we must take heede of the diueliſh imagination of Seruetus, which when he goeth about, or at least faineth that he goeth about, to extol the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, vtterly aboliſheth the promises, as if they were ended togither with the law. He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospel there is brought vnto vs the accomplishment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betweene vs & Christ. I did in deede euen now declare that Christ left nothing vnperfourmed of ỹ whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we do alreadie enioy the benefits purchaced by him, as though that saying of Paul were false, that our saluation is hidde in hope. I grant in deede, that wee by beleeuing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the meane season we must hold this saying of Iohn, that although we know we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, til we shalbe like vnto him: that is, til we shall see him such as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospel present fulnesse of spirituall good things, yet the enioying therof lieth still hidde vnder the keeping of hope, til being vnclothed of the corruptible flesh, wee be transfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holy Ghost biddeth vs to rest vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkings of that filthie dogge. For as Paul witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in another place he putteth vs in minde, that we haue the same promises, which in the old time were giuen to the holye men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spirite of promise, but yet wee doe no otherwise enioy Christ, but so farre as wee embrace him clothed with his promises. Whereby it commeth to passe, that he in deede dwelleth in our hearts, & yet wee wander in iourney abroad from him: because we walke by faith & not by sight. And these two things do not ill agree together: that we possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good things that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: because the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing, which the law did shadow vnder figures.

We may not with Seruetus think that because the promises made before are accomplisht in Christ, therefore they are abolisht, so as Christians are not to looke for any further enioying of things promised than they haue attained alreadie.

4 And hereby also is their errour conuinced, which do neuer otherwise compare the lawe with the Gospel, but as they compare the merites of workes with the free imputation of righteousnesse. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be reiected: because Paul doeth oftentimes vnderstand by the name of the lawe, a rule to liue righteously, wherin

The Gospel is not so opposed to the lawe, as teaching another way of saluation, but the same more plainly.

God

God requireth of vs, that which is his, not giuing vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all points obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do neuer so litle swarue from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, that we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckened righteous, because the obseruation of the lawe, whereunto the reward is promised, is no where founde. Therefore Paul doth fitly make the righteousnes of the law and of the Gospell, contrarie the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succeede in place of the whole law, that it should bring any diuerse meane of saluation, but rather to confirme and proue to be of force, whatsoeuer the lawe had promised, and to ioyne the bodie to the shadowes. For when Christ sayeth, that the lawe and the Prophets were vntil Iohn: he maketh not the fathers subiect to the curse, which the bondseruants of the law can not escape: but rather onely that they were instructed with certaine rudiments, so as they stayed a great way beneath the height of the doctrine of the gospel. Therfore Paul calling the Gospel the power of God, to saluation to euery beleeuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witnesse of the lawe & the Prophets. But in the end of the same Epistle, although he shewe that the title of praise of Iesus Christ is the reuelation of the mysterie kept secrete in the euerlasting times: yet he doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that he is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Whereupon wee gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole lawe, the Gospel differeth from the lawe onely in respect of the plaine disclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath beene layde open for vs in Christ, it is now not without cause saide, that at his comming the heauenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

Rom.1.16.

The preaching of Iohn a meane betwene the lawe and the Gospel. In which respect his office differing both from the Prophets and Apostles he is termed greater than the one and lesse than hee which was least of the other.

5 Now betweene the lawe and the Gospel came Iohn, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Christ the lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed forth the summe of the Gospel: yet because he did not expresse that same incomparable strength and glorie, which at length appeared in his resurrection, therefore Christ saith, that he was not equall to the Apostles. For so do those words of his meane: that though Iohn excell among the sonnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdom of heauen, is greater than he. Because he doeth not there commend the persons of men, but after he had preferred Iohn before the Prophets, he aduaunceth the preaching of ỹ Gospel to the higheste degree: which preaching wee see in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas Iohn himselfe doeth aunswere that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophets, he doth not that for fained humilities sake, but meaneth to teache that the proper office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachie: Behold, I sende Elias the Prophet, before that the great and terrible daye of the Lorde doe come. And truely he did nothing elsse in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeuour to get disciples to Christ: as also Esaie prooueth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candel burning & shining, because the broad day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but ỹ he may be reckened among the publishers of of the Gospel, like as he vsed the same Baptisme, which was afterward deliuered to the Apostles. But that which he began, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heauenly glorie.

The x. Chapter.

Of the likenesse of the old and newe Testament.

BY the things aforesaide it may nowe appeare euidently, that all the men whome from the beginning of the worlde God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which nowe remaineth in force among vs, bounde in couenant to him. But because it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adioyne vnto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of all one Mediatour, how farre their estate differed from ours in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that wee haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for proofe thereof, do make it plaine that there was neuer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of God: yet because in writers there are oftentimes many things spoken of the difference of the olde and newe Testament, that may make the reader that is not of verie sharpe iudgement to be in doubt: therefore wee shal rightfully appoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter: Yea, and that thing also, which otherwise shoulde haue bene verie profitable for vs, is now made necessarie by that monstruous losell Seruetus and by diuers other mad men of the sect of Anabaptistes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israel, than as of a heard of swine: which they fondly faine to haue bin fatted vp by the Lorde here in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortalitie. Therfore that we may keepe away this pestilent errour from godly mindes, & also to plucke out of them al doubtes which are wont by and by to arise vppon hearing mention of the diuersitie betweene the olde and the newe Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what couenant the Lorde made with the Israelites in the olde time before the comming of Christ, and what couenant he hath nowe made with vs since Christ hath beene openly shewed.

A thing necessarie to knowe the agreement & difference betweene our selues & the fathers vnder the lawe.

2 And both these points may be made plaine with one worde. The couenant of all the fathers so differeth nothing from ours in substance and in the matter it selfe, that it is altogether one and the selfesame: but the ministration is diuers. But because of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a certaine vnderstanding, we must needes proceede on with a longer declaration if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shalbe superfluous to discourse againe of new vpon all the special particulars that haue alreadie been declared: and it shalbe out of season to mingle those things together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here wee must chiefly rest vpon three principall pointes: First, that wee holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the marke appoin-

The fathers had the same couenant which vve haue: they looked for immortalitie & had it promised: they expected it by merits and not by merite: they knewe that Christ vvas their mediator to obtaine mercie, as vvell as vve.

appointed to the Iewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosen vnto the Hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, and by the prophecies. Secondarily, that the couenant whereby they were ioyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the onely mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knewe Christ the mediatour, by whom they should both be ioyned to God and enioy his promises. Of which points, because the seconde peraduenture is not yet sufficiently knowen, it shall in place appointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many & cleare testimonies of the Prophets, that it was of his owne meere goodnes and tender fauour, whatsoeuer good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israll. The thirde also hath alreadie had here and there some plaine declarations of it, & we haue not left the first altogether vntouched.

As vvell to the fathers vnder the lavv as to vs in the Gospel promises vvere made of the life to come & not of temporall happines only.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, because it most specially belongeth to this present matter, & for that they make vs most cõtrouersie about it, we wil employ the more earnest trauaile: but yet so that if there want yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplyed, or in conuenient place be added. Truely, the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that God the Father long before by the Prophets in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospel, which he afterward published according to the time appointed. Againe, that the righteousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospell it selfe, hath witnesse of the lawe and the Prophets. For the Gospel doeth not holde the hearts of men in the ioy of this present life, but lifteth them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doeth not fasten them to earthly delights, but preaching to them a hope layd vp in heauen, doth in a maner transport them thither. For thus he defineth in an other place. Since that ye beleeued the Gospel, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spitite of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for the redemption of the possession purchased. Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesu, and of your charitie toward the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is laide vp for you in heauen, whereof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospel. Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospel to the partaking of the glorie of our Lord Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called both the word of saluation, and the power of God to saue the faithfull, & the kingdom of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Gospel be spirituall, and openeth the entrie to the possession of an incorruptible life: let vs not think that they to whom it was promised and declared, did passe ouer and neglect the care of their soule, and lie dullie like beasts in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here cauil that the promises which are sealed in the lawe and the Prophets, concerning the Gospel, were ordeined for the new people. For within a litle after that which he spake of the gospel promised in the law, he addeth, that all the things that the law containeth are without doubt properly directed to them that are vnder the lawe. I graunt in deede it is in an other argument. But he was not so forgetful, that when he had once saide all the things which the law conteineth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a few verses before he had affirmed of the gospel promised in the law. Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the old Testament chiefely tended to the life to come, when he saith, that vnder it are contained the promises of the Gospel.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stoode vpon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the verie preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are iustified by the fatherly kindnesse of God, without their owne deseruing, & the whole summe thereof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whome wee heare that the couenant of the Gospell was made, whereof Christ is the onely foundation? Who dare make them strangers from the benefit of free saluation, to whome we heare that the doctrine of the righteousnesse of faith was ministred? But, that we dispute not long of an euident matter, we haue a notable sentence of ỹ Lorde. Abraham reioyced that he might see my day, hee sawe it and was glad. And the same thing which Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was vniuersall in the faithfull people, when he saith, that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, & for euer. For he speaketh not there onely of the eternall godhead of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the blessed Virgin and Zacharie in their songs, doe say, that the saluation reuealed in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in olde time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lord in giuing his Christ, discharged his old othe, it cannot be saide but that the ende thereof was alway in Christ an euerlasting life.

The same mercie by vertue of the same mediator saued the fathers vvhich saueth vs.

5 Yea, and the Apostle doth make the Israelites equal with vs, not only in the grace of the couenant, but also in signification of sacramentes. For meaning by examples of punishmentes, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the old time, to make the Corinthians afraid, that they shoulde not runne into the like offences, hee beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why we should challenge any prerogatiue vnto our selues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they susteined, forasmuch as the Lorde did not onely graunt vnto them the same benefites, but he hath gloriously set foorth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if hee should haue sayde: If yee trust that yee be out of perill, because both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye daily receiue, haue excellent promises, and in the meane time despising the goodnes of God, ye are licentiously wanton: Knowe ye, that the Iewes also were not without such sacraments, against whome yet the Lorde did most seuerely put his iudgements in execution. They were baptised in passing ouer the Sea, and in the cloudes wherewith they were defended from the burning heat of the Sunne. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion answereth to our spirituall Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument could not proceede, which meaneth here to haue this taken away from the Christians, ỹ they thinke that they excell the Iewes by the prerogatiue of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subiect to this cauillation: that they did eate the same spirituall meate that we eate, and dronke the same

Equalitie betweene the fathers and vs in the thing signified both by their and our sacraments.

spiritual drinke, which he expoundeth to be Christ.

The wordes of Christ in saying: Your fathers did eate Manna and are dead: do not contradict the Apostle which saith: They did eat the same spirituall meat that we eat. For they vnto whome Christ speaketh gaue him occasion not to touch the mysterie but only the carnall vse of their Manna.

6 To ouerthrowe this sentence of Paul, they obiect that which Christ saith: Your fathers did eat Manna in the wildernesse, and are dead: he that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer. Which two places are verie easily made to agree together. The Lorde, because he then talked to hearers that sought onely to be filled with foode of their bellie, but cared not for ỳ meat of the soule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacitie, but specially he frameth the comparison of Manna and of his bodie according to their sense. They required that he, to get himselfe some credite, woulde approue his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the Wilderneſſe, when he obteined Manna from heauen. But in Manna they conceiued nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they pearced not to that higher mysterie which Paul hath respect vnto Christ therefore, to shewe howe much greater a benefite they ought to looke for at his hand, than that which they reported that Moses did bestowe vpon their fathers, frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, & worthie to be remembred, that the Lord by Moses ministred foode from heauen to his people, to sustaine them for a small time, that they should not perish for hunger in the wildernesse: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meat that giueth immortalitie. We see why the Lord passed ouer that thing which was principall in Manna, and spake only of the baſest profit of it: euen because the Iewes as it were of purpose to reproche him, did cast Moses in his teeth, which succoured the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he aunswered that he is the minister of a much higher grace, in comparison whereof, the carnal feeding of the people, which alone they so much estemed, ought of right to be nothing regarded. But Paul, because he knewe that the Lorde when hee raigned Manna from heauen, did not onely poure it downe for the feeding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickening that is had in Christ, did not neglect that part that was most worthie of consideration. Wherefore it certainly and cleerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heauenly life, which nowe the Lorde vouchsafeth to graunt vnto vs, were not only communicated vnto the Iewes, but also sealed with verie spirituall Sacramentes. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Faustus the Manichee.

Sith the fathers were enlightened & coupled vnto God by the seede of that worde which is immortall, it sheweth that they had the benefit of immortalitie & eternall life.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue testimonies alledged vnto them out of the law & the Prophetes, whereby they may perceiue that the spirituall couenant was common also to the fathers, as wee heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also follow that desire, and so much the more willingly, because by that meane the aduersaries shal bee more surely conuinced, so that they shall haue afterward no way to dallie. And I wil begin at ỳ proofe, which although I know that the Anabaptistes pride will thinke verie fonde and in a manner to be laughed at, yet shall much auaile with such readers as are willing to learne and haue their sound wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the worde of God, that whome so euer God vouchsaueth to bee partakers thereof, it quickeneth their soules. For this saying of Peter hath alwaye beene of force, that that it is the incorruptible seede which abideth for euer, as also he gathereth out of the words of Esay. Now sith God in the olde time bound ✝ Iewes vnto him with this holy bond, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced the worde, which should ioyne them nigher to God, I take it for the manner of cõmunicating it: not that general maner, which is powred abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the world, which although it do quicken all things, euery one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doeth not deliuer them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this special maner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a manner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the word, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaued vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortal kingdome of God. For it was a sound partaking of God, which cannot be without the benefite of eternall life. Esa.40.6.

8 But if this seeme somewhat entangled: goe to, let vs come to the verie forme of the couenant, which shall not onely satisfie sober wits, but also shal sufficiently conuince their ignorance that bend themselues to speak against it. For God did alwayes thus couenant with his seruants: I will be to you a God, and yee shalbe to mee a people. In which wordes the Prophets themselues are wont to expounde, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For Dauid doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the Lord: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but because hee deliuereth them from death, he preserueth them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternal mercie, whom he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophetes, Thou art our God, wee shall not die: The Lorde is our king, our lawmaker, hee shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israel, because thou art saued in the Lord God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needelesse, this admonition is founde eche where in the Prophets, that wee shall want nothing toward all abundance of good things, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lorde bee our God. And rightfully: For if his face so soone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation, to what man shall hee openly shewe himselfe for his God, but that he will also open to him his treasure of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the middest of vs: as hee testified by Moses. But such presence cannot be obteined, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spirituall life plaine ynough in these wordes: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would bee a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousnesse remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring euerlasting saluation with it. The forme of the couenant of God with the fathers promising to be their God, proueth that eternall life was promised them. Leui.26.12. Psal.144.15. Psal.33.12. Abac.1.12. Esay.33.21. Deu.33.29. Leui.26.12. Exod.6.7.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifie that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so alway: to the ende that their hope not contented with present benefites, shoulde bee extended to eternitie. God in promising the fathers to be their God in time to come, and to continue his mercie to their children, likewise in affirming himselfe to be the God of the dead gaue the liuing plaine hope of endlesse life.

And many sayings do shewe, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not only in present euils, but also for the time to come, do comfort themselues with this, that God will neuer faile them. Now as concerning the second part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of God to bee prolonged vnto them beyond the bounds of this life, in saying: I wil be the God of your seede after you. For if he minded to declare his good wil toward them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his fauour not faile toward themselues. For God is not like vnto men, which doe therefore carie their loue to their friends children, because their power is interrupted by death, so y they can not employ their friendly deings vpon them to whome they did beare good wil. But God, whose bountifulnes is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the verie dead the frute of the mercie, which for their sake hee poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lordes wil was by a notable proofe to set forth vnto them the greatnes and flowing plentie of his goodnes, which they should feele after death, whē he described it to be such as should flowe ouer into al their posteritie. And the truth of this promise y Lord did then seale, & as it were brought foorth the fulfilling of it, when he named himself the God of Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, long after their death. For, what had it not bin a fond naming, if they had vtterly perished? For then had it bin all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Euangelists rehearse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driuen to a straite, that they coulde not denie that Moses did testifie the resurrection of the dead, for that they had learned by Moses, that all the Saints were in his hand. Whereupon it was easie to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whom he that is the iudge of life and death had receiued into his safegard, custodie, & protection.

The estate of Adam, Abel, and Noe declareth that they had an eye to a better then this present life.

10 Nowe (which is the principall point whereupon this controuersie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithfull themselues haue not bene so instructed of the Lord, that they perceiued that they should haue a better life elsewhere, and so neglecting this life, had an eye to the other. First the state of life that was enioyned them by God, was a continuall exercise, whereby they might be put in mind, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were onely in this life. Adam, most vnhappie, euen with only remembrance of the happinesse that he had lost, did with painfull labors hardly susteine his needinesse, and that he shoulde not be pressed with the curse of God, in the only labours of his hands, euen there receiued hee extreme sorrowe of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had left aliue, whose sight he worthily detested and abhorred. Abel cruelly murthered in the verie floure of his age, became an example of the wretchednes of men. Noe, while the whole world carelessly liued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great wearines in building the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he should haue dyed an hundred deathes. For beside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne moneths, there is nothing more vnpleasant than to be holden so long in maner drowned in dung of beastes. When he had passed

ouer so great difficulties, he fell into newe matter of greefe, hee sawe himselfe scorned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whom by the great benefite of God he had receiued safe from the generall flood. Gen. 12. 4.

None more miserable than Abraham, if his condition in this life only be respected.

11 Abraham in deede may be one alone to be compared with an hundred thousand, if wee consider his faith, which is set foorth vnto vs for the best rule of beleeuing, of whose kinred wee must be accounted, that wee may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the smallest corner among them? but he cannot be throwen downe out of the number, no not from the most honourable degree, but that the whole Church must be destroyed. Now as touching the experiēces of his life: When he was first called by the commaundement of God, he was pucked away from his countrey, his parentes and his friendes, in whome men thinke to bee the chiefe sweetenesse of life: euen as if God of determinate purpose meant to spoyle him of all the pleasures of life. So soone as hee came into the lande where he was commaunded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine. Thither he fledd for succour, where to saue himselfe, hee was compelled to deliuer out his wife to be abused, which wee knowe not whether it were not more bitter to him than many deathes. When hee was returned into the lande of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that lande, wherein a man must so oft be hungrie, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewithall hee was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that hee must needes redeeme his life with the losse of his wife, while manie yeares long he wandred vncertainly hither and thither, hee was compelled by the continuall brawlinges of his seruauntes to put away his nephewe, whome he loued as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt he did no otherwise take than if hee had suffered the cutting off of one of his limmes. A little after, hee heard that hee was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whither soeuer he went, hee founde neighbours outragiously barbarous, which would not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the welles that himselfe had digged with great labour. For hee would not haue redeemed the vse of them at the hand of King Gerar, if hee had not first beene forbidden. Gen. 12. 13.

Nowe when he came to olde age, hee sawe the thing which is the most vnpleasant and bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismael, whose birth yet he paid deere for, when hee was wearied with the brawling of Sara, as if hee in maintaining the stubbornesse of his bondwoman were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his housholde. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismael must, as forsaken, be cruelly cast out of doores. When onely Isaac was left, in whome the wearied age of the fillie good man might rest, within a little after he was commaunded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had died of any sickenesse, who woulde not haue thought the old man most miserable, ỹ had a sonne giuen him in mockage, for whom his grief of want of childrē should be doubled? If he had beene slaine by some stranger, the vnhappinesse of the thing woulde haue much encreased his miserie. But this passeth al examples of miserie, to haue him slaine with his fathers owne hande. Finally, hee was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man woulde in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he could finde none more fit than this of Abraham. And let no man obiect that hee was not altogether vnhappie, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempests. For we cannot say that he liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painfully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enioyeth present good things.

The liues of Isaac and Iacob especially, howe farre from outward happines?

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euils, yet scarce euer tooke any taste of sweetenesse He also felt the same vexations, that do not suffer a man to be blessed in the earth. Famine chaced him out of the lande of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that hee was faine to striue for his water: at home in his owne house, hee suffred much troublesomnesse by his childrens wiues, he was greeued with disagreements of his sonnes, and coulde not remedie that so great a mischeefe, but by the banishment of him whome he had blessed. But as for Iacob, he is nothing elle but a notable example of extreeme infelicitie. Hee passed his childhood most vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrours of his elder brother, to which at length hee was compelled to giue place. When hee was fledde from his parentes and his native countrie, beside that it was a greeuous thing to liue in banishment, he was nothing more kindly or gently receceiued of his vncle Laban. Then it sufficed not that hee had serued seuen yeare a harde and cruell seruice, but that also must bee by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wiues sake hee was driuen into newe seruice, where he was all the day fried with heate of the sunne, & all the night lay waking and pained with frost and colde, as himselfe complained. While he by the space of twentie yeares suffred so hard a life, hee was dayly vexed with newe iniuries of his father in lawe. Neither was hee quiet in his owne house, seeing it diuided and in a manner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enuie of his wiues. When he was commanded to returne into his countrie, he was compelled to watch an aduantage to take his iourney, much like a shamefull running away: and yet coulde hee not so escape the vniust dealing of his Father in lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his iourney. Then fell he into a much more cruell distresse. For when hee came neere to his brother, hee had so many deathes before his eyes, as might bee prepared by a cruell man and a bent enemie. So was hee aboue measure tormented and as it were drawen in sunder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers comming, when he came once in his sight, hee fell downe as halfe dead at his feete, vntill he founde him more fauourable than he durst haue hoped. Beside that, at his first entrie into the lande, he lost Rachel his dearely beloued wife. Afterward he heard worde that the sonne which he had by her, & whome therefore he loued aboue the rest, was torne with wilde beastes: by whose death how great greefe he cõceiued, he himself declared in this that after long weeping hee obstinately stopped vp all waies whereby comfort might come to him, leauing himselfe nothing, but to goe down to his sonne wayling into the graue. In the meane time howe great causes of griefe, waiting and wearinesse were the rauishment and deflouring of his daughter, & the boldnesse of his sonnes in reuenging it, which not onely made him to bee abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that countrey, but also procured him most present peril of vtter destruction? Then followed that horrible outragious offence of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as there could not chaunce a more greeuous. For whereas the defiling of a mans wife is reckoned among the highest ill fortunes: what is to be said of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a little while after, his house is spotted with another vnnaturall adulterie: so that so many shames might well breake a heart, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Neere before the ende of this life, while he sought to prouide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he was stricken with tydings of a newe misfortune, vnderstanding that another of his sonnes was kept in prison, for recouering of whome he was compelled to leaue to the rest Beniamin his onely darling.

Who can thinke, that in such a heap of mischiefes he had any one moment giuen him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the best witnesse of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his dayes were short & euill vpon the earth. Nowe truely hee that declareth that hee hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt the prosperitie which the Lord had promised him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindly and vnthankfully weigh the grace of God, or he truely professed that he had bin miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that hee had not his hope fastened vpon earthly things.

Gen. 47. 9.

13 If these holy fathers looked for (as vndoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hand of God, truely they both thought and sawe it to be another maner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doeth shewe excellently wel: Abraham (saith he) direct by faith in the lande of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with Isaac & Iacob parteners with him of the same inheritance, for they looked for a citie set vppon a good foundation, the maker and builder whereof is God, all these are dead in faith, not receiuing the things promised, but looking at them a farre off, and beleeuing and confessing that they were gestes and straungers vpon ȳ land. Whereby they declare that they sought for a countrie, & if they had beene moued with desire of that land from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they sought for a better, that is the heauenly countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, forasmuch as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bin duller than blockes, to followe promises so earnestly, whereof there appeared no hope in earth, vnlesse they had looked for the fulfilling of them elsewhere. But this he chiefely enforceth, & that not without good reason, that they called this life a iourney from home, euen as Moses reporteth. For if they were straungers & foreners in the land of Chanaan, where is the Lordes promise, whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainly therfore, that the

Gen 47. 9.

Lordes promise, concerning the possession thereof, had a urther respect. Wherefore they purchased not one foote in the land of Chanaan, but for buriall, whereby they testified, that they did not hope that they shoulde receiue the fruite of the promise til after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that hee compelled his sonne Ioseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, when they were long before fallen into powder, to be remoued thither.

The righteous of old did accompt the end of this life to be the beginning of a better.

14 Finally, it appeareth plainly, that in all the trauailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose should Iacob haue so much desired, and with so great danger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a manner to be cast off from being his child: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a higher blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by ỹ words which he spake among his last breathings: Lord, I will looke for thy saluation. What saluation could hee haue looked for, when he sawe that he laie readie to giue vp the Ghost, vnlesse hee had seene in death the beginning of a new life? But what dispute we of the holy ones & children of God, when euen he was not without a tast of such vnderstanding, which otherwise was enemie to the truth? For what meant Balaam when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my last times be like vnto theirs? but that he meant the same thing that Dauid afterward vttered, that the death of the Saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, is verie euil? If the furthest bound & end were in death, there could in it be noted no difference betweene the righteous & vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diuersitie of the estates that after death shall befall to them both.

The hope which Dauid had of immortalitie.

15 We are not yet come beyond Moses, Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnall people to worship God by the fruitfulnesse of the ground and plentie of al things. And yet (vnlesse a man wil flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall couenant. But if we come downe to the Prophets, there with most full brightnesse both the life euerlasting and the kingdom of Christ doe vtter themselues. And first of al Dauid, which as he was before the other in time, so according to the order of Gods distribution, he shewed the heauenly mysteries in shadowes more darkely than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie directeth he al his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forreiner & stranger, as all my fathers were. Euerie liuing man is vanitie, euery one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lorde? euen to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessing that in the earth there is nothing sound or stedfast, keepeth stil a stedfastnesse of hope in God, considereth his felicitie laid vp in another place. To such consideration is hee wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as hee meaneth to comfort them truely. For in another place after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitorie & vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: but the mercie of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whereunto is that which is in the hundred and second Psalm. At the Beginning Lord thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the workes of thy handes. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparel, but thou remaine the self same. & thy yeares shall not faile: the sonnes of thy seruants shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be stablished before thee. If the godlie ceasse not for the decaie of heauen and earth to be stablished before the Lorde, it followeth that their saluation is ioyned with the eternitie of God. But that hope cannot stande at all, vnlesse it rest vpon the promise that is set forth in Esaye: The heauens (saieth the Lord) shal vanish away like smoke, the earth shalbe worne out like a garment, & the inhabitantes of it shal perish like those things: But my saluation shalbe for euer, and my righteousnes shal not faile: where euerlastingnes is giuen to righteonsnes and saluation, not in respect that they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men. Psal.101.19. Esa.51.6.

16 Neither maie wee otherwise take those thinges, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous successe of the faithful, but to apply them to the open shewing of the heauenly glory. As these sayings: The Lord keepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliuer them from the hande of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and ioy to the vpright in heart. The righteousnes of the godly man abideth for euer: his horne shalbe exalted in glorie, the desire of the sinner shall perishe. Againe: but the righteous shall confesse vnto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous shalbe in eternal remembrance. Againe: the Lord shall redeeme the soules of his seruantes. For the Lorde oftentimes leaueth his seruants to the lust of the wicked, not onely to be vexed, but also to be torne in peeces and destroyed: he suffereth the good to lie languishing in darkenes and filth, while the wicked do in a maner shine among the stars. And he doth not so chere thē with the brightnes of his countenance, that they enioy long continuing gladnes. Wherfore euen he also hideth not, that if the faithful fasten their eies vpon the present state of things, they shalbe striken with a sore temptation, as though there were no fauour or reward of innocency with God. So much doth wickednes for ỹ most part prosper & florish, while the company of the godly is oppressed with shame, pouerty, contempt & al kindes of crosses. It wāteth but litle (saith he) that my foote slipped not, and my steppes fell not abroad, while the fortune of fooles grieueth mee, & while I see the prosperity of the wicked. At length after rehearsal of it he concludeth: I bent my thought, if I could vnderstād these things. But it is a torment to my spirite, til I enter into the sanctuarie of the Lord, and vnderstand the last end of them. What Dauid speaketh of the faithful mans prosperous successe, it hath relation to future blessednes in the world to come. Psal.97.10. Psa.112.7.9. Psa.140.12. Psa.112.6. Psa.34.23. Psa.73.17.

17 Let vs therfore learne yet by this cōfession of Dauid, that the holy fathers vnder the old testament were not ignorāt, how seldome or neuer God doth in this world performe to his seruantes those things that he promiseth thē, & that therfore they did lift vp their minds to Gods sanctuary, wherein they had that laid vp in store, which appeareth not in the shadowe of this present life. That was the last iudgement of God, which when they coulde not see with eies, they were content to vnderstand by faith. Trusting vpon which affiance, whatsoeuer happened in the world, yet they doubted not a The expectation which Dauid had of a iudgement to come & felicitie to follow it.

time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings do witnesse, I wil behold the face of God in righteousnes: I wil be satisfied with thy countenance. Againe: I as a greene Oliue tree in the house of the Lord. Againe, The righteous shall florish as a Date tree, & shall spred in branches like the Ceder of Libanus, being planted in the house of the Lord, they shall florish in the Palaces of our God: They shal still beare fruite, they shalbe fat & greene in their old age. When he had said a litle before: How deepe are thy thoughts? O Lorde, while the wicked doe florish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for euer. Where is that faire shewe & beautie of the faithful, but when the face of this worlde shalbe turned inward by disclosing of the kindome of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternitie, they despised the hardnes enduring but a moment of present miseries, & boldly burst foorth into these words: Thou shalt not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw down ỹ wicked headlong into the pit of destruction. Where is in this world the pit of eternal destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Among whose felicities, this is also reckened in another place, that they close vp the ende of their life in a moment without long languishing. Where is that so great stedfastnes of the holy ones, whom Dauid himself echwhere complaineth, not only to be shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, & vtterly broken in peeces? Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the worlde beareth, which is vnstable & more vnstedfast than the ebbing & flowing of tides, but what the Lord wil do, when he shal one day fit for the eternal setling of heauen & earth. As in another place he excellently wel describeth it: The fooliſh do stay vpon their welthines, and are poude because of their great riches. And yet no man, though he flouriſh in neuer so great dignitie, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can paye to God the price of his ransome, but whereas they see that both the wise do die, & that the wicked also & fooles do perish & leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shal abide for euer, & their dwellings to the end of ages, & they aduaunce their names vpon the earth, but man shall not continue in honor: he shalbe like to the beastes that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their posteritie do greedily follow. They shall be placed like a flocke in Hell, & death shall haue rule ouer them. When the light ariseth, the vpright shal haue dominion ouer them, the beautie of them shal perish, Hell is their dwelling house. First, this laughing to scorne of the fooliſh for that they rest on the slipperie & rolling good things of ỹ worlde, doth shew that the wise must seeke a farre other felicitie. But there he more euidently discloseth the mysterie of the resurrection, where after the destruction & extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shal we call that, but the reueiling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

The faithfull could not haue cõforted themselues, as both Dauid and Samuel did, with the momentanie shortnes of their troubles in the world except they had made a reckening of endlesse rest afterwards.

18 From thence did spring vp that consideration, which the faithful oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miseries and remedie of patience: It is but a moment in the Lordes displeasure, and life in his mercye. Howe did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods kindnes, whereof they ſcarſly felt any litle taſt? If they had ſticked faſt vpon the earth, they could haue found no ſuch thing, but becauſe they loked vpon heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exerciſe his holie ones by the croſſe, but that his mercies, wherin they are gathered together, do laſt the worldes age. Againe, they did foreſee the eternall and neuer ending deſtruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happie for one daie. Whereupon came theſe ſayinges: The remembrance of the righteous ſhalbe in bleſſing, but the name of the wicked ſhall rot. Precious is the death of the Saints in the ſight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked moſt euill. Againe in Samuel: The Lorde ſhall keepe the feete of the holie, & the wicked ſhalbe put to ſilence in darkenes. Which doe declare that they wel knew, that howſoeuer the holie were diuerſly caried about, yet their laſt end is life and ſaluation: and that the proſperity of the wicked is a pleaſant way, whereby they by litle and litle ſlide forwarde into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called the death of ſuch, the deſtruction of the vncircumciſed, as of them from whom the hope of the reſurrection was cut away. Wherfore Dauid could not deuiſe a more grieuous curſe than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and not bee written with the righteous.

19 But aboue all other, notable is that ſaying of Iob: I know that my redeemer liueth, and in the laſt day I ſhall riſe againe out of the earth, and in my fleſh I ſhal ſee God my ſauiour. This hope is laid vp in my boſome. Some that haue a minde to make a ſhew of their ſharpe wit, doe cauill that this is not to be vnderſtanded of the laſt reſurrection, but of the firſt day that Iob looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we grant them in part, yet ſhall we enforce them to confeſſe whether they wil or no, that Iob could not haue come to that largeneſſe of hope, if he had reſted his thought vppon the earth. Therefore we muſt needes confeſſe, that he lifted vp his eies to the immortalitie to come, which ſawe, that his redeemer woulde be preſent with him, euen lying in his graue. For to them that think only of this preſent life, death is their vttermoſt deſperation: which very death coulde not put off Iobs hope. Yea though he kil me (ſaid he) neuertheles I will ſtill hope in him. And let no trifler here carp againſt me and ſay, that theſe were the ſayinges but of a few, whereby is not proued ỹ ſuch doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by & by anſwere him, that theſe fewe did not in theſe ſayings vtter any ſecret wiſedome, whereunto onlie certaine excellent wits were ſeuerally and priuately ſuffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghoſt appointed teachers of ỹ people, ſo they openly publiſhed thoſe myſteries of God, that were to be vniuerſally learned, and ought to be the principles of the cõmon religion among the people. Therfore whẽ we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghoſt, wherein he ſpake of the ſpirituall life ſo clearly & plainely in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of vntolerable ſtubbornes to ſend them away onelie to the fleſhlie couenant, wherin is mention made of nothing, but earth and earthly wealthineſſe.

Iobs hope of life in death. Neither vvas this in him, or the like in others the ſpeciall perſvvaſion onlie of ſome, but the generall doctrine deliuered all men to beleeue.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophetes, there we may freely walke as in our owne field. For if it were not hard for vs to get the vpper hande in Dauid, Iob, and Samuel, heere it ſhall bee muche more eaſie. For God kept this this distribution and order in disposing the couenãt of his mercy, that howe much the neerer it drew on in processe of time to the ful performance therof, with so much greater encreasementes of reuelation hee did day by daye more brightlie shewe it. Therefore at the beginning when the first promise of saluation was made vnto Adam, there glistered out but as it were small sparkles of it. After, hauing more added vnto it, a greater largenesse of light began to be put forth: which from thence forth brake out more and more, and displaied her brightnesse farther abroade, till at length all the cloudes were driuen away, and Christ the sonne of righteousnes fully lightened the whole worlde. We neede not therefore to feare that we faile of testimonies of the Prophets, if we seeke them to proue our cause, but because I see that there will arise a huge deale of matter, wherupon I should be constrained of necessitie to tary longer than the proportion of my purpose may beare, for it woulde so growe to a worke of a great volume, and also because I haue alreadie, by those thinges that I haue saide before, made plaine the way, euen for a reader of meane capacity, so as he may goe forward without stumbling: therefore I will at this present abstaine from long tediousnesse: which to doe is no lesse necessarie: but giuing the readers warning before hande, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that wee haue first giuen them in their hande. That is, that so oft as the Prophets speake of the blessednesse of the faithfull people, whereof scarcely the least steppes are seene in this present life, they may resort to this distinction: that the Prophetes the better to expresse the goodnesse of God, did as in a shadowe expresse it to the people by temporall benefites, as by certaine rough drawing of the portraiture thereof: but that the perfect image, that they haue painted therof, was such as might rauish mens minds out of the earth, and out of the elementes of this worlde, and of the age that shal perish, and of necessitie raise it vp to the considering of the felicitie of the life that is to come and spirituall.

The power which God hath to giue life shewed by a vision of breath and liuelinesse restored to a fielde full of dead bones.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being caried away to Babylon, saw their scattering abroade to be like vnto death, they could hardly be remoued from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophecied to their restitution: because they reckoned it euen alone as if he had tolde them that rotten carcases should bee restored againe to life. The Lorde to shewe, that euen the same difficultie could not stop him from bringing his benefit to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a field full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onelie power of his word hee restored breath and liuelinesse. The vision in deede serued to correct the incredulitie at that present time: but in the meane season he did put the Iewes in minde how far the power of the Lord extended beyond the accoũt of the people, which so easilie quickened with his onelie becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherfore you shall compare that with an other saying of Esaie. The dead shall rise, my carcase, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and reioyce that dwell in the dust, because the deaw of the geene field is thy deaw, & thou shalt plucke down the land of the Giantes into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tents: shut thy dores vpon thee: hide thee a litle while, till my displeasure passe ouer. For behold behold, the Lord shal go out of his place, to visit the iniquitie of the dweller vpon the earth against him, and the earth shal shew foorth her blood, & shal no longer hide her slaine.

Esa. 26. 19.

22 Albeit a man should doe sondlie, that would goe about to draw al to such a rule. For there be some places that without anie couering doe shewe the immortalitie to come, that is prepared for the faithful in the kingdome of God, of which sort we haue recited some, & of like sort are the most parte of the rest, speciallie these two, the one in Esaie. As a new heauen, & a newe earth which I make to stand before me, so shall your seede stand, and there shalbe moneth of moneth, and Sabbat of Sabbat: al flesh shall come to worship before my face, saith the Lorde. And they shall go out & see the dead carcases of the men that haue offended against mee, that their worme shal not die, and their fire shal not bee quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall rise vp Michael the great prince, that standeth for the sonnes of his people, and there shal come a time of distresse, such as was nor since nations first began to be, and then shall al thy people be saued that shall bee found written in thy booke. And of those that sleep in the dust of the earth, there shal awake some to eternal life, and some to euerlasting shame.

Immortalitie to come expresly spoken of by Esaie & Daniel.

Dan. 12. 1.

23 Now, as for prouing the other two points that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their couenant, & that they reposed in him al their affiance of blessing, I will not trauaile therein at all, because they haue both lesse controuersie & more plainnesse. Let vs therefore boldely determine this, which by no engines of the diuel may be remoued, that the old testament, or couenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also conteined the promise of the spiritual and eternal life: the expectation wherof must needs haue bene imprinted in al their minds that truely consented to the couenant. But let vs put farre away this mad & pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Iewes nothing else, or ỹ the Iewes sought nothing els but filling of their belly, delights of the flesh, florishing wealth, outwarde power, fruitfulnesse of children, & whatsoeuer a natural man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdome of heauen to his, but where they shal rest with Abraham, Isaac, & Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Iewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospel, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the couenant, which the Lord had in the old time made with his people. And, that the same should not be witnessed with words only, the Lord also approued it by deede. For in the verie moment ỹ he rose againe, he vouchsafed to haue many of the holye men to rise againe in company with him, & made them to be seene in the Citie: so giuing an assured token, that whatsoeuer he did & suffred for the purchasing of eternal saluation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithful of the old testament, thn vnto vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued with ỹ same spirite of faith, whereby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparcle of immortalitie, whereupon it is also in another place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwel in them, how dare we take from them the inheritance of life? Wherby it is so much the more maruel, ỹ in the old time the Sadduces fel to such grosseneſſe of errour, that they denied both the reſurrection & alſo the ſubſtance of ſoules, both which points they ſawe ſealed with ſo cleare teſtimonies of Scripture. And no leſſe to be marueiled at, euen at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdome of Chriſt, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they ſhould haue that puniſhment for refuſing the Goſpel. For ſo it behoued, by the iuſt iudgemẽt of God, to ſtrike thoſe mindes with blindnes, which in refuſing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themſelues into darkeneſſe. Therefore they read and continually turne ouer Moſes, but they are ſtopped with a veile ſet between them and him, that they cannot ſee the light that ſhineth in his countenance. And ſo ſhal it remaine couered & hidden from them, til he be turned to Chriſt, from whom now they trauaile to lead and draw him away ſo much as in them lieth.

2. Cor. 3. 14.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the difference of the one Teſtament from the other.

The firſt differẽce of the old & newe Teſtament. God did in that by the ſhadowe of earthly things, & in this doth plainly direct vnto heauen.

WHat then? wilt thou ſay: ſhall there be no difference left between the old Teſtament and the Newe? & to what purpoſe ſerue al thoſe places of Scripture, where they are compared one againſt the other, as things moſte contrarie? I do willingly allowe thoſe differences that are rehearſed in the Scripture: but ſo that they nothing hinder the vnitie alreadie ſtabliſhed, as it ſhalbe plaine to ſee when wee ſhall haue entreated of them in order. Thoſe differences are (as farre as euer I coulde marke or can remember) chiefely foure in number, to the which if you liſt to adioyne the fifth, I am not againſt it. I ſay and truſt to prooue that they are all ſuche as rather belong to the manner of miniſtration, than to the ſubſtance of them. And by this meane they ſhall nothing hinder, but that the promiſes of both the olde and newe Teſtament may remaine all one, and all one foundation of the ſame promiſes, Chriſt. Nowe the firſt difference is, that although, euen in the old time alſo, the Lords will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raiſed vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nouriſhed in hope thereof, he gaue it to be ſeene or rather to be taſted of, vnder earthlie benefites: but nowe hauing reuealed the grace of the life to come, by the Goſpel, hee more cleerely and plainly directeth our mindes the ſtreight way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferior manner of exerciſing which he vſed with the Iſraelites. They that marke not this purpoſe of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any higher thã to the good things promiſed to the body. They ſo oftẽ heare the land of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather onely reward for the keepers of Gods lawe. They heare that God threateneth nothing more ſeuerely to the traſgreſſors of the ſame lawe, than that they ſhalbe driuen out of the poſſeſſion of the ſame land, & ſcattered abroade into ſtrange regions. They ſee ẏ in a maner to this effect come all the bleſſings & curſes that are pronoũced by Moſes. Hereby they do vndoubtedly determine, that the Iewes not for their owne ſakes, but for others, were ſeuered from other nations, ẏ is, that the Church of Chriſt might haue an image, in whoſe outward forme

she might see examples of spirituall things. But sith the Scripture doth sometimes shewe, that God himselfe directed al the earthly benefites that he did for them to this ende, that so he might leade them by the hand to the hope of heauenly benefits: it was too much vnskilfulnes, I wil not say blockishnes, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our controuersie with this sort of men is this, that they teach that the possession of ỹ land of Chanaan was to the Israelites their chiefe and last blessednes, & that to vs after the reuealing of Christ, it doth but figuratiuely signifie the heauenly inheritance. On the other side we affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enioyed, as in a looking glasse beholde the inheritance to come, which they beleeued to be prepared for them in heauen.

2 That shal better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galathians. He compareth the nation of the Iewes to an heire, within age, which being not yet able to gouerne himselfe, followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolemaister, to whose custodie he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothing hindreth but that it may also very fitly serue to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacitie to enter vpon and vse. The same Church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childishe. Therefore the Lorde kept them vnder this schooling, that he gaue them not the spirituall promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed with earthly promises. Therfore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, and their posteritie vnto hope of immortalitie, he promised them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritãce: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they should exercise and confirme themselues in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceiued, there was giuen them a higher promise to testifie that that land was not the highest benefit of God. So Abraham was not suffred to lie slouthful in the promise receiued of the lãd, but his mind was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this saide vnto him: I am thy protector, and thy reward exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the end of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not account vpon a transitorie & slipperie rewarde in the elements of this world, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adioyneth the promise of the lande to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good wil of God, and a figure of the heauenly inheritance. And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne saings do declare. So Dauid riseth vpward from temporall blessinges, to that same highest & last blessing, My heart (saith hee) & my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, the Lord is the parte of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that saueſt mine heritage for me. Againe, I haue cried vnto thee, O Lord, I haue saide, Thou art my hope, my portion in the lande of the liuing. Truely they that dare so speake, doe without doubt professe that with their hope they climbe aboue the worlde, and all the good thinges here present. But the Prophetes doe oft describe this blessednes of the worlde to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstãded. That the godly shall shall possesse the land by inheritance, and the wicked shalbe destroyed out of it. That Hierusalem shall abound with all kind of riches, and Sion ouerflow with plentie of all things. All which wee see, cannot properly be spoken of the land of our wayfaring, or the earthly Hierusalem, but of the true country of the faithfull, and that heauenly citie wherein the Lord hath commaunded blessing and life for euer.

Gods figuring of heauenly by earthlie blessednes in the old lavv is the cause, vvhy then his temporal benefits doe seeme to haue beene more suveete to the righteous and his punishments more greeuous then nowv.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy men in time of the olde testament, did esteeme the mortal life & the blessings thereof more than is now meete to do. For although they knewe well that they should not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet when they called to minde, what markes of his grace the Lord had pointed therein, to exercise them according to the small rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetnes of it, than if they had considered it by it self. But as the Lord in testifying his good wil toward the faithful, by present good things, did as in shadowe expresse the spirituall felicitie, by such figures and signes: so on the other side hee did in corporall paines shew examples of his iudgement against the reprobate. Therfore, as the benefits of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the vnskilfull do not weye this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betweene the punishments & the rewards, they maruel at so much alteration in God, that in old time was so sodenly readie to take vengeance on euery offence of man with sterne & horrible punishmentes, and now as if he had laid awaye the affection of his old angrines, hee punisheth both much more gentlie & seldomer, yea, & for the same cause they doe almost imagine seueral gods of the old & new testament: which the Manichees did in deede. But we shal easily be deliuered from such doubtes, if wee lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie & set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicitie to come, by temporal benefites, and the greeuousnes of the spirituall death, by corporal paines. Whereby hee deliuered his Testament to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine manner folded vp.

The seconde difference betvveene the tvvo testaments is, that the nevv doth exhibite that foundation of the couenant vvhich the olde did teache thē to expect.

4 Another difference of the olde and newe Testament is saide to be in the figures: for that the old testament did shew only an image in absence of the truth, and a shadow in steed of the body. But the new testament giueth the truth present, and the sound body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly whereseuer the newe testament is in comparison set against the old: but it is more largely entreated of in the Epistle to the Hebrues than any where else. There the Apostle disputeth against them, which though ẏ the obseruation of Moses lawe might not be taken away, but that they should also drawe with them the ruine of all religion. To confute this errour, he vseth that which had bin foresspoken by the Prophet concerning the priesthood of Christ. For whereas there is giuen him an eternall priesthoode, it is certaine, that that priesthood is taken away, wherin new successours were daily put in, one after another. But he proueth ẏ the institution of this new priesthood is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an oth. He after addeth further, ẏ in the same change of the priesthoode, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessary so to be, he proueth by this reason: for that the weakenes of the lawe was such that it could help nothing to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakenes, euen this, that it had certain outward righteousnes of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beastes, it could neither wipe away sins, nor purchase true holinesse. Hee concludeth therefore that there was in it a shadowe of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the thinges themselues: and that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospel. Here is to bee seen, in what point the couenant of the law is compared with the couenant of the Gospel, and the ministerie of Christ with the ministerie of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, thē were there great difference betweene the two testamentes: but sith the point of our case leadeth vs another waye, wee must tend to this ende, to finde out the trueth. Let vs then set forth here the couenant which he hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, whereby it attaineth to be stablished and continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Nowe this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in the lawe ought to giue place to Christ or no. Althogh these ceremonies were indeed only accidents, or verilie additions & things adioined, or (as the people cal them) accessary things to the couenant, yet becausse they were instruments or meanes of the administratiō therof, they beare the name of the couenāt it selfe, as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacraments. Therefore in sum: the old Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of cōfirming the couenant, conteined in ceremonies and sacrifices. The Apostle saith, that becausse in it is nothing perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therfore it behoued that they should be discontinued & abrogate, that place might be giuen to Christ the assurer & mediatour of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchased to the elect, and the transgressiōs blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or if you like it better, thus: That the old testament of the Lord was that which was deliuerd, wrapped vp in the shadowish & effectual obseruations of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, becausse it did but (as it were) hāg in suspēse vntil it might stay vpon a more stedfast & substantiall confirmation: & that then onelye it was made new and eternall, after that it was consecrate & stablished by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gaue at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new testament in his blood: to signifie that then the testament of God attaineth his truth: by which it becommeth new and eternal, when it is sealed with his blood. Mat. 26. 20.

5 Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle saide: that in the schooling of the law, the Iewes were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their young age were to be kept vnder the custodie of a schoolemaister. For it behoued, that ere the sonne of righteousnes was yet risen, there should neither be so great brightnesse of reuelation, nor so great deepe sight of vnderstanding. Therefore God so gaue them in measure ſure the light of his worde, that they ſaw it as yet far off and darkely. Therefore Paul expreſſeth this ſclenderneſſe of vnderſtanding by the tearme of yong age, which the Lordes will was to haue to be exerciſed with the elements of this worlde and with outward obſeruations, as rules of inſtruction for children vntil Chriſt ſhoulde ſhine abroade, by whom it behooued that the knowledge of the faithfull people ſhoulde growe to full age. This diſtinction Chriſt himſelfe meant of, when he ſaide, that the lawe and the Prophetes were vntill Iohn, and that from thence foorth the kingdome of God is preached. What did the law and the Prophetes open to men of their time? euen this, they gaue a taſte of that wiſedome which in time to come ſhould be plainly diſcloſed: and they ſhewed it before as it were twinckling ly ſhining a far off. But when it came to paſſe that Chriſt might be pointed too with the finger, then was the kingdome of God ſet open. For in him are laid abroad the treaſures of al wiſedome and vnderſtanding, whereby we attaine, euen in a manner, into the ſecret cloſets of heauen.

Col.1.9.

The Prophets thẽſelues did not ſo clearely knowe Chriſt, but that euen in them there appeareth a difference betweene thoſe times and theſe.

6 And it maketh not againſt vs, that there can ſcarcely any one be found in the Chriſtian Church, that in excellencie of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophetes excelled in ſuch force of ſpirite, that euen at this day they lighten the whole worlde withall. For our queſtion is not here, what grace the Lorde hath beſtowed vpon a fewe, but what ordinarie diſpoſition he vſed in teaching his people: ſuche as is declared in the Prophetes themſelues, which were endued with peculiar knowledge aboue the reſt. For euen their preaching is darke and encloſed in figures, as of things a farre off. Moreouer howe maruellous knowledge ſoeuer appeared in them aboue other, yet forasmuch as they were driuen of neceſſitie to ſubmitte them to the common childiſh inſtruction of the people, they themſelues alſo were reckoned in the number of children. Finally, there neuer chanced any ſuch cleare ſight to any at ỳ time, but that it did in ſome part ſauour of the darkeneſſe of the time. Wherevpon Chriſt ſaide, Manie kinges and Prophets haue deſired to ſee the things that ye ſee, and haue not ſene them: and to heare the things that yee heare, and haue not heard them. Therfore bleſſed are your eies, becauſe they ſee, and your eares becauſe they heare. And trulie it is meet that the preſence of Chriſt ſhould haue this excellencie of prerogatiue, that from it ſhould ariſe the cleare reuealing of the heauenlie myſteries. And for this purpoſe alſo maketh that, which euen we now alleadged out of the firſt Epiſtle of Peter, that it was opened to them, that their trauel was profitable, principally for our age.

1.Pet.1.12.

The thirde difference betweene the olde couenant and the newe, mẽtioned by the Apoſtle out of Ieremie.

7 Nowe I come to the thirde difference, which is taken out of Ieremie, whoſe wordes are theſe: Beholde the day ſhall come, ſaith the Lorde, and I will make a newe couenaunt with the houſe of Iſrael, and the houſe of Iuda, not according to the couenaunt that I made with your Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hande, to lead them out of the lande of Ægypt, the couenant that they made voide although I ruled ouer them: But this ſhalbe the couenant that I wil make with the houſe of Iſrael: I will put my law in their bowelles, and I will write it in their hearts, and I wilbe mercifull to their iniquitie. And no man ſhal teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they ſhal al know me, frõ the leaſt vnto the moſt. Of which

wordes the Apoſtle tooke occaſion to make this compariſon betweene the lawe and the Goſpell, that hee called the lawe a literall, and the Goſpel a ſpirituall doctrine: the law, he ſaid, was faſhioned out in Tables of ſtone, the Goſpell written in heartes: that the lawe was the preaching of death, the Goſpell the preaching of life: the lawe the preaching of damnation, the Goſpell the preaching of righteouſneſſe: that the lawe is made voyde, that the Goſpell abideth. Sith the Apoſtles purpoſe was but to declare the meaning of the Prophet, it ſhall be ſufficient that wee weigh the wordes of one of them, to attaine the meaning of them both. Abeit, there is ſome vnlikeneſſe between them. For the Apoſtle ſpeaketh more odiouſly of the law thā the Pophet doeth: and that not in ſimple reſpect of the lawe, but becauſe there were certaine naughtie men, hauing a wrong zeale to the lawe, which did with peruerſe loue of the ceremonies, obſcure the brightneſſe of the Goſpel. He diſputeth of the nature of the lawe, according to their error and fooliſh affection. Therefore it ſhal be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, becauſe they doe by compariſon ſet the olde and the newe teſtament, the one againſt the other: doe conſider nothing in the lawe, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example: The law doth commonly in euerie place conteine promiſes of mercie, but becauſe they are borowed from elſewhere, therefore they are not reckoned as parte of the lawe, when the meere nature of the lawe is ſpoken off. The onelie thing they aſcribe vnto it, to commaunde thinges that are right, and to forbid wicked doinges: to promiſe rewarde to the followers of righteouſnes, and to threaten puniſhment to the tranſgreſſors: but in the meane time neither to change nor amend the peruerſneſſe of heart, that is naturally in all men. 1.Cor.2.6.

8 Now let vs expound the Apoſtles compariſon, one peece after another. The old teſtament is literal, becauſe it was publiſhed without the effectual woorking of the ſpirite: The new is ſpiritual which the Lord hath ſpiritually graué in the hearts of men. Therfore the ſecond diuerſitie is as it were a declaration of the firſt. The old is deadly, becauſe it can do nothing but wrap al mankind within the curſe: The new is the inſtrument of life, becauſe it deliuereth from curſe, and reſtoreth into fauour with God. The olde is the miniſterie of damnation, becauſe it condemneth all Adams children of vnrighteouſneſſe: The new is the miniſtery of righteouſnes, becauſe it reuealeth the mercie of God, by which wee are made righteous. The laſt diuerſitie is to be referred to the ceremonies. Becauſe the olde teſtament had an image of thinges abſent, it behoued that it ſhould in time decay and vaniſh away: but the Goſpell, becauſe it giueth the true bodie indeed, keepeth ſtil a firme and perpetuall ſtedfaſtnes. Ieremie indeed calleth euen the morall lawes, a weake and fraile couenant: but that is for an other reaſon, becauſe by the ſodain falling away of the vnthankful people, it was by & by broken, but foraſmuch as ſuch breaking of it was the fault of the people, it cānot properlie be laid vpō the teſtament. But the ceremonies, foraſmuch as by their owne weakneſſe were diſſolued by the comming of Chriſt, had the cauſe of their weaknes within themſelues. Now, that differēce of the letter & ſpirit is not ſo to be taken, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Iewes without any fruite at all, hauing none of them conuerted vnto him, But it is spoken by waie of comparison, to aduance the aboundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a newe personage, did honorablie sette foorth the preaching of the Gospell. For if wee reckon vp the multitude of these whom the Lorde out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospel regenerate with his spirit, and gathered into the communion of his Church, wee shall saie, that there were verie fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israel, that with affection of minde and entirely from their heart embraced the couenant of the Lord: who yet were verie manie, if they bee reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

The fourth difference, the one held the conscience in thraldome and feare, the other gineth libertie and ioy.

9 Out of the third difference riseth the fourth. For the Scripture calleth the olde Testament, the testament of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the newe testament, the testament of libertie, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and assuredneſse. So saith Paul in the eight to the Romaines. Yee haue not receiued the spirite of bondage againe to feare, but the spirite of adoption, by which wee crie Abba father. Rom.8.15. Hereunto serueth that in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the faithfull are Heb.12.18. not nowe come to the bodilie mount, and to kindled fire, and whirlewinde, darkeneſse and tempest, where nothing can bee hearde or seene but that striketh mens mindes with terrour, insomuch that Moses himselfe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they all besought, that they might not heare: But that wee are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the liuing God, the heauenly Hierusalem. But that which Paul shortly toucheth in the sentence that wee haue alleadged out of the Epistle to the Romaines, hee setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galathians, when he maketh an allegorie of the two sonnes of Abraham, after Gal.4.21. this maner, that Agar the bond woman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Israell receiued the lawe: Sara the free woman is a figure of the heauenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which maie neuer come to the inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the lawe wee are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospell onelie wee are regenerate into freedome. But the summe commeth to this effect that the olde testament did strike into consciences feare and trembling: but by the benefite of the newe Testament it commeth to passe, that they are made ioyfull. The olde did holde consciences bounde vnto the yoke of bondage, by the libertie of the newe they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedome. But if out of the people of Israell they obiect against vs the holie fathers, who sith it is euident, that they were endued with the same spirite that wee are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfe same freedome and ioye. Wee aunswearc, that neyther of both came of the lawe. But that when they felt themselues by the lawe to bee both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with vnquietneſse of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospell, and that therefore it was a peculiar fruite of the newe Testament, that beside the common law of the old testament they were exempted from these euils. Moreouer, ouer, wee will denie that they were so endued with the spirite of freedome and assuredneſſe, that they did not in some part feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howsoeuer they enioyed that prerogatiue which they had obtained by grace of the Gospel, yet were they subiect to the same bondes and burdens of obseruation, that the common people were. Sith therfore they were compelled to the careful keeping of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like vnto bondage, and the hand writinges whereby they confessed themselues guiltie of sinne, did not discharge them from being bonde: it maie rightfully be saide, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while wee haue respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vsed with the people of Israel.

The last three differences are meant of the lawe, seuered from those intermingled promises of grace and mercie, the first including them: vvhereunto Saint Augustine though he seem not vvithstanding is not repugnant. Lib. 3. ad Bonif. cap. 4.

10 The three last comparisons that wee haue recited, are of the lawe and the Gospell. Wherefore in them by the name of the Olde Testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New Testament is meant the Gospell. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckoned vnder ỹ name of the old testamẽt, therein he thought verie well, and meant euen the same thing that we doe nowe teach, for he had regarde to those sayinges of Hieremie and Paul, where the olde testament is seuered from the worde of mercie and grace. And this also he verie aptly adioyneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerate of God, which by faith woorking through loue haue obeyed the commaundementes, doe from the beginning of the world belong to the Newe testament, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthlie and temporall, but spirituall, heauenlie, and eternall good thinges, principallie beleeuing in the Mediator, by whom they doubted not that the spirite was not ministred vnto them, both to doe good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Saintes whome the Scripture rehearseth to haue beene from the beginning of the worlde chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betweene our diuision and Augustines: that ours (according to that saying of Christe: The lawe and the Prophetes were vnto Iohn: from thence foorth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction betweene the cleerenesse of the Gospell, and the darker distribution of the woorde that went before: and Augustine doth onely seuer the weakenesse of the law from the strength of the Gospel. And heere also is to bee noted concerning the holie fathers, that they so liued vnder the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and imbraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindnesse and accursednes: which being contented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindnesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast? than to seek for the cleansing of the soule in outwarde sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though hee were much delighted therewith? For to all these absurdities doe they fall, that Mat. 11. 13.

sticke fast in the obseruations of the law without respect of Christ.

The fift and last differēce betweene the twoo testamentes: the olde was giuen onlie to the Ievve, the newe to all nations.

11 The fifth difference that we maie adde, lieth in this: that vntil the coming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he would keepe seueral the couenāt of his grace. When the highest did distribute the nations, when he deuided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fel to his possession: Iacob the corde of his inheritance. In an other place he thus speaketh to the people: Behold the heauen and earth and al that is in it, are the Lord thy Gods. He cleaued only to thy fathers, he loued them to choose their seede after them, euē your selues out of al nations. Therfore he vouchsafed to graunt the knowledge of his name to that people onelie, as if they only of all men belonged vnto him: he laid his couenant as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with al prerogatiues But (to omit the rest of his benefites, & speak that which only here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his word, that he might be called and counted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to do with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, giue them that which was onlie the remedie, namelie the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israel was then the Lordes sonne that was his dearling, other were strangers: Israel was knowen to him and receiued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darknesse: Israel was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nigh vnto him. But when the fulnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was deliuered indeed, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercie of God enclosed within the boundes of Israel, and peace was preached to thē that were farre off, euen as to them that were neere adioyned, that beeing together reconciled to God, they might grow into one people. Wherefore, now there is no respect of Greeke or Iew, circumcision or vncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whom the nations are giuen for his inheritance, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniuersally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the riuers to the vttermost endes of the world.

The calling of the Gentiles vnder the newe testament spoken off by the prophets, not so dainly proceeded vnto by Christ, by the apostles scarce admitted, vvondred at by the very angels themselues.

12 Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is clearly shewed the excellencie of the new Testament aboue the olde. It had in deed been before testified by many, & most plain oracles of the Prophets, but so as the performance thereof was still differred vnto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ himself did not proceed vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but differred it so long vntil that al the parts of our redemption being perfourmed, and the time of his abasement ended, he receiued of his father a name that is aboue all names: before whom al knees should bow. For which cause when this conueniēce of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the womā of Chanaan, ỳ he was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And he suffred not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these bounds. Go not ye, (saith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor enter into the cities of the Samaritans, but rather go ye to the lost sheepe of the house house of Israell. But howe so euer it was before vttered by so manie testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to beginne it, it seemed so newe and straunge a thing vnto them, that they were afraide of it, as of some monster. Truely verie fearefully and not without sticking at it they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lorde which by so many ages had chosen out Israel from all other nations, shoulde nowe vndoe that choise, as it were sodenlie changing his purpose. It was indeed spoken offafore by prophecies: but they coulde not giue so great heede to the prophecies, as to bee nothing mooued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lord had shewed of the calling of the Genriles that shoulde one day come to passe, were not sufficient to mooue them. For beside this that hee had called verie fewe, hee did after a certaine manner ingraffe them into the household of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as parcell of them: but by this generall calling, the Gentiles were not onelie made equal with the Iewes, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Iewes, that were become deade. And yet all those straungers whom God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made equal with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paul so extol his mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which hee also saith to bee maruellous to the verie Angels. Col. 1. 16.

13 In these foure or fiue poïntes, I thinke I haue well and faithfully set foorth the whole difference of the old and newe Testament, so muche as sufficeth to the simple order of teaching But because many report this varietie in gouerning the Churche, this diuerse manner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be aunswered before that we passe foorth to other thinges. And that may bee done shortly, because the obiections are not so strong that they neede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doeth alway stedfastly agree with himselfe, should suffer so great an alteration, as afterwarde to disalowe the same thing, which hee had before both commaunded and commended. I aunswere that God ought not therefore to be counted mutable, for that he applied diuerse formes to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expediēt for euery one. If the husbandman appoint to his household one sort of businesse in winter, and an other in sommer, shal we therefore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swarueth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continual order of nature? Likewise if a father of a household do instruct, rule and order his children of one sort in childhoode, of another in youth, and of an other in mans state, wee cannot therefore say that hee is fickle and forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore doe wee charge God with reproche of inconstancie, for that he hath seuered the diuersitie of times, with fit & agreeable marks? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paul maketh the Iewes like vnto children and Christians to yong men. What disorder is there in this gouernement of God that he helde them in their childish lessons, which according to ỹ capacity of their age were fit for thē, & instructed vs with stronger & as it were more manly discipline, Therfore herein appeareth the constancy of These alterations not vnmeete but expedient for the Church.

God that he taught one selfe same doctrine in al ages, and continueth in requiring the same worship of his name, which he commaunded from the beginning. But wheras he changed the outward forme and maner thereof, in that he shewed not himself subiect to change: but so farre he tempered him selfe to the capacitie of man, which is diuers and changeable.

God may diuersifie deale with his Church & people vpō causes kept secret vnto himself, neither may wee without intolerable presumption carpe and quarell at his manner of dealing.

14 But whence (say they) commeth this diuersity, but bicause God willed it to be such? Could he not as well from the beginning as since the coming of Christ, reueale the eternall life in plaine words without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacramentes and easie to perceiue, giue his holie spirite, and powre abroad his grace throughout the whole world? This is euen like as if they should quarel with God for that he hath created the worlde so late, sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his wil was to haue enterchanged courses betweene winter & summer, betweene day and night. But as for vs, euen as al godly men ought to think, let vs not doubt that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes wee know not the cause why it ought so to haue been done. For that were to take presumptuously too muche vpon vs, not to giue God leaue to haue the causes of his owne purpose secrete to himselfe from vs. But it is maruellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beastes, and all that furniture of the Leuitical priesthood, wherewith in the olde time he was delighted: As though these outward & transitorie things did delite God, or any way moue affectiō in him. We haue already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of man. If a Phisition do heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, & afterward do vse another maner of healing with the same man being olde: shal we therfore say, that hee hath refused the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing stil in the same, he hath consideration of age? So behoued it, that Christ being absent, should be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by an other sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is meete that nowe being already deliuered, hee bee represented by other signes. But concerning Gods calling, now at the cōming of Christ more largely spread abrode among all people than it was before, and the graces of the holie ghost more plenteously powred out: who, I pray you, can denie it to be right, that God haue in his owne hande and wil the disposing of his owne graces, to giue light to what nations it pleased him? to raise vp the preaching of his word in what places it pleaseth him? to giue what doctrine & how great profiting & successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he wil, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the world for their vnthankfulnes? and againe when he wil to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therfore, that the cauillations are too much vnmeete, wherewith wicked men doe in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make them call either the righteousnes of God, or the faith of the scripture into doubt.

The xii. Chapter.

That it behoued, that Christ, to performe the office of the Mediator, should be made man.

Now

NOwe it much behoued vs that he ſhould be both God and man, which ſhould be our Mediatour. If a man aske of the neceſſitie, it was not indeede a ſimple or abſolute neceſſitie, as they commonlie call it, but it proceedeth from the heauenly decree, whereupon hanged all the ſaluatiō of men. But the moſt mercifull father appointed that which ſhoulde bee beſt for vs. For whereas our owne iniquities had, as it were caſt a cloud betweene him and vs, & vtterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man could be the interpreter for reſtoring of our peace, but he that coulde attaine vnto God. But who could haue attained vnto him? could any of the ſonnes of Adam? But all they did with their fathers ſhunne the ſight of God for feare. Could any of the Angels? but they alſo had neede of a head, by whoſe knitting together they might perfectly & vnſeuerably cleaue vnto God. What then? It was paſt al hope, vnleſſe the verie maieſtie of God would deſcende vnto vs, for we could not aſcend vnto it. So it behoued that the ſonne of God ſhould become for vs Immanuel, that is, God with vs: and that in this ſort, that by mutual ioyning, his godhead and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwiſe neither could the neerenes be neere enough, nor the alliance ſtrong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the diſagreement betweene our filthines, & the moſt pure cleannes of God. Although man had ſtood vndefiled without any ſpot, yet was his eſtate too baſe to attaine to God without a mediator. What could he then do being plonged down into death and hel with deadlie fall, defiled with ſo many ſpottes, ſtinking with his owne corruption, and ouerwhelmed with all accurſednesſe? Therefore not without cauſe, Paul meaning to ſet foorth Chriſt for the Mediator, doeth expreſſely recite that he is Man. One Mediator (ſaith he) of God and man, the man Ieſus Chriſt. 1. Tim. 2. 3. He might haue ſaide, God: or at the leaſt hee might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But becauſe the holy Ghoſt ſpeaking by his mouth, knewe our weakeneſſe: therefore to prouide for it in time, hee vſed a moſt fit remedy, ſetting among vs the ſonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therfore leaſt any man ſhould trouble himſelfe to knowe where the Mediator is to be ſought, or which way to come vnto him, in naming Man, hee putteth vs in minde that he is neere vnto vs, yea ſo neere that he toucheth vs, forasmuch as he is our owne fleſh. Truly he meaneth there euen the ſame thing that in an other place is ſet out with moe wordes: that we haue not a biſhop that can not haue compaſſion of our infirmities, forasmuch as he was in all thinges tempted as we are, onely ſinne excepted. Heb. 4. 15.

It was neceſſarie that he which ſhould vnſeuerably ioyne man to God ſhoulde himſelfe be both.

The ſonne of God becomming man, hath confirmed vs in the ſtate of being ſonnes to the ſame father, and hauing right to the ſame inheritance with him: & being God hath ſwallowed death, conquered ſin, ſubdued powers, & beſtowed life, which els hee coulde not haue done.

2 That ſhall alſo apppeare more plainelie, if we conſider how it was no meane thing that the Mediator had to do: that is, ſo to reſtore vs into the fauour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hel, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could do that, vnleſſe the ſonne of God were made alſo the ſonne of man, and ſo take ours vpon him to conuey his vnto vs, and to make that ours by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by this earneſt we truſt, that we are the children of God, becauſe the natural ſonne of God hath ſhapen for him ſelfe a body of our body, fleſh of our fleſh, bones of our bones, that he might bee all one with vs. Hee diſdayned not to take that vpon him which was proper vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had proper to himself, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of GOD and the sonne of man. Hereupon commeth that holy brotherhoode which he commendeth with his owne mouth, when he saith: I go vp to my father and your father, my God and your God. By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdom of heauen assured vnto vs: for that the onelie sonne of God, to whome it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethrē: because if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritance. Moreouer it was for the same cause very profitable, that he which should be our redeemer, shoulde bee both verie God and verie man. It was his office to swallowe vp death: who coulde doe that but life it selfe? It was his office to ouercome sinne: who could doe that but righteousnesse it selfe? It was his office to vanquishe the powers of the worlde and of the aire: who could do that but a power aboue both worlde and ayre? Nowe in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most mercifull God, in the person of his onelie begotten sonne, made himselfe our redeemer, when his will was to haue vs redeemed.

Iohn. 10. 17.

Rom. 8. 17.

The manhood of Christ u a warrant vnto vs that man hath satisfied God, that he u the promised seed, and that we haue fellowship with him and interest in the fruite of all his actions.

3 An other principal point of our reconciliatiō with God was this, that man which had lost himself by his disobedience, should for remedy set obedience against it, should satisfie the iudgemēt of God, & pay the penalty of sin. Therfore there came forth the true man, our Lord, he put on the person of Adam, and tooke vpon him his name to enter into his steede in obeying his father, to yeeld our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the iust iudgement of God, & in the same flesh suffer the pain that wee had deserued. For asmuch as therefore neither being onelie God, he could feele death, nor being only man he could ouercome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yeeld the one subiect to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by the power of the other hee might wrastle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore that spoile Christ either for his godhead or for his manhood, do indeed either diminish his maiestie and glory, or obscure his goodnes: but on the other side they doe no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they doe thereby weaken & ouerthrow, which can not stand but resting vpon this foundatiō. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redeemer should be the sonne of Abraham and Dauid, which God had promised in the lawe and the Prophetes. Whereby the godly mindes doe gather this other fruite, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to Dauid and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I euen now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature between him and vs is a pledge of our felowship with the sonne of God: that hee cloathed with our flesh vanquished death & sinne together, that the victory so might be ours and the triumph ours: that he offred vp for sacrifice the flesh that he receiued of vs, that hauing made satisfaction, he might wipe away our guiltinesse, and appease the iust wrath of his father.

Sith Christ from the beginning was promised to 4 He that shalbe diligently heedfull in considering these things as hee ought, wil easily neglect these wandring speculations that rauish vnto them

light spirites and desirous of nouelties: of which sort is, that Christ shoulde haue beene man, although there had bin no neede of remedie to redeeme mankind. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vncorrupted, he was set as head ouer Angels & men. For which cause Paul calleth him the first begotten of all creatures. But sith all the scripture crieth out that he was cloathed with flesh, that he might be the redeemer: it is too much rash presumption to imagine any other cause or ende. To what end Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough known: euen to restore the world fallen into ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore vnder the law, the image of him was set foorth in sacrifices, to make the faithful to hope that God would be merciful to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, hee should be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euen when the law was not yet published, the Mediator was neuer promised without bloud: we gather that he was appointed by the eternal counsell of God to purge the filthines of men, for that the shedding of bloud is a token of expiation. The Prophets so preached of him, that they promised that he should be the reconciler of God & men. That one specially notable testimonie of Esaie shal suffice vs for al, where he foretelleth, that he shalbe striken with the hand of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace should be vpon him: & that he should be a priest that shoulde offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his woundes shoulde come health to others: and that, because all haue strayed and beene scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith wee heare that Christ is properly appointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, who so euer passeth beyond these bounds, he doeth too much follow foolish curiositie. Now when himself was once come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming, to appease God, & gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So Iohn before that he teacheth ỹ the Worde was made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be heard before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loued the world, that he gaue his only begotten sonne, that whosoeuer beleeueth in him should not perish, but haue euerlasting life. Againe: The houre is come that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, & they that heare it, shal liue. I am the resurrection & life: he ỹ beleeueth in mee, although he be dead, shal liue. Againe, The sonne of man commeth to saue ỹ which was lost. Againe: The whole neede not a Physicion. I should neuer make an end, if I should rehearse all. The Apostles do all with one consent call vs to this fountaine. And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honor of the priesthood shoulde haue come to nought. Forasmuch as the priest appointed meane betweene God & man to make intercession: & he should not be our righteousnes, because he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he should be spoiled of al the honourable titles, wherwith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paul should proue vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, god hath sent his own sonne, that in likenesse of the flesh of sinne hee should satisfie for vs. Neither will this stande that hee teacheth in another place, that in this glasse appeared the no other ende, but the restauration of the world, no otherwise set forth in sacrifices, taught by Prophets, spoken of by his Apostles & by himselfe: sith no other end can stand with his priesthood, his titles, that which the scripture speaketh euerie where of him, it were too much rashnesse to affirme that the sonne of God had taken flesh although this cause had neuer beene.

goodneſſe of God and his infinite goodneſſe toward men, when Chriſt was giuen to be the Redeemer. Finally, the Scripture euerie where aſſigneth no other ende why the ſonne of God would take vpon him our fleſh, and alſo receiued this commandement of his father, but to bee made a ſacrifice to appeaſe his father toward vs. So it is written, and ſo it behoued that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therfore my father loueth me, becauſe I giue my life for the ſheepe, this commaundement hee gaue me. As Moſes lifted vp the Serpent in the deſert, ſo muſt the ſonne of man be lifted vp. It is not for vs to examine curiouſly whether Chriſt might haue beene without this cauſe, when God hath ſet downe, that for thu cauſe he purpoſed before all worlds Chriſt ſhould be, & commaunded to auoide foolish queſtions.

5 If any man take exception and ſay, that none of all theſe things proue the contrarie, but that the ſame Chriſt that redeemed men being damned, might alſo in putting on their fleſh teſtifie his loue toward them, being preſerued and ſafe. The anſwere is ſhort, that foraſmuch as the holy ghoſt pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God theſe two things were ioyned together, that Chriſt ſhould be our redeemer, and alſo partaker of all one nature with vs, therfore it is not lawful for vs to ſearch any further. For who ſo euer is tickled with deſire to knowe any more, hee being not contented with the vnchangeable ordinance of God, doeth ſhewe alſo that he is not contented with the ſame Chriſt that was giuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paul not only rehearſeth to what end he was ſent, but alſo climbing to the high myſterie of predeſtination, hee verie fitly repreſeth al wantonneſſe & itching deſire of mans wit. The father choſe vs in Chriſt before the creation of the world, to make vs his ſonnes by adoption, according to the purpoſe of his wil: and he accepted vs in his beloued ſonne, in whom we haue redemption by his bloud. Truely here is not the fall of Adam ſet before as though it were foremoſt in time, but is ſhewed what God determined before al ages, when his wil was to help the miſerie of mankinde. If the aduerſarie obiect againe, that this purpoſe of God did hang vpon the fall of man which he did foreſee: it is enough & more for mee, to ſay ỳ they with wicked boldneſſe breake forth to faine them a new Chriſt, whoſoeuer ſuffer themſelues to ſearch for more, or hope to know more of Chriſt than God hath foreappointed them by his ſecrete decree. And for good cauſe did Paul, after he had ſo diſcourſed of the proper office of Chriſt, wiſh to the Epheſians the ſpirite of vnderſtanding, to comprehend what is the length, height, bredth, and depth, euen the loue of Chriſt that ſurmounteth all knowledge: euen as if of purpoſe he would ſet barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Chriſt, they ſhould not, be it neuer ſo litle, ſwarue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, ſith this is a faithfull ſaying (as Paul teſtifieth) that Chriſt is come to ſaue ſinners, I doe gladly reſt in the the ſame. And whereas in another place the ſame Apoſtle teacheth, that the grace which is now diſcloſed by the Goſpel, was giuen vs in Chriſt before the times of the world; I determine that I ought conſtantly to abyde therein to the end. Againſt this modeſtie Oſiander carpeth vniuſtly which hath againe in this time vnhappily ſtirred this queſtion before lightly moued by a fewe. He accuſeth them of preſumption that ſay, that the ſonne of God ſhould not haue appeared in the fleſh, if Adam had not fallen, becauſe this inuention is confuted by no teſtimonie of ſcripture. As though Paul did not bridle froward curioſitie, when after hee had ſpoken of redemption purchaſed by Chriſt, he by & by commaundeth to auoide fooliſh queſtions. The madneſſe of ſome did burſt out ſo farre, that while they diſorderly coueted to ſeeme wittie, they moued this queſtion, whether the ſonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Aſſe. This monſtrouſnes which all the godly doe woorthily abhorre as deteſtable, let Oſiander confute with this pretenſe, that it is neuer expreſly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paul accompteth nothing precious or worthie to be knowen, but Chriſt crucified, he doth therefore admit an Aſſe to be the author of ſaluation. Therefore he that in another place reporteth, that Chriſt by the eternall counſell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather al things together, will neuer the more acknowledge an other that hath no office of redeeming appointed him. 1 Tim. 3. 9. Ephe. 4. 22.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it, that man was created after the image of God, becauſe he was faſhioned after the patern of Chriſt to come, that he might reſemble him, whom the father had alreadie decreed to clothe with our fleſh. Wherupon he gathereth, that if Adam had neuer fallen from his firſt and vncorrupted originall ſtate, yet Chriſt ſhould haue beene man. How trifling this is and wreſted, al men that haue ſound iudgement, doe eaſily perceiue of themſelues. In the meane time firſt he thinketh that he hath ſeene what was the image of God, that forſooth the glorie of God did not onely ſhine in thoſe excellent giftes wherwith he was garniſhed, but alſo that God himſelf eſſentially dwelt in him. But as for mee, although I graunt ỳ Adam did beare the image of God, in ſo much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true and higheſt perfection of dignitie) yet I ſay, that the likeneſſe of God is no where elſe to be ſought, but in thoſe markes of excellency wherwith he had garniſhed Adam aboue other liuing creatures. And that Chriſt was then the image of God, all men do graunt with one conſent, & therefore that whatſoeuer excellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten ſonne he approched to the glorie of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whome the creators will was to haue his glory ſeen as in a looking glaſſe. To this degree of honor was he aduaunced by the benefit of the only begotten ſonne: But I ſay further, that the ſame ſonne was a common head as wel to Angels as to men, ſo that the ſame dignitie that was beſtowed vpon man, did alſo belong vnto angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to deny, ỳ there is ſomthing in them wherein they reſemble their father. Nowe if his will was to haue his glorie to be repreſented as well in Angels as in men, and and to be seene in both natures; Osiander doth fondly trifle in saying, that the Angels were then set behind men, because they did not beare the image of Christ. For they could not continually enioy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleaue together vnder one head. Finally, if wee beleeue Christ, this shalbe our last felicitie, to be made of like fourme to the Angels, when wee shal bee receiued vp into heauen. But if Osiander will conclude, that the originall paterne of the image of God was in Christ as hee is man, by the same reason a man may say, that Christ must needes haue beene partaker of the nature of Angels, because the image of God pertaineth also to them.

Gal. 3 10.

The rest of Osianders reasons answered.

7 Therefore, Osiander hath no cause to feare, that God should be found a lier, vnlesse it had beene first stedfastly and vnchangeably decreed in his minde, to haue his sonne incarnate: because if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he should with the Angels haue beene like vnto God, and yet it should not therefore haue beene necessarie, that the sonne of God shoulde be made either man or Angel. And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the vnchangeable counsel of God had bin before the creatiō of man that Christ should be borne, not as the redeemer but as the first man, hee should haue lost his prerogatiue: forasmuch as now he should be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is to restore mankinde being lost, and so it might be gathered thereupon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why should hee so much abhorre that which the Scripture so openly teacheth, that hee was made like vnto vs in all things, except sinne? Whereupon Luke doubteth not to recken him the sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I would faine knowe why Paul calleth Christ the seconde Adam, but because the estate of man was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he should haue bin called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that because Christ was alreadie before knowen man in the mind of God, men were formed after the same paterne. But Paul in naming him the second Adam, setteth meane betweene the first beginning of man and the restitution which wee obteine by Christ, the fall of man whereby grew the necessitie to haue nature restored to her first degree. Whereupon it followeth, that this same was the cause why the sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander reasoneth ill & vnsauourily, that Adam, so long as he had stand without falling, should haue beene the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I answere by the contrarie, because though the sonne of God had neuer put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body and in the soule of man should haue shined the image of God, in the bright beams whereof it alway appeared, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the soueraigne supremacie in all. And so is that fooliſh subtelties assoiled, which Osiander bloweth abroade, that the Angels shoulde haue lacked this head, vnlesse it had beene purposed by God to cloath his sonne with flesh, yea, though there had beene no fault of Adam. For he doeth too rashly snatch holde of that which no man in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath no supremacie ouer Angels, that they should haue him for their Prince, but in so much as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the wordes of Paul, that in as much as hee is the eternal worde of God, hee is the first begotten of all creatures, not that hee is create, or ought to be reckened among creatures: but because the state of the worlde in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beautie, had no other originall: & then, that in as much as hee was made man, hee was the first begotten of the dead. For ỹ Apostle in one short clause setteth forth in both these points to be considered: that all things were create by the sonne, that hee might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might beginne to be the redeemer. Of like ignorance is it that he saith, that men shoulde not haue had Christ to their king, if he had not beene man. As though the kingdome of God coulde not stande, if the eternall sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels & men into the fellowship of his heauenly glorie and life, should himselfe beare the soueraignetie. But in this false principle he is alway deceiued, or rather deceiueth himselfe, that the Church shoulde haue beene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, euen as the Angels enjoyed him their head, hee coulde not likewise by his diuine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirite quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enioy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hitherto confuted, Osiander accounteth for most strong oracles: euen so as being drunk with the sweetnesse of his owne speculations, hee vseth to blowe out fond Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that hee bringeth after, hee saith is much more strong, that is the prophecie of Adam, which seeing his wife said, this nowe is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But howe prooueth hee that to be a prophecie? Because in Matthew Christ giueth the same saying to God. As though that whatsoeuer God hath spoken by men, conteineth some prophecie Let Osiander seeke prophecies in euery commandement of the lawe, which, it is certaine to haue come from GOD the author of them. Beside that, Christ should haue beene grosse and earthly, if hee had rested vpon the literall sense. Because hee speaketh not of the mystical vnion whereunto he hath vouchsafed to receiue his Church, but only of faithfulnesse betweene man & wife: for this cause he teacheth, that God pronounced that man and wife shalbe one flesh, that no man shoulde attempt to breake that insoluble knot by diuorce. If Osiander loth this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that hee led not his disciples further to a mysterie, in more subtelly expounding the saying of his father. Neither yet doth Paul maintaine his errour, which after he had said that wee are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great mysterie, for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure & similitude of mariage to set forth the holy coupling together, that maketh vs one with Christ. And so doe the wordes sound. Because when hee giueth warning ỹ he speaketh this of Christ & his church he doth as it were by way of correction, seuer the spiritual ioyning of Christ & his Church from the lawe of mariage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I thinke

The xiii. Chapter.

That Chriſt tooke vpon him the true ſubſtance of the flesh of man.

The trueth of Chriſts humane nature proued againſt the Manichees & Marcionites.

NOwe, vnleſſe I be deceiued, it were ſuperfluous to entreate againe of the Godhead of Chriſt, which hath alreadie in another place beene prooued with plaine and ſtrong teſtimonies. It remaineth therefore to be ſeene, how hee being clothed with our fleſh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediator. The trueth of his humaine nature hath in the olde time beene impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whome, the Marcionites fained a ghoſt in ſteede of the body of Chriſt, and the Manichees dreamed that hee had a heauenly fleſh. But both many and ſtrong teſtimonies of the Scripture doe ſtande againſt them both. For the bleſſing is promiſed neither in a heauenly ſeed, nor in the counterfait ſhape of man, but in the ſeede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternall throne promiſed to a man made of aire, but to the ſonne of Dauid and to the fruite of his womb. Therefore being deliuered in the fleſh, hee is called the ſonne of Dauid & Abraham: not becauſe he is only borne of the wombe of the Virgin, and create in the aire, but becauſe (as Paul expoundeth it) hee is according to the fleſh made of the ſeede of Dauid: as in another place the Apoſtle teacheth, that he deſcended of the Iewes. For which cauſe the Lorde himſelfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes cal himſelf the ſonne of man, meaning to expreſſe more plainly that he was man truely iſſued of the ſeede of mankind. Sith the holy Ghoſt hath ſo oft, by ſo many meanes, with ſo great diligence & ſimplicitie declared a thing not obſcure of it ſelfe, who would haue thought any men to be ſo ſhameleſſe as to preſume yet to ſpread miſtes to darken it? And yet wee haue other teſtimonies at hand, if we liſted to heap vp more of them. As is that ſaying of Paul: that God ſent his ſonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was ſubiect to hunger, thirſt, colde, and other infirmities of our nature. But out of many theſe are chiefly to be choſen, that may moſt auaile to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is ſaid, that he gaue not ſo great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him but tooke our nature, that in fleſh & bloud he might, by death, deſtroy him that had the power of death. Again, that by benefit of that communicating we are reckoned his brethrē. Again, that he ought to haue bin made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull & faithfull interceſſor: that we haue not a biſhoppe that cannot be compatient of our infirmities. And ſuch like. And for the ſame purpoſe ſerueth that which wee touched a little before, that it behooued that the ſinnes of the worlde ſhoulde bee cleanſed in our fleſh: Which Paul plainly affirmeth. And truely, whatſoeuer euer the father hath giuen to Christ, it doeth therefore belong to vs, because hee is the head, from which the whole bodie being knitte together, groweth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is saide: that the Spirite was giuen him without measure, that all we should drawe of the fulnesse thereof. Forasmuch as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidentall gifte. And for this cause Christ saieth in another place: I doe sanctifie my selfe for them. Iohn.1.16. Iohn.1.19.

2 As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their errour, they doe too vnaptly wrest them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling suttleties, when they go about to wipe away those things that I haue alledged for our parte. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantasticall bodie in steede of a true bodie: because in some places it is saide, that hee was made after the likenesse of a man, and that hee was founde in shape as a man. But so he nothing weigheth what is Pauls purpose in that place. For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ tooke vpon him, but that whereas he might haue shewed foorth his godhead, hee made no other shewe of himselfe, but as of an abiect and vnregarded man. For, to exhort vs by his example to submission, hee sheweth that forasmuch as hee was God, hee might haue by and by set foorth his glorie to be seene to the worlde: but yet that hee gaue ouer some of his owne right, and of his owne accorde abased him selfe, because he did put on the image of a seruant and contented with that humilitie, suffred his godhead to be hidden with the veile of the flesh. Hee doeth not here teach what Christ was, but howe he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the text it is easily gathered, that Christ was abased in the true nature of man. For what meaneth this, that in shape he was founde as man, but that for a time the glorie of his godhead did not shine foorth, but onely the shape of man appeared in base and abiect estate? For otherwise that place of Peter coulde not stande together, that hee was dead in the flesh, but quickened in the spirite, if the sonne of God had not ben weake in the nature of man: which Paul expresseth more plainly in saying, that hee suffred by reason of the weakenesse of the flesh. And hereunto serueth the exaltation: because it is expressely saide, that Christ atteined a newe glorie after that hee abased himselfe, which coulde not well agree to bee spoken of any, but of a man hauing flesh and soule. Manichees framed Christ a bodie of aire, because Christ is called the seconde Adam, heauenly of heauen. But neither in that place doeth the Apostle bring in a heauenly essence of the bodie, but a spirituall force which being powred abroad by Christ, doth quicken vs. Now, as wee haue alreadie seene, Peter and Paul do seuer the same from his flesh. But rather that doctrine which is receiued among the true teachers, concerning the flesh of Christ, is verie wel proued by that place. For if Christ had not all one nature of body with vs, it were a verie vaine argument, that Paul with such vehemencie followeth: that if Christ bee risen againe, we shall also rise againe: and if wee do not rise, then that Christ also is not risen. By what cauillations so euer either the olde Manichees or their newe Disciples go about to escape, they shall not winde themselues away. It is a foule shift, that they fondly say, that Christ is called the sonne of man, in so much as he is promised of men. For it is plaine, that after the Hebrew phrase, verie man in deede is called the sonne of man. And Christ without doubt kept the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to be vnderstanded by the children of Adam. And (not to goe farre off) the place of the eight Psalme, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shall be sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindfull of him, or the sonne of man, that thou visitest him? In this figure is expressed the true manhood of Christ. For though he were not immediatly begotten of a mortall father, yet his race came from Adam. For else that place coulde not stande which wee haue alreadie alleadged that Christ is made partaker of flesh and bloud, that hee might gather to him yong children to Heb. 2. 14. the seruice of God. In which wordes it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellowe and partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaning also he saith, that both the author of holinesse & they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is proued by the processe of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowship of nature: because hee by and by addeth, Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if hee had saide before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignitie, what cause shoulde there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioyne himselfe to the base and vnnoble, therfore it is said, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they obiect, that by this meane the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because we knowe that the children of God are not borne of flesh & bloud, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely flesh maketh not a brotherly ioyning. But although the Apostle giue this honour to the faithfull onely, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when wee say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meane which spiritually graffeth vs into the body

Rom. 8. 29. of Christ. Also they foolishly moue a brawle about the name of First begotten. They say that Christ should haue beene borne of Adam streight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten among brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honour, and excellencie of power. And more colour hath that which they babble, that
Heb. 2. 16. Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankinde into fauour. For, to set out more largely the honor which God vouchsaued to giue vs, he compared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe set behind vs. And if the testimonie of Moses be wel weied, where he saith that the seede of the woman shal breake the serpents head, it shall vtterly end the controuersie. For only Christ is not there spoken of, but al mankind. Be-
Gen. 3. 15. cause the victorie was to be gotten by Christ for vs, he generally pronounceth that the posteritie of the woman should get the vpper hand of the diuel. Whereunto followeth, that Christ issued of mankinde, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Eue, whome he spake vnto with good hope, that she should not faint with sorow.

The shifts vvhich newv Marcionites haue to auoid the euidence of scripture vvhich maketh against them.

3 They doe no lesse wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seede of Abraham, and the fruit of the wombe of Dauid. For if the name of Seede had bin ſpoken in an allegorie, truely Paul would not haue left it vntolde, where he plainly & without figure affirmeth, that there are not many ſonnes of Abraham redeemers, but one Chriſt. Gal.3.18. Of like ſort is it that they alleadge: that he is no otherwiſe called the ſonne of Dauid, but becauſe he was promiſed and at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paul had once named him the ſonne of God: in that hee by and by addeth, According to the fleſh, hee truely meaneth of nature. And ſo in the ninth Chapter calling him the bleſſed God, he ſaith ſeuerally beſide, that according to the fleſh hee deſcended of the Iewes. Nowe if he were not truely begotten of the ſeede of Dauid, to what purpoſe ſhall be this ſaying, that he is the fruite of his wombe? What meaneth this promiſe? Out of thy loynes ſhall hee deſcende, that ſhall abide in thy ſeate. Nowe in the Genealogie of Chriſt, as it is rehearſed of Matthewe, they doe Sophiſtically mocke. For though hee doe not rehearſe the parents of Marie but of Ioſeph, yet becauſe he ſpeaketh of a thing ſufficiently knowen abroad among the people, he reckeneth it enough to ſhew that Ioſeph came of the ſeede of Dauid, when it was well knowen that Marie was of the ſame ſtocke. Rom.1.3. Pſa.132.11. But Luke more expreſſeth them in teaching that ſaluation brought by Chriſt, is common to all mankinde: becauſe Chriſt the author of ſaluation prooceeded from Adam the cõmon parent of all. I grant indeed, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwiſe be gathered ỹ Chriſt was the ſonne of Dauid, but in ſo much as he was begotten of the Virgine. But the new Marcionites to colour their error do too proudly, in this that to proue that Chriſt tooke his bodie of nothing, they affirme that women are ſeedeles, and ſo they ouerthrowe the principles of nature. But becauſe that is no queſtion of diuinitie, and the reaſons that they bring are ſo fickle that they may verie eaſily be confuted: therefore I will not touch thoſe things that belong to Philoſophie and Phiſike, and wil hold me contented to wipe away thoſe things that they alleadge out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioiadah tooke wiues of the tribe of Iehudah, and ſo the difference of tribes had then beene confounded, if woman had engendring ſeede in her. But it is well ynough knowen that as touching ciuil order, the kindreds are reckened by the ſeede of the man, and yet the excellencie of the kinde of man aboue woman prooueth not the contrarie, but that in generation the ſeede of woman muſt meete. And this ſolution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckeneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the men only: ſhal we therfore ſay, that the women are nothing? But verie children do know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this ſort is ſaid, that women bring foorth to their husbands, becauſe the name of the houſeholde alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellencie of the male kinde, that the children are counted noble or vnnoble, according to the eſtate of their fathers: ſo alſo in the ſtate of bondage ỹ iſſue followeth ỹ womb, according to the iudgement of the Ciuil lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the iſſue is engendred of ỹ ſeed of the woman. And it hath of long time bin receiued in common vſe of al nations, ỹ the mothers are called Genetrices, ỹ is engendrers. Wherewith Gods law alſo agreeth, which elſe ſhould wrongfully forbid the marriage of the vncle with his ſiſters daughter, becauſe there were no conſanguinitie betweene them: and alſo it were lawfull for a man to marrie his ſiſter by the mothers ſide, ſo that ſhe were begotten of an other father. But as I grant that there is a paſſiue power aſcribed to women, ſo do I aunſwere that the ſame thing is indifferently ſpoken of them that is of men. And Chriſt himſelf is not ſaid to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But ſome of their companie ſhaking off all ſhame do too leaudly aske, whether we will ſay that Chriſt was engendred of the menſtruall ſeede of the Virgin, for I wil likewiſe aske of them, whether he did not congele in the bloud of his mother, which they ſhall be conſtrained to confeſſe. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Matthewes words, that becauſe Chriſt was begotten of Marie, he was engendred of her ſeede: as a like engendring is meant when it is ſaid, that Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthewe here deſcribe the Virgine as a conduit pipe through which Chriſt paſſed: but he ſeuereth this maruellous manner of generation from the common manner, for that by her was Chriſt begotten of the ſeede of Dauid. For euen in the ſame ſort, that Iſaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Ioſeph of Iacob, likewiſe it is ſaid that Chriſt was begotten of his mother. For the Euangeliſt ſo frameth the order of his ſpeach, & willing to proue that Chriſt came of Dauid, is contented with this one reaſon, that he was begotten of Marie. Wherby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confeſſed, that Marie was of kinne to Ioſeph.

Gal. 4. 4.

Mat. 1. 5

It is no dishonor vnto Chriſt to haue taken his originall of man.

4 The abſurdities wherwith they would charge vs, are ſtuffed ful of childiſh cauillations. They thinke it a ſhame and diſhonour to Chriſt, if hee ſhould haue taken his originall of men: becauſe he ſo could not be exempt from the vniuerſal law that encloſeth all the offspring of Adam without exception vnder ſinne. But the compariſon that wee reade in Paull doth eaſily aſſoile this doubt: that as by one man came ſinne, and by ſinne death, ſo by the righteouſneſſe of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith alſo agreeth another compariſon of his: the firſt Adam of earth earthly, and naturall, the ſecond of heauen, heauenly. Therefore in another place, the ſame Apoſtle, where he teacheth that Chriſt was ſent in the likeneſſe of ſinfull fleſh to ſatisfie the lawe, doth ſo expreſſely ſeuer him from the common eſtate of men, that he be verie man without fault and corruption. But very childiſhly they trifle in reaſoning thus: If Chriſt be free from all ſpot, and was by the ſecrete working of the holy Ghoſt begotten of the ſeede of Marie, then is not the womans ſeede, but onely the mans ſeede vncleane. For wee doe not make Chriſt free from all ſpot, for this cauſe that hee is onely engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but becauſe he is ſanctified by the holy Ghoſt, that the generation might bee pure and vncorrupted, ſuch as ſhould haue beene before the fall of Adam. And this alway remained ſtedfaſtly determined with vs, that ſo oft as the ſcripture putteth vs in minde of the cleanneſſe of Chriſt, it is meant of his true nature of manhoode: becauſe it were ſuperfluous to ſay that God is cleane. Alſo the ſanctification that he ſpeaketh of in the ſeuenteenth of Iohn, could haue no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two ſeedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Chriſt: becauſe the generation of man is not vncleane or vitious of it ſelfe, but accidentall by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Chriſt, by whome the eſtate of innocencie was to be reſtored, were exempted from common corruption. And whereas alſo they thruſt this vppon vs for an abſurditie, that if the Worde of God did put on fleſh, then was it incloſed in a narrowe priſon of an earthly body: this is but meere waiwardneſſe: becauſe although the infinite eſſence of the worde did growe together into one perſon with the nature of man: yet doe wee faine no incloſing of it. For the ſonne of God deſcended maruellouſly from heauen, ſo as yet he left not heauen, it was his will to bee maruellouſly borne in the Virgins wombe, to bee conuerſant in earth, & hang vpon the croſſe, yet that hee alway filled the worlde euen as at the beginning.

The xiiii. Chapter.

Howe the twoo natures of the Mediator doe make one perſon.

The diuine & humane natures of Chriſt vnited in his perſon, yet in their properties diſtinguished, as the bodie and the ſoule in one & the ſame man.

NOwe where it is ſaide, that the Worde was made fleſh: that is not ſo to be vnderſtanded, as though it were either turned into fleſh, or confuſedly mingled with fleſh, but becauſe hee choſe him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in, he that was the ſonne of God, became alſo the ſonne of man, not by confuſion of ſubſtance, but by vnitie of perſon. For wee ſo affirme the godhead ioyned and vnited to the manhoode, that either of them haue their whole propertie remaining, and yet of them both is made one Chriſt. If any thing in all worldly things may be found like to ſo great a myſterie, the ſimilitude of man is moſt fitte, whome wee ſee to conſiſt of two ſubſtances, whereof yet neither is ſo mingled with other, but that either keepeth the propertie of his owne nature. For neither is the ſoule the bodie, nor the bodie the ſoule. Wherefore both that thing may be ſeuerally ſpoken of the ſoule, which can no way agree with the bodie: and likewiſe of the bodie that thing may bee ſaide, which can by no meane agree with the ſoule: and that may be ſaid of the whole man, which can be but vnfitly taken neither of the ſoule nor of the bodie ſeuerally. Finally, the properties of the ſoule are ſometime attributed to the bodie, and the properties of the bodie ſometime to the ſoule: and yet he that conſiſteth of them is but one man and not many. But ſuch formes of ſpeach doe ſignifie both that there is one perſon in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diuerſe natures which do make the ſame perſon. And ſo do the Scriptures ſpeake of Chriſt: ſometime they giue vnto him thoſe things that ought ſingularly to be referred to his manhood, & ſometime thoſe things that do peculiarly belong to his godhead, and ſometime thoſe things that doe comprehend both natures, and do agree with neither of them ſeuerally. And this conioyning of the two natures that are in Chriſt, they doe with ſuch religiouſneſſe expreſſe, that ſometime they doe put them in common together: which figure is among the olde authors called Communicating of properties.

such as be echwhere ready to finde, did proue that nothing hereof hath bin deuised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am, was farre disagreeing from his manhood. Neither am I ignorant with what cauillation the errorious spirites do deprave this place: For they say that he was before all ages, because he was alreadie foreknowen the Redeemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the mindes of the godly. But whereas he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, and of purpose pronounceth vnto himselfe an authoritie by antiquitie wherein he excelleth aboue Abraham, he doth vndoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the Godhead. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, and by whome all things keepe their being: and whereas hee himselfe reporteth that he was in glorie with the Father before the creation of the worlde, and that hee worketh together with the father these things, do nothing more agree with the nature of men. It is therefore certaine, that these & such like are peculiarly ascribed to ỹ godhead But whereas he is called the seruant of the Father: and whereas it is said, that he grewe in age, wisedome & fauour with God & men: that he seeketh not his owne glorie: that he knoweth not the last day: that he speaketh not of himself: that he doth not his own wil: where it is said, that he was seen & felt: this wholly belongeth to his own manhood. For in respect that he is God, neither can he encrease in any thing, & hee worketh all things for his own sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doeth all things according to the free choise of his own wil, & can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not seuerally ascribe these things to his nature of man only, but takeh them vpon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediator. But the communicating of properties is in this that Paul saith, that God did by his own bloud purchase vnto him a Church: and the Lorde of glorie crucified. Againe, where Iohn saith, that the Worde of life was felt. Truely God neither hath bloud, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with hands. But because he which was both verie God & man, Christ being crucified, did shed his bloud for vs: those things that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, & yet not without reason giuen to his Godhead. A like example is, where Iohn teacheth that God gaue his soule for vs: therefore there also the propertie of the manhood is cõmunicate with the other nature. Againe, when Christ said being yet conuersant in earth, that no mã haue ascended into heauen, but the sonne of man that was in heauen: truely according to his manhod, & in the flesh ỹ he had put on, he was not then in heauen: but because himself was both God & man, by reason of the vnitie of both natures, he gaue to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all doe these places set foorth the true substance of Christ, which do comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in ỹ Gospel of him. For ỹ which is there red is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhod, but both together, ỹ he hath receiued of his father power to forgiue sinnes, to raise vp whom he wil, to giue righteousnes, holines & saluation, to be made iudge ouer the quicke & the dead, to be honoured euen as the father is: Finally, that hee is called the light of the world, the good shepeheard, the onely dore, the true Vine. For such prerogatiues had the sonne of God, when he was shewed in ỹ flesh, which although he enioyed with his father before the world was made, yet he had them not in the same maner or the same respect, & which could not be giuẽ to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same meaning ought we to take that which is in Paul: that Christ after the iudgemẽt ended, shall yelde vp the kingdom to God & the father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no beginning, nor shall haue any ending: but euen as hee lay hid vnder the baseneſſe of the flesh, & abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, & laying aside the port of maiestie, hee shewed himself obedient to wis father: & hauing performed all such subiection, at length is crowned with honor & glorie, & auanced to the highest dominion, that al knees shal bow before him: so shal he then yeelde vp to his father both that name & crown of glorie, & whatsoeuer he hath receiued of his father, that God may be al in al. For to what purpose is power & dominion giuen him, but that the father should gouerne vs by his hande? In which sense it is also said, that he sitteth at the right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, til we may enioy the present beholding of the godhead. And here the error of the old fathers cannot be excused, which while they took no heede to the person of the Mediator, haue obscured the naturall meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the gospel of Iohn, & haue entangled themselues in many snares. Let this therfore be vnto vs the key of right vnderstanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Mediator, are not spoken simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore Christ shal reigne til he come forth to iudge the world, in so much as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the smal measure of our weakne. But when wee being made partakers of the heauenly glory, shal see God such as he is, then he hauing performed the office of Mediator, shal ceasse to be the embassadour of his father, & shalbe contented with that glorie which hee enioyed before the making of the world. And the name of Lord doth in no other respect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it signifieth the meane degree betweene God & vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Paul: One God, of whome are al things, & one Lord, by whome are al things, euen he to whom the dominion for a time is committed by the father, vntil his diuine maiestie be to be seene face to face. From whome so farre is it off that any thing shal decay, by yeelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shal become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also ceasse to be the head of Christ becauſe Christes godhead shall then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certeine veile.

4 And this obseruation shal do no small seruice to assoile many doubtes, if the reders do fitly apply it. For it is marueilous how much the vnskilful, yea some not vtterly vnlearned, are combred with such formes of speach, which they see spoken by Christ, which doe well agree neither with his godhead nor with his manhood: becauſe they consider not that they doe agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediator. And it is alway easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they haue a sober expositor, to examine so great mysteries with such deuout uout reuerence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and phrantike spirites trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhood, to take away the Godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his Godhead to take away his manhood: and of those things that are so ioyntly spoken of both natures, that they severally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man & God? We therfore do determine that Christ, as he is both God & man, consisting of both natures, vnited, though not cõfounded, is our Lord & the true sonne of God, euen according to his mahood, though not by reason of his manhood. For the error of Nestorius is to be driuen farre away from vs, which when he went about rather to drawe in sunder, than to distinguish the nature, did by the meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas wee see that the Scripture crieth out with loud voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgin, and the Virgin herselfe is called the mother of our Lord. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while wee go about to shewe the vnitie of the person, we destroy either nature. For we haue already aleaged so many testimonies, & there are euery where so many other to be alleaged, where his godhead is distinguished from his manhood, as may stop the mouthes euen of y^e most contentious. And a litle hereafter I wil adioine some testimonies, to confute better that fained deuise, but at this present, one place shal cõtent vs. Christ would not haue called his body a Temple, vnlesse the godhead did distinctly dwel therin. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the Synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the synode of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confound the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

Iohn. 2. 19.

The monstrous impietie of Seruetus denying Christ to haue bene actually the sonne of God before he was borne of the virgin Marie.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no lesse pestilent a monster, Michael Seruetus, which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh and three elements vnereat. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of the holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgin. But to this end tendeth his suttletie, that the distinction of the two natures being once ouerthrowne, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God & man, and yet neither God nor man. For in his whole processe he trauaileth toward this point, that before Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, there were only certain shadowish figures in God, whereof the trueth or effect then at length was in being, when that worde which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the sonne of God And we in deed do confesse that the Mediator which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable fauour of God, vnlesse this dignitie were giuen him to be, & be called the only begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definition of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is counted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worldes, did by hypostaticall vnion take vpon him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall postaticall vnion is called with the old fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speach was deuised to ouerthrowe the doting error of Nestorius, because he fained that ỹ sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Seruetus slandereth vs, that wee make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Worde was alreadie the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else, but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it followe, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurditie it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the sonne, which the Angels words to Marie do secretely shewe, That holy thing that shalbe borne of thee, shalbe called the sonne of God: as if he should haue said, that the name of the sonne which was obscure in time of the law, should nowe become famous & euery where knowen abroad. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely & with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. Rom. 8. 15. But were not the holy fathers in the old time also accounted among the children of God? Yea, & bearing them bold vpon that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since the only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heauenly fatherhood is become more plainly knowen: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a priuilege to the kingdome of Christ. But yet this is stedfastly to be holden, that God neuer was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the onely begotten sonne: and that men specially, whome their own wickednesse maketh hatefull to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Seruetus should cauil, that this hangeth vpon filiation or becõming a sonne, which God had determined with himselfe, because our purpose is not here to speak of the figures how the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beasts: but because they could not in deede be the children of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon the head, it is without reason to take ỹ from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignitie did not hang vpon the redemption to come: yet must it needes be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. Psa. 82. 7. I wil repeate it againe shortly, & adde the same of mankinde. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created with this condition, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of Paul be true, that Christ was alway the head & ỹ first begotten of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: Col. 1. 15. I thinke I do rightly gather that hee was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shal follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruetus & other such franticke men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in the flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he coulde not be called by that name. Now let them aunswere mee whether he be the sonne according to both natures, & in respect of both. So in deed they prate, but Paul teacheth farre otherwise. Wee graunt in deede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption only & grace, but the true & natural, & therfore only sonne, ỹ by this marke he may be discerned from al other. For God vouchsafeth to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true & only begotten sonne, he giueth to Christ only. How can he be the only sonne in so great a number of brethren, but because he possesseth that by nature, which wee haue receiued by gift? And the honor wee extend to the whole person of the Mediator, that he be truely & properly the sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgin, & offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father vpon the crosse: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paul teacheth, when he saith, he was seuered out to preach the gospel of God, which he had before promised of his sonne, which was begotten of the seed of Dauid according to his flesh, & declared the sonne of God in power. Rom.1.2. But why, when he nameth him distinctly the sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he seuerally say, that hee was declared the sonne of God, vnlesse hee meant to shewe that this did hang vpon some other thing, than vpon the verie flesh? For in the same sense in another place he saith, that he suffered by the weakenesse of the flesh, & rose againe by the power of the spirit, euen so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. 2.Cor.13.4. Truely they must needes graunt, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his father for which he is called the sonne of God: and the same is another thing & seuerall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, calling him here and there somtimes the sonne of God, & sometimes the sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no contention moued: but according to the common vse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the sonne of man, because he is of the offspring of Adam. By the contrarie I affirme, that he is called the sonne of God in respect of the Godhead & eternall essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the sonne of man. Againe, in the same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotté of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the sonne of God in power, than he teacheth in another place, that Christ which according to the flesh descended of the Iewes, is God blessed for euer. Rom.9.5. Now if in both places the distinction of the double nature be touched, by what right will they say, that he which according to the flesh is the sonne of man, is not also the sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

Places of scripture wrested by Seruetus from their true meaning to proue that Christ began to be the sonne of God whē he became the son of man.

7 They do in deede disorderly enforce for the maintenance of their error, the place where it is said, ỹ God spared not his own sonne, & where the Angel commanded, that the verie same he that should be borne of the Virgin, should be called the sonne of the highest. Rom.8.32. Luk.1.32. But, least they should glorie in so fickle an obiection, let them wey with vs a litle, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he began to be the sonne of God, because he that is conceiued is called the sonne of God, then shal it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because John saith, that he bringeth them tidings of the Worde of life, which his handes haue handeled. 1.Ioh.1.1. Likewise that, which is reade in the Prophet Thou

Thou Bethleem in the lande of Iuda, art a litle one in thousandes of Iuda: Out of thee shall bee borne to me a guide to rule my people Israell, and his comming forth from the beginning, from the daies of eternitie. Mic.5.2. Howe will they be compelled to expounde this, if they will be content to followe such manner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we do not agree with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly cõioyning, because he is the onely begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doeth wisely admonishe vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to beholde the marueilous and singular fauour of God, that hee attained honor in respect that he is man which he could not deserue. Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency euen according to the flesh from the wombe of his mother, to be the sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnitie of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away ỹ which is proper to the godhead. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures vnited into one person, be diuers wayes called the Sonne of God, than that hee bee according to diuers respectes, called sometime the Sonne of God, and somtime the Sonne of Man. And no more doeth that other cauillation of Seruetus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is nowhere called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the describing of him, then was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already clerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the worde begotten of the eternal father, and that this name doth no otherwise belong to the person of the Mediator which hee hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father had not beene called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutual relation to the Sonne, by whome all kinred or fatherhood is reckoned in heauen and in Eph.3.15. earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euen in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, he was the Son of God, before that this name was cõmonly knowen in the Churche. But if they striue onely about the onely worde, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to bee incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (saith he) or the name of his sonne Yet I am not ignorant, that with the contentious this Pro.30.4. testimonie will not bee of sufficient force: neither do I much grounde vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they do maliciously cauil, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest writers with one mouth and consent haue openly testified the same: so that their shamelesnesse is no lesse worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred which dare obiect Irenæus and Tertullian against vs, both which do confesse that the Sonne of God was inuisible, which afterward appeared visible.

The sundrie grosse absurdities vvher into Seruetus fel, by denying Christ to haue byn really and actually the son of God before he vvas manifested in the flesh.

8 But although Seruetus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuises, which peraduenture the other would not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that doe not acknowledge Christ to bee the son of God but in the flesh, do grant it only in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Manichees in

in olde time did fooliſhly affirme, that man hath his ſoule (as it were) by deriuation from God, becauſe they reade that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take ſo faſt holde of the name of Sonne, that they leaue no difference betweene the natures, but babble diſorderly, that Chriſt being man, is the Sonne of God, becauſe according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wiſedome, that Salomon ſpeaketh of, is deſtroyed, and there is no account made of the godhead in the Mediator, or a fantaſied Ghoſt is thruſt in place of the Manhoode. It were indeede profitable to confure the groſſer deceites of Seruetus, wherewith he hath bewitched himſelfe and ſome other, to the end that the godly readers admoniſhed by this example, may holde themſelues within the cõpaſſe of ſoberneſſe and modeſtie: ſauing that I thinke it ſhould be ſuperfluous, becauſe I haue already done it in a booke by it ſelf. The ſumme of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God was a forme in minde from the beginning, and euen then hee was before appointed to bee man that ſhoulde be the eſſentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other Word of God, but in outward ſhew. This he expoũdeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to beget a Sonne, which alſo in acte extended to the nature it ſelfe. In the meane time hee confoundeth the Spirit with the Worde, for that God diſtributed the inuiſible Word and the Spirit into fleſh & ſoule. Finally the figuratiõ of Chriſt, hath with them the place of begetting, but hee ſaith, that hee which then was but a ſhadowiſhe ſonne in forme, was at length begotten by the worde, to which he aſſigneth the office of ſeed. Whereby it ſhal follow that hogges and dogges are as wel the children of God, becauſe they were create of the originall ſeede of the woorde of God. For although hee compounde Chriſt of three vncreate elementes to make him begotten of the eſſence of God, yet he faineth that hee is ſo the firſt begotten among creatures, that the ſame eſſentiall godhead is in ſtones, according to their degree. And leſt he ſhould ſeeme to ſtrippe Chriſt out of his godheade, he affirmeth that his fleſh is conſubſtantiall with God, and that the Word was made man by turning the fleſh into God. So while he cannot conceiue Chriſt to be the Son of God, vnleſſe his fleſh came from the eſſence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall perſon of the Worde to nothing, and taketh from vs the ſonne of Dauid, that was promiſed to be the Redeemer. He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predeſtination, & that at lẽgth he was made man of that matter which at the beginning ſhined with God in the three elementes, which afterward appeared in the firſt light of the worlde, in the cloude and in the piller of fire. Nowe howe ſhamefully hee ſometime diſagreeth with himſelf, it were too tedious to rehearſe. By this ſhort recitall the readers that haue their ſound witte may gather, that with the circumſtances of this vncleane dog the hope of ſaluation is vtterly extinguiſhed. For if the fleſhe were the godheade it ſelfe, it ſhoulde ceaſe to bee the temple thereof. And none can be our redeemer, but he that begotten of the ſeede of Abraham and Dauid, is according to the fleſh, truly man. And hee wrongfully ſtandeth vpon the wordes of Iohn, that the Worde was made fleſh. For as they reſiſt the errour of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked inuention, whereof Eutiches was author, forasmuch as the only purpose of the Euangelist was to defend the vnitie of persons in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That wee may knowe, to what ende Christ was sent of his Father, and what he brought vs: three thinges are principally to be considered in him, his Prophetical office, his kingdom, and his Priesthoode.

Christ a prophet, a king, and priest, so to be acknowledged, not with a cold mentioning of those titles, but with a right vnderstanding of the end & vse of the. The people of God before his cõming, looked for more light of knowledge at his hands when he shoulde come, then they receiued by their other prophets.

AVgustine saith rightly, that although the Heretikes doe bragge of the name of Christ, yet they haue not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onelie proper to the Church. For if these things be diligently considered, that belong to Christ: Christ shalbe founde among them onelie in name, and not in verie deede. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redeemer of the worlde, sounde in their mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretense of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignitie: this saying of Paul maie bee well spoken of them, that they haue not the head. Therefore, that faith maie finde sound matter of saluation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to bee stablished, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes. For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, & a priest. Albeit, it were but small profite to know those names, without knowledge of the ende and vse of them. For they are also named among the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profite, where it is not knowen what eech of these titles containeth in it. We haue saide before, how, though God sending Prophets by continual course one after another, did neuer leaue his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to saluation: that yet the mindes of the godly had alway this perswasion, that ful light of vnderstanding was to be hoped for only at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritanes, who yet neuer knewe the true religion, as appeareth by the saying of the woman: When Messias commeth he shall teach vs all thinges. And the Jewes had not rashly gathered this vpon presumptions in their mindes: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleeued. Notable among the other is that saying of Esaie: Beholde, I haue made him a witnesse to peoples, I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaister to peoples: euen as in an other place he had called him the Angel or interpreter of the great counsel. After this manner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the gospel, after that he had saide, that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophets diuersly, and vnder manifold figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloued sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophets to keep the Church in suspense, & to vphold it vntil the comming of the Mediator, therfore we read that in their scattering abroad, the faithful complained that they were depriued of that ordinarie benefite, saying: We see not our tokens: there is not a prophet among vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But whē Christ was now not farre off, there was a time appointed to Daniel to seale vp the vision and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecy, which is there spoken of, should bee stablished in assured credit, credit, but also that the faithfull shoulde learne with contented minde to want the Prophets for a time, because the fulnesse and closing vp of al reuelations was at hand.

Christ more then a common instructor, as the blessing ioyned vvith his doctrine, and the excellencie of that hee taught doe plainelie shevv.

2 Now it is to be noted, that the title of cõmendation of Christ belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the lawe, as well the Prophets as Priestes and kings were annoynted with holy oyle. For which cause the renoumed name of Messias was giuen to the promised Mediator. But though indeede I confesse (as I haue also declared in another place,) that he was called Messias, by peculiar consideration & respect of his kingdome: yet the annointings in respect of the office of Prophet & of Priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Esaie, in these wordes: The spirite of the Lorde Iehoua vpon me. Therfore the Lord hath annointed me, that I should preach to the meeke, shoulde bring health to the contrite in heart, shoulde declare deliuerance to captiues, should publish the yere of good will, &c. Wee see ỳ hee was annointed with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witnesse of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common maner: for he is seuered from other teachers that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that he tooke not the annointing for himselfe alone, that hee might execute the office of teaching, but for his whole bodie, that in his continual preaching of the Gospel, the vertue of the spirit shoulde ioyne withall. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, ỳ by this perfection of doctrine which he hath brought, an end is made of all propheties. so that they doe diminish his authoritie, that being not content with the Gospell, doe patch any forraine thing vnto it. For that voyce which thundred from heauen, saying: This is my beloued sonne, heare him: hath aduanced him by singular priuiledge aboue the degrees of all other. Then this oyntment is powred abroad from the head vnto all the members: as it was foretspoken by Ioel, Your children shal propheeie, and your daughters shall see visions, &c. But where Paul saith, that he was giuen vs vnto wisdom, and in another place, ỳ in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge & vnderstanding: this hath somewhat another meaning: that is, that out of him there is nothing profitable to know, and that they which by faith perceiue what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitenesse of heauenlie good thinges. For which cause he writeth in another place, I haue counted it precious to knowe nothing, but Iesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyond the simplicitie of the Gospell. And hereunto tendeth the dignitie of a Prophets office in Christ, that wee might knowe that in the summe of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all points of perfect wisedome.

The eternall continuance of Christes kingdom proueth the perpetuitie of his Church.

3 Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vaine to speake, if the readers were not first warned, that the nature therof is spirituall. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serueth, and what it auaileth vs, & the whole force and eternitie therof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angel doeth attribute to the person of Christ, and againe the Angell in Luke doeth worthilie applie to the saluation of the people. But that is also double or of two sortes, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is proper to euery member. To the first is to be referred that which is sayd in the psalme: I haue once sworne by my holinesse to Dauid, I will not lie, his seede shall abide for euer, his seate shall be as the Sunne in my sight, it shall be stablished as the Moone for euer, and a faithfull witnesse in heauen. Neither is it doubtful, but that God doth there promise, that he will be by the hand of his sonne an eternall gouerner and defender of his Church. For the true performance of this prophecie can be founde no where else but in Christ: forasmuch as immediatlie after ỹ death of Salomon, the greater part of the dignitie of the kingdome fell awaye, and was to the dishonour of the house of Dauid conueyed ouer to a priuat man, and afterward by litle and litle was diminished, til at length it came to vtter decay, with heauy & shameful destruction. And the same meaning hath ỹ exclamation of Esaie: Who shall shew forth his generation? For hee so pronounceth that Christ shall remaine aliue after death, that he ioyneth him with his members. Therefore so oft as wee heare that Christ is armed with eternall power, let vs remember that the euerlasting continuance of the Church is vpholden by this supporte, to remaine still safe among the troublesome tossinges, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the grieuous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when Dauid scorneth the boldenesse of his enemies, that go about to breake the yoke of God and of Christ, and sayeth, that the kinges and peoples raged in vaine, because hee that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assaultes: he assureth the godlie of the continuall preseruation of the Churche, & encourageth them to hope wel so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in another place, when hee saieth in the person of God: sit at my right hand, til I make thine enemies thy footstoole: hee warneth vs, that how many and strong enemies soeuer doe conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not strength enough to preuaile against that vnchangeable decree of God, wherby he hath appointed his sonne an eternall king: whereupon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuill with all the preparation of the worlde, maie bee able at any time to destroy the Church, which is grounded vpon the eternall seat of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the special vse of euerie one, the very same eternal cõtinuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortalitie. For we see, that what soeuer is earthly and of the worlde, endureth but for a time, yea and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heauen, pronounceth, that his kingdome is not of this worlde. Finally, when anie of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spiritual, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is now defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full fruite of this grace in the world to come.

4 That, as we haue saide, the force and profit of the kingdom of Christ can not otherwise be perceiued by vs, but when wee know it to be spiritual, appeareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must liue in warfare vnder the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is harde and miserable: what then should it profit vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenlie king, vnlesse we were certaine to enioy the

the fruite thereof out of the state of this earthly life? And therfore it is to be knowen, that whatsoeuer felicity is promised vs in Christ, it consisteth not in outwarde commodities, that wee should lead a merrie and quiet life, florish in wealth, bee assured from all harmes, and flow ful of those delightful thinges that the flesh is wont to desire: but that it wholly belongeth to the heauenlie life. But as in the worlde the prosperous and desired state of the people is partly maintained by plentie of good thinges and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defences, whereby it may be safe against outward violence: so Christ also doeth enrich his with all thinges necessarie to eternall saluation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength, by which they may stande inuincible against all assaults of principal enemies. Wherby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs than for himselfe, and that both within and without: that being furnished, so farre as as God knoweth to bee expedient for vs, with the gifts of the spirit, wherof we are naturally emptie, we may by these first fruites perceiue that we are truely ioyned to God vnto perfect blessednesse. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the same spirite, we may not doubt that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Diuell, the worlde, and euerie kinde of hurtfull thing To this purpose tendeth the answeare of Christ to the Pharisees, that because the kingdom of God is within vs, it shall not come with obseruation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same king, vnder whom the soueraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in scorne required him to shewe forth his signes. But hee, because they (who otherwise are too much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest vpon worldly pompes, biddeth them to enter into their own consciences, because the kingdom of God is righteousnes, peace & ioy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdome of Christ auaileth vs. For, because it is not earthly or fleshly, subiect to corruption, but spirituall: he lifteth vs vp euen to eternall life, that we may patiently passe ouer this life in miseries, hunger, colde contempt, reproches, and other griefes, contented with this one thing, that our king will neuer leaue vs destitute, but succour vs in our necessities, til hauing ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his manner of reigning, to communicate with vs al that he hath receiued of his father. Now whereas he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnisheth vs with beauty & magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth? hereby is ministred vnto vs most plentifull matter to glorie vpon, & also bolde courage to fight without feare against the Diuell, sinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteousnesse, we may valiantly ouercome all the reproches of the world, and as he liberally filleth vs with his gifts, so we again for our part, may bring forth fruite to his glorie.

5 Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vnto vs, not done with oile or ointmentes made with spices, but he is called the annointed of God because vpon him hath rested the spirit of wisedome, vnderstanding, counsell, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalme reporteth that he was anointed aboue his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be al needie and hungry. For, as it is already saide, he is not priuately enriched for himselfe, but to poure his plentie vpon vs, being hungrie and drie. For as it is ſaid, that the father gaue the ſpirite to his ſonne, not by meaſure, ſo there is expreſſed a reaſon why, that all we ſhould receiue of his fulneſſe, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberal giuing, whereof Paul maketh mention, wherby grace is diuerſly diſtributed to the faithfull, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. Hereby is that which I ſaid ſufficiently confirmed, that the kingdom of Chriſt conſiſteth in the ſpirit, not in earthly delights or pomps, and therefore we muſt forſake the worlde that we may bee partakers of it, A viſible ſigne of this holy anointing was ſhewed in the baptiſme of Chriſt, when the holie Ghoſt reſted vpom him in the likeneſſe of a doue. That the holy Ghoſt and his gifts are meant by the word Anointing, ought to ſeeme neither noueltie nor abſurditie. For we are none other way quickened, ſpecially for ſo muche as concerneth the heauenly life: there is no droppe of liuely force in vs, but that which the holy Ghoſt poureth into vs, which hath choſen his ſeat in Chriſt, that from thence the heauenly riches might largly flowe out vnto vs, whereof wee are ſo needie. And whereas both the faithfull ſtand inuincible by the ſtrength of their king, and alſo his ſpirituall riches plenteouſly flowe out vnto them, they are not vnworthely called Chriſtians. But this eternitie whereof we haue ſpoken, is nothing derogate by that ſaying of Paul: Then he ſhall yeelde vp the kingdome to God and the Father. Againe: the ſonne him ſelfe ſhall bee made ſubiect, that God maie bee all in all thinges: for his meaning is nothing elſe, but that in that ſame perfect glorie, the adminiſtrarion of the kingdome ſhall not bee ſuch as it is nowe. For the father hath giuen all power to the ſonne, that by the ſonnes hande he may gouerne, cheriſh and ſuſtaine vs, defend vs vnder his ſafegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a litle time wee are wauering abroad from God, Chriſt is the meane betweene God and vs, by litle and litle to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truely, whereas he ſitteth on the right hande of the Father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the fathers deputie, vnder whom is the whole power of his dominion, becauſe it is Gods will to rule and defende his Church by a meane (as I may ſo call it) in the perſon of his Sonne. As alſo Paul doth expounde it in the firſt chapiter to the Epheſians, that he was ſet at the right hande of the father, to be the head of the Churche, which is his bodie. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that there is giuen him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Ieſus all knees ſhould bow, and all tongues confeſſe ỳ it is to the glorie of God the Father. For euen in the ſame woordes alſo hee ſetteth out in the kingdome of Chriſt an order neceſſarie for our preſent weakeneſſe. So Paul gathereth rightly, that God ſhall then be by himſelfe the only head of the Church, becauſe Chriſtes office in defending of the Churche, ſhall bee fulfilled. For the ſame reaſon the Scripture commonly calleth him Lord, becauſe his Father did ſette him ouer vs to this ende, to exerciſe his owne Lordely power by him. For though there bee manie Lordeſhippes in the worlde, yet is there to vs but one God the Father, of whom are all thinges and we in him, and one Lorde Chriſt, by whom are all thinges and we by him ſayeth Paul. Whereupon is rightly gathered that hee is the ſelfe ſame God, which by the

For though he do euery where call al the power that he hath, the benefit and gift of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing elfe, but that he reigneth by power of God: because he hath therefore put on the personage of the Mediator, that descending from the bosom & incomprehensible glorie of the father, he might approch nie vnto vs. And so much more rightful it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, & that with great cherefulnesse we direct our obediences to his commandement. For as he ioyneth the offices of king and pastor toward them that willingly yeelde themselues obedient: so on the other side, we heare that hee beareth an yron scepter, to breake and bruse all the obstinate like potters vessels: wee heare also that he shalbe the iudge of nations, to couer the earth with dead corpses, & to ouerthrowe the height that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples seene at this day: but the full proofe thereof shalbe at the last iudgement, which may also properly be accounted the last act of his kingdome.

Psa.2.9. Psa.110.6.

The office and vse of Christes priesthood.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holde, that the end and vse of it is, that he should be a Mediator pure from al spotte, that should by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But because the iust curse possesseth the entrie, and God according to his office of iudge is bent against vs, it is necessarie that some expiation bee vsed, that he being a priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherfore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoued that he should come foorth with a sacrifice. For in the lawe it was not lawfull for the priest to enter into the sanctuarie without blood, that the faithfull might knowe, that though there were a priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God could not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Vpon which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the epistle to the Hebrues, from the seuéth chapiter almost to the ende of the tenth. But the summe of al commeth to this effect, that the honour of priesthoode can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our giltines, and satisfied for our sinnes. But howe weighty a matter it is, we are enformed by that solemn oth of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principal point, which he knewe to bee the chiefe ioynte whereupon our saluation hanged. For, as it is saide, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the priestes do sanctifie vs and obtain grace for vs, from which the vncleanesse of our wicked doinges and sinnes doth debarre vs. So do wee see, that we must beginne at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profite of his priesthoode may come vnto vs. Of this it followeth that hee is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, whereupon againe ariseth not onely affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godlie consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tenderneſse of God, and are certainely perswaded that it pleaseth him whatsoeuer is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the lawe, God commaunded sacrifices of beastes to be offered to him: there was an other and a newe order in

Christ

Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, and the priest: because there neither coulde bee founde anie other satisfaction for sinnes, nor any was worthie so great honour to offer vp to God his onelie begotten sonne. Nowe Christ beareth the person of a Preast, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father fauourable and merciful vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the felowship of so great an honour. For wee that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priestes in him doe offer vp our selues, & all ours to God, and doe freely enter into the heauenlie sanctuarie, that all the sacrifice of prayer and praise that come from vs, maye bee acceptable and sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre doeth that saying of Christ extende: For their sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, hauing his holinesse powred vpon vs, in as much as hee hath offered vs with himselfe to his father, wee that otherwise doe stinke before him, doe please him as pure & cleane, yea & holy. Hereunto serueth the anointing of the sanctuarie, wherof mention is made in Daniel. For the comparison of contrariety is to be noted betwene this anointing, and that shadowish anointing that thé was in vse: as if the Angell shoulde haue saide, that the shadowes being driuen away, there shoulde bee a cleere priesthoode in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their inuention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, haue presumed to thrust in themselues to kill him: which is daily enterprised among the Papists, where the Masse is reckoned a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvi. Chapter.

Howe Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, Wherein is intreated of his death, and Resurrection and his Ascending into Heauen.

The summe of all which we seeke for in Christ u saluation. In which respect he hath the name of Sauiour giuen him: which name conteineth all good thinges.

ALL that we haue hitherto saide of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, wee maie seeke for righteousnes, deliuerance, life and saluation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen giuen to men wherein they must be saued. Neither was the name of Iesus giuen him vnaduisedly, or at chaunsable aduenture, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angel the publisher of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: bicause he was sent to saue the people from their sins. In which words ẏ is tobe noted, which we haue touched in an other place, ẏ the office of redeemer was appointed him, ẏ he should be our Sauiour: but in the meane time our redemption should be but vnperfect, vnles he should by continual proceedings conuey vs forward to the vttermost marke of saluation. Therfore, so soon as we swarue neuer so litle from him, our saluation by litle & litle vanisheth away, which wholy resteth in him: so ẏ all they wilfully spoile thémselues of al grace, ẏ rest not in him. And ẏ admonition of Bernard is worthie to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not only light, but also meat, yea & oile also, without which al the meat of the soule is drie, and that it is also salt, without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vnsauorie. Finally, that it is honye in the mouth, melodie in the eare and ioyfulneſſe in the heart, and alſo medicine, and that whatſoeuer is ſpoken in diſputation is vnſauorie, but where this name ſoundeth. But here it behoueth to weigh diligently how ſaluation is purchaſed by him for vs: that wee may not onely bee perſwaded that he is the author of it, but alſo embracing ſuch thinges as are ſufficient to the ſtedfaſt vpholding of our fayth, wee maie refuſe all ſuch thinges as might drawe vs away hither or thither. For ſith no man can deſcende into himſelfe, and earneſtly conſider what he is, but feeling God angrie and bent againſt him, he hath neede careſully to ſeeke a meane and way to appeaſe him, which demaundeth ſatisfaction: there is no common aſſuredneſſe required, becauſe the wrath and curſe of God lyeth alway vppon ſinners, till they bee looſe from their guiltineſſe: who, as hee is a righteous iudge, ſuffereth not his lawe to be broken without puniſhment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

Howw God cã bee ſaide to haue been our enemie till Chriſt reconciled vs, & yet giue vs his ſonne, by vvhõ vve might bee reconciled, ſeing this vvorke to reconcile vs shevveth loue before reconcilement.
Rom. 5. 10.
Gal. 3. 13.
Col. 1. 11.

2 But before we goe anie further, it is to be ſeene by the way, how it agreed together, that God which preuented vs with his mercie, was our enemie vntil he was reconciled to vs by Chriſt. For howe coulde hee haue giuen vs in his onely begotten ſonne a ſingular pledge of his loue, vnleſſe hee had alreadie before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Becauſe therefore here ariſeth ſome ſeeming of contrarietie, I will firſt vndoe this knotte. The holy Ghoſt commonly ſpeaketh after this manner in the ſcriptures, that God was enemie to men, till they were reſtored into fauour by the death of Chriſt: that they were accurſed till their iniquitie was purged by his ſacrifice: that they were ſeuered from God, till they were receiued into a conioyning by his bodie. Such manner of phraſes are applied to our capacitie, that wee maie the better vnderſtand howe miſerable and wretched our eſtate is being out of Chriſt. For if it were not ſpoken in expreſſe wordes, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and euerlaſting death did reſt vppon vs, wee woulde leſſe acknowledge howe miſerable wee ſhoulde bee without Gods mercie, and woulde leſſe regarde the benefite of deliuerance. As for example. If a man heare this ſpoken to him: If God at ſuche time as thou waſt yet a ſinner, had hated thee, and caſt thee away as thou hadſt deſerued, thou ſhouldeſt haue ſuffered horrible deſtruction: but becauſe hee hath willingly and of his owne free kindneſſe kepte thee in fauour, and not ſuffered thee to be eſtranged from him, hee hath ſo deliuered thee from that perill: truely hee will bee moued with, and in ſome part feele howe much hee oweth to the mercie of God. But if hee heare on the other ſide that which the Scripture teacheth, that he was by ſinne eſtranged from God, the heire of wrath, ſubiect to the curſe of eternal death, excluded from all hope of ſaluation, a ſtraunger from all bleſſing of God, the bondſlaue of Satan, captiue vnder the yoke of ſinne: Finally, ordeyned vnto and alreadie entangled with horrible deſtruction, that in this caſe Chriſt became an interceſſor to entreate for him, that Chriſt tooke vppon him and ſuffered the puniſhment which by the iuſt iudgement of God did hang ouer all ſinners, that hee hath purged with his blood thoſe euils that made them hateſull to God, that by this expiation is ſufficient ſatisfaction and ſacrifice made to God the father, that by this interceſſor his wrath was appeaſed: that within this foundation reſteth the peace betweene God and

men: that vpon this bonde is conteined his good will towarde them: ſhall not he be ſo much the more moued with theſe, as it is more liuely repreſented, out of howe great miſerie hee hath beene deliuered? In a ſumme: becauſe our minde can neither deſirouſly enough take hold of life in the mercie of God, nor receiue it with ſuch thankfulneſſe as wee ought, but when it is before ſtriken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dread of eternal death, we are ſo taught by holie ſcripture, that without Chriſt wee may ſee God in manner wrathfully bent againſt vs, and his hand armed to our deſtruction: and that we may embrace his good wil & fatherly kindneſſe no otherwhere, but in Chriſt.

3 And although this be ſpoken according to the weakeneſſe of our capacitie, yet it is not falſely ſaide. For God which is the higheſt righteouſneſſe, can not loue wickednеſſe which hee ſeeth in vs all. Therefore we all haue in vs that, which is woorthie of the hatred of God. Therefore in reſpect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life added vnto it, truely we are all in diſpleaſure of God, guiltie in his ſight, and borne to damnation of hell. But becauſe the Lorde will not looſe that which is his in vs, hee findeth yet ſomewhat that hee of his goodneſſe may loue. For howſoeuer wee bee ſinners by our owne fault, yet wee remaine his creatures. Howſoeuer wee haue purchaſed death te our ſelues, yet hee made vs vnto life. So is he moued by meere and free louing of vs to receiue vs into fauour. But ſith there is a perpetuall and vnappeaſable diſagreement betweene righteouſneſſe and iniquitie, ſo long as wee remaine ſinners, hee cannot receiue vs wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of diſagreement, he might wholy reconcile vs vnto him, hee doth by expiation ſet foorth in the death of Chriſt, take away whatſoeuer euill is in vs, that wee, which before were vncleane and vnpure, maye nowe appeare righteous and holye in his ſight. Therefore God the Father doeth with his loue preuent and go before our reconciliation in Chriſt, yea, becauſe hee firſt loued vs, therefore hee afterwarde doth reconcile vs vnto himſelfe. But becauſe vntill Chriſt with his death come to ſuccour vs, there remaineth wickednes in vs, which deſerueth Gods indignation, and is accurſed and damned in his ſight, therfore we are not fully and firmly ioyned to God, vntill Chriſte doe ioyne vs. Therefore if we will aſſure our ſelues to haue God made well pleaſed and fauourable vnto vs, wee muſt faſten our eyes and mindes vpon Chriſt onely: as indeed we obteine by him onely, that our ſinnes be not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

God louing vs freely as his creatures, but hating that iniquitie which is in vs, gaue his ſonne to take away that which hindered vs from the benefits of his loue.

1. Ioh 4.19.

4 And for this reaſon Paul ſaith, that the ſame loue, wherewith GOD imbraced vs before the creation of the worlde, was ſtayed and grounded vpon Chriſt. Theſe thinges are plaine and agreeable with the ſcripture, and doe make thoſe places of Scripture to accorde verie well together, where it is ſaide: that God declared his loue towarde vs in this, that hee gaue his onely begotten ſonne to death: and yet that he was our enemie till he was made fauorable againe to vs by the death of Chriſt. But that they may bee more ſtrongly proued to them that require the teſtamẽt of the old Church I will alleadge one place of Auguſtine, where hee teacheth the very ſame that wee doe. The loue of God (ſaith he) is incomprehenſible and vnchangeable geable. For he beganne not to loue vs, since the time that wee were reconciled to him by the blood of his sonne. But before the making of the worlde hee loued vs, euen before that we were anie thing at all, that wee might also bee his children with his onely begotten sonne. Therfore wheras wee are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the sonne did therefore reconcile vs vnto him, that hee might nowe beginne to loue vs whom he hated before: but we are reconciled to him that alreadie loued vs, to whom we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I saie, let the Apostle beare witnesse. He doth commende (saith hee) his loue towarde vs, because when wee were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. Hee therefore had a loue to vs, euen then when wee were enemies to him & wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a maruellous and diuine maner he loued vs, euen then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednes had on euery side wasted away his worke, he knew how in euerie one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to loue that which hee had made. These be the wordes of Augustine.

Rom.5.8.

Although Christ wrought our redemption by the whole course of his life, yet he is saide to haue reconciled vs especially by death, wherein we are to note, that hee died willingly, was reputed worthie, and yet pronounced vnworthie to die.

5 Nowe where it is demanded, how Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betweene vs and God, and purchased such righteousnes as might make him fauourable & wel willing toward vs: it may be generally answered, ỳ he hath brought it to passe by ỳ whole course of his obedience. Which is proued by the testimony of Paul. As by one mãs offẽce many were made sinners, so by one mãs obedience we are made righteous. And in another place he extendeth ỳ cause of the pardõ that deliuereth vs frõ ỳ curse of the law, to the whole life of Christ, saying: When the fulnes of time was come, God sent his son made of a woman, subiect to the law, to redeeme thẽ ỳ were vnder the law. And so affirmed ỳ in his very baptism was fulfilled one part of righteousnes, that he obediently did the commandement of his father. Finally, from the time that hee tooke vpon him the person of a seruant, he began to pay the raunsome to redeeme vs. But the Scripture to set out the manner of our saluation more certainely, doth ascribe this as peculiar and properly belonging to the death of Christ. Hee himselfe pronounced that he gaue his life to be a redemption for many. Paul teacheth that he died for our sins. Iohn Baptist cried out ỳ Christ came to take away the sins of the world, because he was the Lamb of God. In an other place Paul saith, that we are iustified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, because he is set forth the reconciler in his own blood. Againe, that we are iustified in his blood and reconciled by his death. Againe, hee that knew not sin, was made sin for vs, that we might be the righteousnes of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the number would be infinit, and many of them must be hereafter alleadged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beleefe, which they call the Apostles creede, it is very orderly passed immediatly from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the rest of his obedience excluded, which he performed in his life: As Paul comprehendeth it wholy from the beginning to the end in saying, that hee abased himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruaunt, and was obedient to his father to death death, euen the death of the crosse. And truely euen in the same death his willing submission hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, vnlesse it had been willingly offered, had nothing profited toward righteousnesse. Therefore, where the Lorde testified, that he gaue his soule for his sheepe, he expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. Ioh. 10. 15. According to the which meaning, Esaie saith, that he helde his peace like a lambe before the sherer. Esa. 53. 7. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went foorth and met the souldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of himselfe, and stood still to yeelde himselfe to iudgement to be pronounced vpon him. Ioh. 18. 4. Mat. 27. 2. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities vpon him, & it behoued that his obedience to his father, shoulde be this waie tried. And this was no slender shew of his incomparable loue towarde vs, to wrastle with horrible feare, and in the middest of these cruell tormentes to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might prouide for vs. And this is to be beleeued, that there could no sacrifice be well offered to God anie otherwise, but by this that Christ forsaking all his owne affection, did submit & wholly yelde himselfe to his fathers will. For proofe whereof, the Apostle doth fitly alleadge that testimonie of the Psalme: in the booke of the lawe it is writen of mee, that I may doe thy will, O God, I will, and thy law is in the midst of my heart. Then I saide: Loe, I come. Heb. 10. 5. Psal. 40. 8. But because trembling consciences find no rest but in a sacrifice & washing whereby sins are cleansed: therfore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Now forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due vnto vs, before the heauenly iudgement seat of God, therfore first of all is recited howe he was condemned before Ponce Pilate president of Iurie: that we should know that the punishment whereunto we were subiect, was iustly laide vpon vs. We could not escape the dreadfull iudgement of God: Christ, to deliuer vs from it, suffred himselfe to bee condemned before a mortal man, yea a wicked and heathen man. For the name of the president is expressed not onely to procure credite to the historie, but that we should learn that which Esaie teacheth, that that chastisement of our peace was vpon him, and that by his stripes we were healed. Esa. 53. 5. For to take away our damnation, euery kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to bee chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to himselfe, and taking our guiltinesse vppon himselfe, hee might deliuer vs from them both. If hee had beene murthered by theeues, or had beene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the common people: In suche a death there shoulde haue beene no apparance of satisfaction. But when hee was brought to bee arrained before the iudgement seate, when hee was accused and pressed with witnesses against him, and was by the mouth of the iudge condemned to die: by these tokens wee vnderstande, that hee did beare the person of a guiltie man and of an euill doer. And heere are two thinges to bee noted, whiche both were afore spoken by the prophecies of the Prophetes, and doe bring a singular comforte and confirmation of Fayth. For when wee heare that Christe was sent from the iudges seate to death, and was hanged among theeues, wee haue the fulfilling of that prophecie which is al leadged by the Euangeliſt. Hee was accounted among the wicked. And why ſo? euen to take vpon him the ſteede of a ſinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, becauſe hee ſuffered death not for cauſe of innocencie, but for ſinne. On the other ſide when wee heare that hee was acquited by the ſame mouth whereby hee was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more then once to beare witneſſe of his innocencie: let that come in our mind which is in the other prophet: that he repayed that which he had not taken awaie. And ſo wee ſhall beholde the perſon of a ſinner and euill doer repreſented in Chriſt: and by the open appearance of his innocencie it ſhall become plaine to ſee, that he was charged rather with other offence than his owne. He ſuffered therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and ſo by the ſolemne ſentence of the Preſident, was reckoned in the number of wicked doers: but yet not ſo, but ẏ he was by the ſame iudge at the ſame time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cauſe of condemnation in him. This is our acquitall, that the guiltineſſe which made vs ſubiect to puniſhment, is remoued vpon the heade of the Sonne of God. For this ſetting of one againſt the other, wee ought principally to holde faſt, leaſt wee tremble and bee carefull all our life long, as though the iuſt vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the ſonne of God hath taken vppon himſelfe.

The myſterie of the croſſe in the death of Chriſt.

6 Beſide that, the verie manner of his death is not without a ſingular myſterie. The Croſſe was accurſed, not onely by opinion of men, but alſo by decree of the lawe of God. Therefore when Chriſt was lifted vp to the Croſſe, hee made himſelfe ſubiect to the curſe: And ſo it behooued to bee done, that when the curſe was remoued from vs to him, we might bee deliuered from all curſe that for our ſinnes was prepared for vs, or rather did already reſt vpon vs. Which thing was alſo by ſhadowe expreſſed in the lawe. For the ſacrifices & ſatisfactorie oblations that were offered for ſinnes, were called Aſhemoth. Which worde properly ſignifieth ſinne it ſelfe. By which figuratiue chaunge of name, the holie Ghoſt meant to ſhew, that they were like vnto cleanſing plaiſters to draw out to themſelues, and beare the curſe due to ſinne. But that ſame which was figuratiuely repreſented in the ſacrifices of Moſes, is indeede deliuered in Chriſt the originall paterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gaue his owne ſoule to be an aſham, that is a ſatisfactorie oblation as the Propher calleth it, vppon the which our filth and puniſhment might bee caſt, and ſo ceaſe to bee imputed to vs. The Apoſtle teſtifieth the ſame thing more plainely, where he teacheth, that hee which knewe no ſinne, was by his father made ſinne for vs, that wee might bee made the righteouſneſſe of God in him. For the ſon of God being moſt cleane from all fault, did yet put vppon him the reproch and ſhame of our iniquities, and on the other ſide couered vs with his cleanneſſe. It ſeemeth that hee meant the ſame when he ſpeaketh of ſinne, that ſinne was condemned in his fleſh. For the Father deſtroyed the force of ſinne, when the curſe thereof was remoued, and laide vppon the fleſhe of Chriſt. It is therefore declared by this ſaying, that Chriſt was in his death offered vp to his father for a ſatisfactorie ſacrifice, that the whole ſatisfaction for ſinne being ended by his ſacrifice, wee might ceaſe to dread

the wrath of God. Nowe is it plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs al were laide vpon him, that is, that he entending to wipe away the filthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enterchanged imputation, couered with them. Of this, the crosse whereunto hee was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) redeemed vs from the curse of the law, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is euery one that hangeth on a tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where hee teacheth that Christ did beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Because by the verie token of the curse wee doe more plainly learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was laid vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstanded, that he tooke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerloden, but rather, that in taking it vpon him, he did treade downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueth acquitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paul doeth not without a cause honourably report the triumph that Christ obtained to himselfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame, had beene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he saieth, that the hande writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the Princely powers were spoyled and led openly. And no maruell: because (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternal spirite. And thereupon proceeded that turning of the nature of thinges. But that these thinges may take stedfast roote, and be throughly setled in our heartes, let vs alway thinke vppon his sacrifice and washing. For wee could not certainly beleeue that Christ was the ransome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had beene a sacrificed hoste. And therfore there is so often mention made of blood, where the Scripture sheweth the manner of our redeeming. Albeit the blood of Christ that was shedde, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to clense away our filthinesse.

7 It followeth in the Creede, that he was dead and buried. Where again it is to bee seene, howe he did euerie where put himselfe in our steed, to pay the price of our redemption. Death held vs bounde vnder his yoke. Christ in our steede did yeelde himselfe into the power of death, to deliuer vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that wee should not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeeme life for vs. But in this he differed frō vs, that he gaue himselfe to death, as it were to bee deuoured, not that hee should be swallowed vp with the gulfes of it, but rather that hee should swallowe vp it, of which we should haue been presently swallowed: that he gaue himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he should be oppressed with y power thereof, but rather that he shoulde ouerthrowe death which approched neere vs, yea, and had alreadie beaten vs downe and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Diuell, and might deliuer them that by feare of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of himselfe with vs, hee mortifieth our earthlie members, that they ſhould no more hereafter vſe their owne workes: and killeth our olde man, that it ſhould no more liue & beare fruite. And to the ſame purpoſe perteineth his buriall, that wee being partakers thereof, ſhould alſo bee buried to ſinne. For when the Apoſtle teacheth that wee are graffed into the likeneſſe of the death of Chriſt, and buried with him to the death of ſinne, that by his croſſe the worlde was crucified to vs, and wee to the worlde, that wee are dead together with him, hee doeth not onelie exhorte vs to expreſſe the example of Chriſtes death, but hee declareth that there is ſuch effectualneſſe in it, as ought to appeare in all Chriſtians, vnleſſe they will make his death vnprofitable and fruiteleſſe. Therefore in the death and buriall of Chriſt, there is offered vs a double benefite to bee enioyed, that is deliuerance from death, whereunto wee were become bonde, and the mortifying of our fleſh.

Chriſtes deſcēding into hell a neceſſary article of our faith, whereby to vnderſtande his lying in the graue were an idle fancie.

8 But it is not meete to ouerpaſſe his going downe to the helles, wherin is no ſmall importance to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the olde fathers, that that parte which is read in the Creed was not in olde time ſo much vſed in the Churches: yet in entreating of the ſumme of our doctrine, it is neceſſarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a verie profitable and not to bee deſpiſed myſterie of a right weightye matter. And there are alſo ſome of the olde writers that doe not leaue it out. Whereby wee maie geſſe, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not preſently but by litle & litle growe in vſe in the Churches. But this certainly is out of queſtion, that it proceeded of the common iudgement of all the godlie: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writinges make mention of Chriſtes going downe to the helles, although after diuerſe maner of expoſition. But by whome, or at what time it was firſt added, maketh litle to the purpoſe. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heede vnto, that we therein certainly haue a full and in all pointes perfect ſumme of our faith, wherinto nothing may be thruſt, but that which is taken out of the moſt pure worde of God. Nowe, if anie will not for preciſe curioſitie admit it into the Creede, yet ſhall it ſtraight way be made to appeare plainely, that it is of ſo great importance to the ſumme of our redemption, that if it bee loſt out, there is loſt a great parte of the fruite of the death of Chriſt. There are againe ſome that thinke, that there is no newe thing ſpoken in this article, but that in other wordes the ſame thing is repeated which was ſpoken before of his buriall: for as much as the word Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture often times vſed for the graue. I graunt that to bee true which they alleage of the ſignification of the worde, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue: but there are againſt their opinion two reaſons, by which I am eaſily perſwaded to diſſent from them. For what an idleneſſe were it, when a thing not harde to vnderſtande, hath once beene ſet out in playne & eaſie wordes, afterward with darker implication of words, rather to point towarde it than to declare it. For when two manners of ſpeaking that expreſſe one thing bee ioyned together, it behoueth that the later bee an expoſition of the former. But what an expoſition were this, if a man ſhoulde say thus: Whereas it is said that Christ was buried, therby is meant that he went down to hel? Againe, it is not likely that such a superfluous vaine repetition could haue crept into this abridgement, wherein the chiefe points of our faith are summarily noted in as fewe words as was possible. And I doubt not that so many as shal haue somewhat diligently weyed the matter it self, wil easily agree with me.

9 Some expound it otherwise, and say that Christ went downe to the soules of the fathers that died in the time of the law, to carrie them tidings, that the redemption was performed, and to deliuer them out of the prison wherein they were kept inclosed: & to the proofe hereof they do wrongfully draw testimonies out of the Psalme, that hee brake the brasen gates and yron barres. Againe, out of Zacharie, that hee redeemed them that were bounde, out of the pit wherein was no water. But whereas the Psalme speaketh of their deliuerances ỹ in farre countries are cast captiue into bondes, and Zacharie compareth the Babylonicall ouerthrowe, wherein the people was oppressed, to a drie pit or bottomlesse deapth, and therewithall teacheth that the saluation of the whole Church is as it were a comming out of the deepe helles: I wot not how it is come to passe, that they which came after, thought that there was a certaine place vnder the earth whereunto they haue fained the name of Limbus. But this fable, although they were great authors, and at this day many doe earnestly defende it for a trueth: is yet nothing else but a fable. For, to enclose the soules of dead men as in a prison, is verie childish. And what neede was it that Christes soule shoulde goe downe thither to set them at libertie? I do in deede willingly confesse, that Christ shined to them by the power of his spirit, that they might knowe that the grace which they had only tasted of by hope, was then deliuered to the worlde. And to this purpose may the place of Peter be probably applied, where he saith, that Christ came and preached to the spirites that were in a dongeon or prison, as it is commonly translated. For the verie processe of the text leadeth vs to this, that the faithfull which were dead before that time, were partakers of the same grace that we were: because he doth therby amplifie the force of Christes death, for that it pearced euen to the dead, when the godly soules enioyed the present sight of that visitatiõ which they had carefully looked for: on the other side it did more plainly appeare to the reprobate that they were excluded from all saluation. But whereas Peter in his saying maketh no distinction betweene them, that is not so to be taken, as though he mingled together the godly and vngodly without difference: but only he meant to teach that generally they both had one common feeling of the death of Christ.

To take hell for a lake vvhere the souls of the fathers vvere vvhich died before Christ. is a fabulous vanitie.

10 But concerning Christs going down to the hels, beside the consideration of the Creede, wee must seeke for a more certaine exposition, and wee assuredly haue such a one out of the word of God, as is not onely holy and godly, but also full of singular comfort. Christes death had bin to no effect, if he had suffred only a corporal death: but it behoued also ỹ he should feele the rigor of Gods vengeance that he might both appease his wrath and satisfie his iust iudgement. For which cause also it behoued that he should as it were hande to hande wrastle with the armies of the hels and the horror

Esa. 53 5. of eternall death. Wee haue euen nowe alledged out of the Prophet that the chastisement of our peace was layde vpon him: that hee was striken of his father for our sinnes, and brouſed for our infirmities. Whereby is meant, that he was put in the steede of wicked doers, as surety and pledge, yea, & as the verie guiltie person himself, to abide & suffer all the punishmentes that should haue beene laide vpon them: this one thing excepted, that he could not be holden stil of the sorrowes of death. Therefore it is no marueile if it be said that he went down to the hels, sith he suffered that death wherewith GOD in his wrath striketh wicked doers. And their exception is very fond, yea and to be be scorned, which say, that by this exposition the order is peruerted, becauſe it were an absurditie to set that after his buriall which went before it. For after the setting foorth of those thinges that Christ suffered in the sight of men, in very good order followeth that inuisible and incomprehensible iudgement which he suffered in the sight of God: that we shoulde knowe that not onely the body of Christ was giuen to be the price of our redemption, but that there was another greater and more excellent price payde in this, that in his soule he suffered the terrible torments of a damned and forsaken man.

Act. 2. 24.

Heb. 5. 7.

11 According to this meaning doth Peter say, that Christ rose againe hauing looſed the sorows of death, of which it was impossible that he shold be holden, or ouercome. He doth not name it simply death: but he expresseth that the sonne of God was wrapped in the sorrows of death, which proceede from the curse and wrath of God, which is the originall of death. For howe small a matter had it bin, careleſly & as it were, in sport to come forth to suffer death? But this was a true proofe of his infinite mercie, not to shun that death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no doubt that the same is the Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrues, where he writeth: that Christ was heard of his own Feare: some translate it Reuerence or pietie, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, & the verie maner of speaking proueth. Christ therefore praying with teares & mightie crie, is heard of his own feare: not to be free from death, but nor to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: becauſe in that place hee had but our person vpon him. And truely there can be imagined no more dreadful bottomles depth than for a man to feele himselfe forsaken & estranged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euen as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Euen thither wee see that Christ was throwen downe, so farre that by enforcement of distresse hee was compelled to cry out: My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that hee so spake rather according to the opinion of other, than as he felt in himself: ỳ is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is euident that this saying proceeded out of the verie anguish of the bottome of his heart. Yet doe we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemie or angrie with him. For how could he be angry with his beloued sonne, vpō whom his minde rested? Or how could Christ by his intercession appease his fathers wrath toward other, hauing him hatefully bent against himself? But this is our meaning: ỳ he suffred the grieuousnes of Gods rigor, for that he being striken & tormented with the hand of God, did feele al the tokens

of God when he is angrie & punisheth. Whereupon Hylarie argueth thus, that by this going downe we haue obteined this, that death is slaine. And in other places he agreeth with our iudgement, as where he sayth: The crosse, death, and hels are our life. Againe, in another place: The sonne of God is in the hels, but man is caried vp to heauen. But why do I alleadge the testimonie of a priuate man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a fruite of his victorie, ỳ they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage? It behoued therefore, that hee should ouercome that feare, that naturally doeth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which coulde not be done but by fighting with it. Moreouer, that his feare was no common feare or conceiued vpon a slender cause, shal by & by more plainly appeare. So by fighting hand to hand with the power of the diuel, with the horror of death with the paines of the hels, it came to passe, that he both had the victorie of them, and triumphed ouer them, that we now in death should no more feare those things, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some leaud men, although vnlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignorance, crie out that I do a hainous wrong to Christ, because it was against conueniencie of reason, that he should be fearefull for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauillation with saying, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperation, which is contrary to faith. First they do but maliciously moue controuersie of Christs feare & trembling, which the Euangelists do so plainly report. For a little before that the time of his death approched, he was troubled in spirit & passionate with heauines, & at his verie meeting with it, hee began more vehemently to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfait, that is too foule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truely teacheth, boldly confesse the sorrowfulnesse of Christ, vnlesse wee be ashamed of his crosse. And truely, if his soule had not bin partaker of paine, he had bin onely a redeemer for bodies. But it behooued that hee should wrastle, to raise vp them that laye throwen down. And his heauenly glorie is so nothing appaired therby, that euen herein gloriously shineth his goodnesse which is neuer sufficiently praised, that he refused not to take our weakenesse vpon him. From whence is also that comfort of our anguishes and sorrowes, which the Apostle setteth before vs: that this Mediator did feele our infirmities, that hee might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in miserie. They say: that that thing which is euil of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed vnto Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which ioyneth these two thinges together, that Christ was in all things tempted as we are, and yet that hee was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakenes of Christ should make vs afrayde, whereunto hee was not by violence or necessitie compelled, but by meere loue of vs, and by mercy was led to submit himselfe. And whatsoeuer he of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothing of his power. But in this one point are these backebiters deceiued, that they doe not perceiue in Christ an infirmitie cleane and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience. For whereas there can bee founde no moderation in our corrupt nature, where-where all our affections do with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they do wrong to measure the forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his vncorrupted state, then there was a moderatiō hauing force in all his affections, to restraine excesse. Whereby it might well be that hee was like vnto vs in sorrow, dread, & fearfulnes, & yet that by this marke hee differed from vs. Being so confuted, they leap to another cauillation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse & wrath of God frō which he knew himself to be safe. But let the godly readers wey how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more feareful than the most part of the verie rascall sort of men. Theeues and other euil doers do obstinately hast to death, many do with hautie courage despise it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancie or stout courage were it: for the sonne of God to be astonished and in a manner striken dead with feare of it? For euen that which among the common sort might be accounted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemencie of griefe, verie drops of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shewe to the eies of other, but when in a secrete corner whither he was gone out of company, he groned vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all doubt, that it was needefull that hee should haue Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted maner of comforting. How shameful a tenderues, as I said, should this haue bin, to be so farre tormented for feare of common death, as to melt in bloudie sweate, & not to be able to be comforted, but by sight of Angels? What? doth not that prayer thrise repeated, (Father if it be possible, let this cup depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitternesse of heart, shewe that Christ had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby appeareth that those triflers against whome I now dispute, do boldly babble vppon things that they knowe not, because they neuer earnestly considered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we be redeemed from the iudgement of God. But this is our wisdome, wel to vnderstand howe deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man should aske me, if Christ went then down to hell, when he prayed to escape that death: I answere, that then was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how greeuous & terrible tormentes he suffered, when hee knewe himselfe to stande to be arrained for our cause before the iudgement seat of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the spirite did hide it selfe, to giue place to the weakenesse of the flesh: yet must we know, ỹ the tentation by feeling of sorrowe & feare was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the sermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the sorrowes of death, because when hee felt himselfe as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue frō the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that his notable calling vpō God, when for extremitie of paine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsakē me? For though he was aboue measure grieued, yet he ceaseth not to cal him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreouer hereby is confuted aswel the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monothelites. Apollinaris fained that Christ had an eternall spirite in steade of a soule, so that he was only but half a man. As though he could cleanse our sinnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is y affection or wil of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his wee knowe was troubled for this purpose, to driue away feare, & bring peace & quietnes to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhood, which he willed according to his nature of Godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrarie affection. For here in is a plaine shewe of contrarietie. Father deliuer me from this houre. But euen herefore I came euen into this houre. Father glorifie thy nam. In which perplexitie yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in vs, euen then when wee most of all endeuour to subdue our selues. Iohn. 12, 27.

Heb. 4. 15.

13 Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which al that wee haue hitherto were but vnperfect. For sith there appeareth in the crosse, death, and buriall of Christ nothing but weakenesse: faith must passe beyonde all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therfore although wee haue in his death a full accomplishment of saluation, because by it both wee are reconciled to God, and his iust iudgement is satisfied, and the curse taken away, and the penaltie fully payde: yet wee are saide to be regenerate into a liuing hope, not by his death, but by his rising againe. For as he in rising againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victorie of our faith consisteth in the verie resurrection: but howe this is, is better expressed in the wordes of Paul. For hee sayeth, that Christ dyed for our sinnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue saide, that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe, righteousnesse was renewed and restored. For howe could hee by dying deliuer vs from death, if he himselfe had lyen still ouercome by death? How coulde he haue gotten victorie for vs, if himselfe had beene vanquished in fight? wherefore we do so part the matter of our saluation betweene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death wee say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousnesse was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meane of his resurrection, his death doeth shewe foorth her force and effect vnto vs. Therefore Paul affirmeth, that in his verie resurrection he was declared the sonne of God, because then at last he vttered his heauenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godhead, and a stedfast staye of our faith. As also in anorther place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirite. And in the same meaning in an other, where he entreateth of perfection, hee sayth: that I may knowe him and the power of his resurrection. Yet byandby after he adioyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the dead and gaue him glorie, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death should wauer, but that the power of God which keepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shewe it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the worde Resurrection, as oft as it is vsed seuerally. 1. Pet. 1, 3. Rom. 4, 25. 1. Cor. 13, 4. Phi. 3, 10. 1. Pet. 1, 21.

rally without ſpeaking of his death, ſo that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertaineth to his death. But foraſmuch as by riſing againe he obtained the crowne of conqueſt, ſo that there ſhould be both reſurrection & life: therefore Paul doth for good cauſe affirme that faith is deſtroyed, and the Goſpel is become vaine & deceitful, if the reſurrection of Chriſt be not faſtened in our hearts. Therefore in another place, after hee had gloried in the death of Chriſt againſt all the terrors of damnation, to amplifie the ſame, he ſaith further: Yea, the ſame He which died, is riſen vp againe, and now ſtandeth a Mediator for vs in the preſence of God. Furthermore, as we haue before declared, that vpon the partaking of his croſſe hangeth the mortification of our fleſh: ſo is it to be vnderſtanded, that by his reſurrection we obtaine another commoditie which aunſwereth that mortification. For (ſaith the Apoſtle) we are therefore graffed into ŷ likeneſſe of his death, that being partakers of his reſurrection, wee may walke in newneſſe of life. Therefore in another place: as he gathereth an argument of this that wee are dead together with Chriſt, to proue that we ought to mortifie our members vpon earth: likewiſe alſo, becauſe we are riſen vp with Chriſt, he gathereth thereupon that we ought to ſeeke for thoſe things that are aboue, and not thoſe that are vpon the earth. By which words we are not onely exhorted to be raiſed vp after the example of Chriſt, to follow a newneſſe of life: But we are taught that it is wrought by his power, that we are regenerate in to righteouſnes. We obtaine alſo a third fruit of his reſurrection, that wee are, as by an earneſt deliuered vs, aſſured of our owne reſurrection, of which we know that his reſurrection is a moſt certaine argument. Whereof hee diſputeth more at large in the fifteene chapter of his firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is ſaide, that hee roſe againe from the dead: in which ſaying is expreſſed the trueth both of his death & of his reſurrection: as if it had beene ſaid, that he did both dye the ſame death that other men naturally do dye, and receiued immortalitie in the ſame fleſh which he had put on mortall.

His aſcending into heauen.

14 To his reſurrection is not vnfitly adioyned his aſcending into heauen. For although Chriſt began more fully to ſet foorth his glory & power by riſing againe, for that he had nowe layd away that baſe & vnnoble eſtate of mortal life, and the ſhame of the croſſe: yet by his aſcending vp into heauen only, he truely began his kingdome. Which the Apoſtle ſheweth where he teacheth, that Chriſt aſcended to fulfil all things. Where in ſeeming of repugnancie he ſheweth that there is a goodly agreement: becauſe he ſo departed from vs, that yet his preſence might be more profitable to vs, which had beene penned in a baſe lodging of the fleſh, while he was conuerſant in earth. And therfore Iohn, after that he had rehearſed that notable calling, If any thirſt, let him come to me, &c. By and by ſaith, that the holy Ghoſt was not yet giuen to the faithful, becauſe Ieſus was not yet glorified. Which the Lorde himſelfe alſo did teſtifie to the Diſciples, ſaying: It is expedient for you that I goe away. For if I doe not goe away, the holy Ghoſt ſhall not come. But hee giueth them a comfort for his corporall abſence, that he wil not leaue them as parentleſſe, but wil come againe to them after a certaine manner, in deede inuiſible, but yet more to be deſired, becauſe they were then taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enioyneth, and the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithful, not only to make them liue blessedly, but also to die happily. And truely we see how much greater abundance of his spirit he then poured out, how much more royally he then aduanced his kingdome, how much greater power he then shewed, both in helping his, and in ouerthrowing his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he toke away the presence of his body out of our sight: not to cease to be present with the faithfull that yet wandered in the earth, but with more present power to gouerne both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the ende of the world, he performed by this his ascending, by which as his body was lifted vp aboue all heauens, so his power and effectuall working was powred and spred abroad beyonde all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christ (saith he) was to goe by death to the right hande of the father, from whence he is to come to iudge the quicke and the dead: and that likewise in bodily presence according to the sound doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in another place more largely & plainly: According to an vnspeakable & inuisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you al the dayes, euē to the end of the world. But according to the flesh which the worde tooke vpon him, according to that that he was borne of the virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken down from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was laide in the graue, that hee was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shal not alway haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuersant according to the presence of his body fourty daies with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, not following him, he ascended into heauen & is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hand of his father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of maiestie. Therefore according to the presence of his maiestie, wee alway haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truely said to his disciples: but me ye shall not alway haue. For the Church had him a fewe daies according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

15 Wherefore, it by & by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hand of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whome they commit their office to rule & gouerne in their steede. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father wil be exalted & reigne by his hand: was receiued to sit at his right hand; as if it had bin said, that he was inuested in the dominion of heauen & earth, solemnly entred vpon the possession of the gouernement committed vnto him, and that he not only entred vpon it, but also continueth in it til he come downe to iudgement. For so doeth the Apostle expounde it, when he sayth thus: The father hath set him at his right hande, aboue all principalitie & power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not only in this worlde, but in the worlde to come, &c. Hee hath put all thinges vnder his feete,

Now you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heauenly and earthly may with admiration looke vpon his maiestie, be gouerned with his hand, behold his countenance, and be subiect to his power. And the Apostles meane nothing else, when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednesse is onely meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Actes, Stephen testifieth that he sawe him standing, because wee speake not here of the gesture of his body, but of the maiestie of his dominion: so that to sit is nothing else, but to be chiefe iudge in the heauenly iudgement seate.

Act.7.56.

Three collections of faith out of Christes ascending & sitting in heauen.

16 Hereupon doth faith gather manifold fruit: For it learneth, that the Lorde by his ascending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kingdome, which before had bin stopped vp by Adam. For when he entred into it in our flesh as in our name, therupon followeth that which the Apostle saith, that we do alreadie in him after a certaine manner sit in heauen. For that wee doe not with bare hope looke for heauen, but alreadie in our head we possesse it. Moreouer faith perceiueth that he sitteth with his father to our great benefit. For he is entred into a sanctuarie not made with hands, & there appeareth before the face of the father a continual aduocat & intercessor for vs: he so turneth the fathers eyes to his righteousnes, that he turneth them away from our sinnes: He so reconcileth his mind vnto vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs a way & passage to his throne, filling it with grace & mercifulnes, which otherwise would haue bin ful of horror to wretched sinners. Thirdly, faith conceiueth his power, wherin consisteth our strength, might, wealth, & glorying against the hels. For ascending into heauen he led captiuitie captiue, & spoiling his enemies he enriched his people, & daily filleth them with heapes of spirituall riches. He sitteth therefore on high, that from thence pouring out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a spiritual life, sanctifie with his spirite, and garnish his church with the diuerse gifts of his grace, preserue it safe against all hurtes by his protection, restrain with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crosse & of our saluation: finaly, hold al power, both in heauen & in earth, til he haue ouerthrowen all his enemies which are also our enemies, & made perfect the building vp of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdome: this is the power that his father hath giuen him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to iudge the quicke & the dead.

His comming to iudge quick and dead at the last day.

17 Christ doeth in deede here shewe to them that be his, plaine proues of his power present among them: but because vnder the basenes of flesh his kingdom doth in a maner lie hidde in earth, therfore for good cause is faith called to thinke vpon that visible presence, which he will openly shewe at the last day. For he shal in visible forme come down from heauen, euen such as he was seene to goe vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnspeakable maiestie of his kingdom, with bright glistering of immortalitie, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therfore we are bidden to looke for him to come our redeemer at that day, when he shal seuer ỹ lambes from ỹ goates, the chosen from the forsaken: & there shalbe none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his iudgement. For frō the furtheſt corners of the worlde shal be heard the ſounde of the trumpet, wherewith all ſhal bee called to his iudgement ſeat, both they that ſhall be found aliue at that day, and they whom death hath before taken out of the companie of the quicke. Some there bee that in this place expounde the wordes of the quicke and the dead otherwiſe: and wee ſee that ſome of the old writers did ſtick in doubt vpon the conſtruction of this article. But as the aforeſaid meaning is plaine & eaſie to perceiue: ſo doth it better agree with the Creede which is euident that it was written according to the capacitie of the common people. And heerewith nothing diſagreeth that which the Apoſtle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which ſhall remaine in mortall life at the laſt iudgement ſhal not dye after a naturall manner and order: yet that chaunge which they ſhall ſuffer, becauſe it ſhall be like a death, is not vnproperly called death. It is indeede certaine, that not all ſhall ſleepe, but all ſhall be chaunged. What meaneth ỹ? In one moment their mortall life ſhall periſh and be ſwallowed vp and be vtterlie transformed into a new nature. This periſhing of the fleſh no man can deny to be a death: and yet in the mean time it remaineth true, that the quick and the dead ſhall be ſummoned to the iudgement: becauſe ỹ dead that are in Chriſt ſhall firſt riſe, and then they ỹ ſhall remain and be liuing, ſhall with them be ſodenly taken vp into the aire to meete the Lorde. And truely it is likely that this article was taken out of the ſermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, & out of the ſolemne proteſtation of Paul to Timothy.

Mat.25.31. 1.Theſ.4.16. Heb.9.27. 1.Cor.15.51. 1.Theſ.4.16. Act.10.42. 2.Tim.4.1.

A comfort to vs to knowe that our Sauiour ſhal be our iudge.

18 Hereupon ariſeth a ſingular comfort, when we heare that he is iudge, which hath already appointed vs parteners with him in iudging: ſo far is it of, that he will go vp into the iudgement ſeate to condemne vs. For howe ſhoulde the moſt mercifull prince deſtroy his owne people? howe ſhoulde the head ſcatter abroade his owne members? how ſhould the patrone condemne his owne clients? For if the Apoſtle dare crie out, that while Chriſt is interceſſour for vs, there can none come foorth that can condemne vs: it is much more true, that Chriſt himſelfe being our interceſſor, will not cōdemne them whome he hath receiued into his charge and tuition. It is truely no ſmall aſſuredneſſe, that we ſhal be brought before no other iudgement ſeate, but of our owne redeemer, from whome our ſaluation is to bee looked for: moreouer that he which now by the Goſpell promiſeth eternall bleſſedneſſe, ſhall then by ſitting in iudgement perfourme his promiſe. Therefore to this end the Father hath honoured the ſonne, in giuing him all iudgement, that ſo he hath prouided for the conſciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the iudgement. Hitherto I haue followed ỹ order of the Apoſtles Creede, becauſe whereas it ſhortly in fewe wordes conteineth the cheefe articles of our redemption, it may ſerue vs for a Table, wherein we doe diſtinctly and ſeuerally ſee thoſe thinges that are in Chriſt worthy to be taken heede vnto. I call it the Apoſtles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the author of it. It is truely by great conſent of the old writers aſcribed to the Apoſtles, either becauſe they thought that it was by common trauell written and ſet out by the Apoſtles, or for that they iudged that this abridgement beeing faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, deliuered by the hands of the Apoſtles, was worthie to be confirmed with ſuch a title. And I take it for no doubt, that whence ſoeuer it proceeded at the firſt, it hath euen from the firſt beginning of the Church, and from the verie time of the Apoſtles, beene vſed as a publike confeſſion, and receiued by conſent of all men. And it is likely that it was not priuately written by any one man, foraſmuch as it is euident that euen from the fartheſt age it hath alwaye continued of ſacred authoritie and credite among all the godly. But that thing which is onely to be cared for, wee haue wholy out of controuerſie, that the whole Hiſtorie of our faith is ſhortly and well in diſtinct order rehearſed in it, and that there is nothing conteyned in it that is not ſealed with ſounde teſtimonies of Scripture. Which being vnderſtanded, it is to no purpoſe either curiouſly to doubt, or to ſtriue with any man who were the authour of it: vnleſſe perhappe it be not enough for ſome man to bee aſſured of the trueth of the holy Ghoſt, but if hee doe alſo vnderſtande eyther by whoſe mouth it was ſpoken, or by whoſe hande it was written.

Rom.5.33. Iohn.5.22.

All good things to be ſought and found in Chriſt alone.

Act. 4.12. 1.Cor.1.30.

19 But foraſmuch as wee doe ſee, that the whole ſumme of our ſaluation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Chriſt, wee muſt beware, that wee doe not drawe away from him any parte thereof be it neuer ſo little. If we ſeeke for ſaluation, wee are taught by the verie nawe of Ieſus, that it is in him, if wee ſeeke for any other giftes of the ſpirite, they are to bee found in his annoynting, if wee ſeeke for ſtrength, it is in his dominion: if wee ſeeke for cleanneſſe, it is in his conception, if wee ſeeke for tender kindneſſe, it ſheweth it ſelfe in his birth, whereby hee was made in all things like vnto vs, that he might learne to ſorrow with vs: if wee ſeeke for redemption, it is in his paſſion: if wee ſeeke for abſolution, it is in his condemnation: if wee ſeeke for releaſe of the curſe, it is in his croſſe, if wee ſeeke for ſatisfaction, it is in his ſacrifice: if wee ſeeke for cleanſing, it is in his bloud: if wee ſeeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hels: if wee ſeeke for mortification of the fleſh, it is in his buriall: if wee ſeeke for newneſſe of life, it is in his reſurrection: if wee ſeeke for immortalitie, it is in the ſame: if wee ſeeke for the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen, it is in his entrance into heauen: if wee ſeeke for defenſe, for aſſuredneſſe, for plentie and ſtore of all good things, it is in his kingdome: if wee ſeeke for a dreadleſſe looking for the iudgement, it is in the power giuē to him to iudge. Finally, ſith the treaſures of all ſortes of good thinges are in him, let vs drawe thence and from no where elſe, euen till wee be full withall. For they which being not content with him alone, are carried hither and thither into diuerſe hopes, although they haue principal regarde to him, yet euen in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any part of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit ſuch diſtruſt can not creepe in, where the aboundance of his good giftes hath once beene well knowen.

Heb.12.17.

The xvii. Chapter.

That it is truely and properly ſaid, that Chriſt hath deſerued Gods fauour and ſaluation for vs.

This

THis queſtion is alſo to be aſſoiled for an addition. For there are ſome ſuttle men after a wrong manner, which although they confeſſe that we obtaine ſaluation by Chriſte, yet can not abide to heare the name of deſeruing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obſcured: and ſo they will haue Chriſte to be onely the inſtrument, or miniſter, not the authour, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deede I confeſſe, that if a man will ſet Chriſte ſimplie and by him ſelfe againſt the iudgement of God, then there ſhall be no roome for deſeruing: becauſe there can not be founde in man any worthineſſe that may deſerue the fauour of God. But, as Auguſtine moſt truely writeth, the moſt cleare light of predeſtination and grace is our Sauiour himſelfe, the man Chriſt Ieſus, which hath obteined ſo to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deſeruinges of workes or of faith going before. I beſeech you let me bee aunſwered, whereby that ſame Man deſerued to be taken vp by the Worde that is coeternall with the father into one perſon, and ſo to be the onely begotten ſonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the verie fountaine of grace, from whom according to the meaſure of euerie one, it floweth abroade into all his members. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made a Chriſtian, by which that ſame man from his beginning was made Chriſt. Againe in another place: there is no plainer example of predeſtination than the Mediatour him ſelfe. For he that made of the ſeede of Dauid a man righteous ẏ neuer ſhould be vnrighteous, without any deſeruing of his will going before, euen the ſame hee doth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that heade: and ſo foorth as there followeth. Therefore when we ſpeake of Chriſtes deſeruing, we doe not ſay that in him is the beginning of deſeruing, but we climbe vp to the ordinance of GOD, which is the firſt cauſe thereof: becauſe God of his owne meere good will appointed him Mediatour, to purchaſe ſaluation for vs. And ſo is the deſeruing of Chriſt vnfitly ſet againſt the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that thinges orderly one vnder another doe not diſagree. And therefore it may wel ſtand together, that mans iuſtification is free by the mere mercy of God, and that there alſo the deſeruing of Chriſt come betweene which is contained vnder the mercie of God. But againſt our workes are aptlie ſet, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, and the obedience of Chriſt, either of them in their degree. For Chriſt coulde not deſerue any thing but by the good pleaſure of God, and but becauſe he was appointed to this purpoſe, with his ſacrifice to appeaſe the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a ſumm: becauſe the deſeruing of Chriſt hangeth vpon the onely grace of God, which appointed vs this meane of ſaluation, therefore as well the ſame deſeruing, as that grace, is fitly ſet againſt all the workes of men.

Chriſts meriting our ſaluatiõ is not oppoſite to Gods free beſtowing it, but both are repugnant vnto all deſeruing.

Act. 3. 10.

Lib. 1. de præ. ſanctorum.

De bono perſeuerant. ca. vlt.

1 This diſtinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God ſo loued the world, ẏ he gaue his only begotten ſonne, ẏ whoſoeuer beleeueth in him, ſhal not periſh. Wee ſee how the loue of God holdeth the firſt place, as the ſoueraigne cauſe or orignall, & then followeth faith in Chriſt, as the ſecond or neerer cauſe. If any man take exception & ſay, that Chriſt is but the formal cauſe, he doth more diminiſh his power than the wordes

The grace of God hath appointed the vvorthines of his ſonne for a meane to make vs ſonnes, vvho in our ſelues are by nature enemies.

may beare. For if we obtaine righteousnes by faith that resteth vpon him, then is the matter of our saluatiō to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly proued. Not that we firſt loued him, but he firſt loued vs, and Ioh.4. ſent his ſonne to be the appeaſing for our ſinnes. In theſe wordes is clerely ſhewed, that God to the end that nothing ſhould withſtande his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Chriſt. And this worde Appeaſing, is of great weight: becauſe God after a certaine vnſpeakeable maner, euen the ſame time that he loued vs, was alſo angrie with vs, vntil he was reconciled in Chriſt. And to this purpoſe ſerue all thoſe ſayings: He is the ſatisfaction for our ſinnes. Againe: It pleaſed God by him to reconcile
1.Ioh.2.2. all things to himſelfe, appeaſing himſelfe through the bloud of the Croſſe by him, &c. Againe, God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world to himſelfe
Col.1.20. 2.Cor.5.19. not imputing to men their ſinnes. Againe, hee accepted vs in his beloEph.2.16. ued ſonne. Againe, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the croſſe. The reaſon of this myſtery is to be fetched out of the firſt
Eph.1.6. chapter to the Epheſians, where Paul, after that he had taught that we were choſen in Chriſt, addeth therwithall, that we haue obtained fauour in him. How did God beginne to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the making of the worlde, but becauſe he vttered his loue when he was reconciled by the bloud of Chriſt? For ſith God is the fountaine of all righteouſneſſe, it muſt needes be, that man ſo long as he is a ſinner, haue God his enemy and his iudge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteouſnes, ſuch as is deſcribed by Paul: He made him that had done no ſinne, 2.Cor.5.21. to be ſinne for vs, that we might be the righteouſneſſe of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtained free righteouſneſſe by that ſacrifice of Chriſt, that we ſhuld pleaſe God, which by nature are the children of wrath and by ſinne eſtraunged from him Bnt this diſtiction is alſo meant ſo oft as the grace of Chriſt is ioined to the loue of God. Whereupon followeth, that he giueth vs of his owne ſ which he hath purchaſed: For otherwiſe it would not agree with him, that this praiſe is giuen him ſeuerally from his father, that it is his grace and proceedeth from him.

3 But it is truly and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Chriſt by his obedience hath purchaſed vs fauour with his father. For this I take for a thing confeſſed, that if Chriſt hath ſatisfied for our ſinnes, if he hath ſuffered the puniſhment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeaſed God, finally, if he being righteous, hath ſuffered for the vnrighteous, then is ſaluation purchaſed for vs by his righteouſneſſe: which is as much in effect as to deſerue it. But, as Paul witneſſeth, we are reconciled
Rom.5.11. and haue receiued reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaning is: that God, to whom we were hateful by reſon of ſinne, is by the death of his ſonne appeaſed, ſo that he might be fauourable vnto vs. And the compariſon of contraries that followeth a litle after, is diligently to be noted as Rom.5.19. by the tranſgreſſion of one man, many were made ſinners: ſo alſo by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the ſinne of Adam we were eſtranged from God and ordained to deſtruction, ſo by the obedience of Chriſt we are receiued into fauour as righteous.

And

And the future time of the verbe doth not exclude preſent righteouſneſſe, as appeareth by the proceſſe of the text: For hee had ſaid before, that the free gift was of manie ſinnes vnto iuſtification.

4 But when we ſay, that grace is purchaſed vs by the deſeruing of Chriſt, we meane this, that we are cleanſed by his bloud, & that his death was a ſatisfaction for our ſinnes. His bloud cleanſeth vs from ſinne. This bloud is it that is ſhed for remiſſion of ſinne. If this be the effect of his bloudſhed, that ſinnes be not imputed vnto vs: it followeth, that with that price the iudgement of God is ſatisfied. To which purpoſe ſerueth that ſaying of Iohn the Baptiſt: Behold the Lambe of God that taketh away the ſinne of the world. For he ſetteth in compariſon Chriſt againſt all the ſacrifices of the lawe, to teach that in him only was fulfilled that which thoſe figures ſhewed. And we know, what Moſes ech where ſaith: Iniquitie ſhall be cleanſed, ſinne ſhall be put away & forgiuen. Finally we are verie well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Chriſt, And this point the Apoſtle ſetteth out in the epiſtle to the Hebrewes, verie fitlie taking this principle, that remiſſion is not wrought without ſhedding of bloud. Whereupon he gathereth, that Chriſt for the aboliſhing of ſinne, appeared once for all by his ſacrifice. Againe: that he was offered vp to take away the ſinnes of many. And he had ſaid before, that not by the bloud of goates or of calues, but by his owne bloud he once entred into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reaſoneth: If the bloud of a calfe do ſanctifie according to the cleannes of the fleſh, that much more conſciences are cleanſed by the bloud of Chriſt from dead workes: it eaſily appeareth that the grace of Chriſt is too much diminiſhed, vnleſſe we grant vnto his ſacrifice the power of cleanſing, appeaſing and ſatisfying. As a litle after he addeth: This is the mediator of the new teſtament, that they which are called, may receiue the promiſe of eternall inheritance by meane of death for the redemption of ſinnes going before, which remained vnder the law. But ſpecially it is conuenient to weye the relation which Paul deſcribeth, that he became curſe for vs. &c. For it were ſuperfluous, yea & an abſurditie, that Chriſt ſhould be charged with curſe, but for this intent that he paying that which other did owe, ſhould purchaſe righteouſnes for them. Alſo the teſtimonie of Eſay is plaine that the chaſtiſement of our peace was layde vpon Chriſt, and that we obtained health by his ſtripes. For if Chriſt had not ſatisfied for our ſinnes, it could not haue beene ſaid, that he appeaſed God by taking vpon him the paine whereunto we were ſubiect. Wherewith agreeth that which followeth in the ſame place: For the ſinne of my people I haue ſtriken him. Let vs alſo recite the expoſition of Peter, which ſhal leaue nothing dobtful: that he did beare our ſinne, vpon the tree. For he ſaith, that ỹ burthen of damnation from which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Chriſt.

What is meant by ſaying that Chriſtes deſeruing purchaſed grace.

5 And the Apoſtles do plainly pronounce, that he paid the price of ranſome to redeem vs from the guiltines of death. Being iuſtified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Chriſt, whome God hath ſet to be the propitiatorie by faith which is in his bloud. Paul commendeth the grace of God in this point, becauſe hee hath giuen the price of redemption in the death of Chriſt: and then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his bloud, that hauing obteined righteousnesse, wee may stand boldly before the iudgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that wee are redeemed not by golde and siluer, but by the precious bloude of the vnspotted Lambe. For the comparison also woulde not agree, vnlesse with that price satisfaction had been made for sins: for which reason Paul saith that we are preciously bought. Also that other saying of his would not stand together. There is one mediatour that gaue him selfe to be a redemption, vnlesse the paine had beene cast vpon him which we had deserued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the bloude of Christe is the forgiuenesse of sinnes: as if he shoulde haue saide, that wee are iustified or acquited before God, because that bloude aunswereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hande writing which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant the paiment or recompence that acquiteth vs from guiltinesse. Ther is also great weight in these wordes of Paul: If wee bee iustified by the workes of the lawe, then Christ died for nothing. For heereby we gather, that wee must fetch from Christe that which the lawe woulde giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtaine by the grace of Christe that, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he saide: He that doth these thinges, shall liue in them. Which he no lesse plainely confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioch, affirming that by beleeuing in Christe we are iustified from all those thinges, from which we could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. For if the keeping of the lawe be righteousnesse, who can denie that Christe deserued fauour for vs, when taking that burden vppon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if we our selues had kept the lawe? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterward writeth to the Galathians: God sent his son subiect to the law, ỳ he might redeem those that were vnder the lawe. For to what ende serued that submission of his, but that he purchased to vs righteousnesse, taking vppon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousnes without works, whereof Paul speaketh, because the righteousnes is reckned to vs which was found in Christe onely. And truly for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we finde in him the substaunce of life. And that power proceedeth from nothing else, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousnesse. As Paul saith, that he gaue himself a sacrifice of sweet sauour. And in another place: He died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our iustification. Heereuppon is gathered, that not onelie saluation is giuen vs by Christe, but also that for his sake his father is nowe fauourable vnto vs. For there is no doubt but ỳ is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esay saying: I will doe it for mine owne sake, and for Dauid my seruants sake. Whereof the Apostle is a right good witnesse, where he saith: Your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not expressed, yet Iohn after his accustomed manner signifieth him by this pronoune He. In which sense also the Lorde pronounceth: As I liue because of my father, so shall ye also liue because of mee. Wherewith agreeeth that which Paul saith, It is giuen you because of Christ, not onely to beleeue leeue in him, but also to suffer for him.

6 But to demaund, whether Christ deserued for himselfe, (as Lombard, & the other scholemen do) is no lesse fooliſh curioſitie, than it is a raſh determination when they affirme it. For what needed the ſonne of God to come downe to purchace any newe thing for himſelfe? And the Lorde declaring his owne counſell, doth put it wholy out of doubt. For it is not ſaide, that the father prouided for the commodity of his ſonne in his deſeruinges, but that he deliuered him to death, and ſpared him not, becauſe he loued the world. And the Prophets manners of ſpeaking are to be noted, as, A childe is born to vs. Againe: Reioice thou daughter of Sion: beholde thy king commeth to thee Alſo that confirmation of loue ſhould be very cold, which Paul ſetteth out, that Chriſt ſuffered death for his enimies. For thereupon we gather, ẏ he had no reſpect of himſelf: and that ſame he plainely affirmeth in ſaying, I ſanctify my ſelfe for them. For he that giueth away the fruite of his holines vnto other, doth thereby teſtify that hee purchaſeth nothing for himſelfe. And truely this is moſt worthily to bee noted, that Chriſte, to giue him ſelfe wholie to ſaue vs, did after a certain manner forget himſelf. But to this purpoſe they doe wrongfullie draw this teſtimonie of Paul: Therefore the father hath exalted him, & giuẽ him a name, &c. For by what deſeruings could man obtaine to be iudge of the world, & the head of the Aungels, & to enioy the ſoueraigne dominion of God, & that in him ſhould reſt that ſame maieſtie, the thouſandth part whereof all the powers of men & Angels can not reach vnto? But the ſolution therof is eaſie & plaine, that Paul doth not there entreat of the cauſe of exalting of Chriſt, but onely to ſhew the effect enſuing thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meant by that which is ſpoken in another place, that it behooueth that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer, and ſo enter into the glorie of his Father.

Whether Chriſt did merit for himſelfe, it is both curioſitie to demand and raſhneſſe to anſwere.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION WHICH intreateth of the manner how to receiue the grace of Chriſt, and what profits do growe vnto vs, & what effects enſue thereof.

The firſt Chapter.

That thoſe thinges vvhich are ſpoken of Chriſt, doe profite vs by ſecrete vvorking of the holy Ghoſt.

NOw it is to be ſeene how thoſe good things do come vnto vs, which the Father hath giuen to his onely begotten ſonne, not for his own priuate vſe, but to enrich them that were without them & needed them.

No benefit commeth by Chriſt to vs till the bond of the ſpirit haue vnited vs vnto him.

them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuered from him, whatsoeuer he suffered or did for the saluation of mankind, is vnprofitable and nothing auaileth for vs. Therefore that hee may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behoueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause hee is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is saide, that we are graffed into him, and did put on him. For (as I haue before said) all that euer he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we growe together into one with him. But although it be true that we obteine this by faith: yet forasmuch as wee see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by ỹ Gospel, therefore verie reason teacheth vs to climbe vp higher, & to enquire of the secrete effectual working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enioy Christ and all his good things. I haue before entreated of the eternall godhead & essence of the spirite, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and bloud that the spirite should testifie of him, least the saluation that he hath purchaced, should slip away from vs. For as there are alleadged three witnesses in heauen, the Father, the Worde, and the Spirit, so are there also three in earth, Water, Bloud, and the Spirite. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirit twise repeated, which we feele to be engrauen in our heartes in steede of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing & sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the spirite vnto obedience and sprinkeling of the bloud of Christ. By which wordes hee telleth vs, that to the entent the shedding of that holy bloud shoulde not become voide, our soules are clensed with it by the secret watering of the holy Spirite. According whereunto Paul also speaking of cleansing and iustification, saith that wee are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ and in the Spirite of our God. Finally, this is the summe, that the holy Spirite is the bonde wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For proofe whereof also doe serue all that wee haue taught in the last booke before this, concerning his annointing.

Eph.4.15. Rom.8.29. Rom.11.17. Gal.3.16.

1.Iohn.5.7.

1.Pet.1.2

The spirit being Christes after a peculiar maner both to haue & to bestow, is by propertie his in fulnesse, & in measure ours by guift.

2 But that this, being a matter specially worthie to bee knowen, may bee made more certeinly euident, wee must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirit after a certaine peculiar manner, to the end that he might seuer vs from the world, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternal inheritance. For this cause hee is called the Spirite of sanctification, because hee doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankinde as in all other liuing creatures, but also is in vs the roote and seede of heauenly life. Therefore the Prophets do principally commend the kingdome of Christ by this title of prerogatiue, that then should florish more plentifull aboundance of the Spirite. And notable aboue all the rest is that place of Ioel: In that day I wil powre of my Spirit vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seeme to restraine the gifts of the Spirit to the office of a prophecying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightening of his Spirite will make

thoſe his ſcholers which before were vnskilfull and voyde of all heauenlie doctrine. Now foraſmuch as God the Father doeth for his ſonnes ſake giue vs his holy Spirite, and yet hath left with him the whole fulneſſe thereof, to the ende that hee ſhould be a miniſter and diſtributer of his liberality: hee is ſometime called the ſpirite of the father, and ſometime the Spirite of the Sonne. Ye are not (ſaith Paul) in the fleſh, but in the Spirite, for the Spirite of God dwelleth in you. But if any haue not the ſpirite of Chriſt, hee is not his. And hereupon he putteth vs in hope of full renuing, for that hee which raiſed vp Chriſt from the dead, ſhall quicken our mortall bodies becauſe of his Spirite dwelling in vs. For it is no abſurditie, that to the Father be aſcribed the praiſe of his owne giftes, whereof hee is the author: and yet that the ſame be aſcribed to Chriſt, with whome the giftes of the ſpirite are left, that he may giue them to thoſe that bee his. Therefore he calleth all them that thirſt, to come to him to drinke. And Paul teacheth that the Spirite is diſtributed to euery one, according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. And it is to be knowen, that he is called the Spirite of Chriſt, not only in reſpect that the eternal Word of God is with the ſame ſpirite ioyned with the Father, but alſo according to his perſon of Mediator, becauſe if hee had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the ſecond Adam giuen from heauen, to be a quickening Spirit: whereby Paul compareth the ſingular life that the ſonne of God breatheth into them that be his that they maie bee all one with him, with the natural life that is alſo common to the reprobate. Likewiſe where he wiſheth to the faithfull the fauour of Chriſt and the loue of God, hee ioyned withall the common partaking of the Spirite, without which no man can taſte neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifulneſſe of Chriſt. As alſo he ſaith in another place: The loue of God is powred out into our heartes by the holy Spirite that is giuen vs.

The titles which Scripture giueth the ſpirite, teache that without it Chriſt is altogether dead & vnprofitable vnto vs.

3 And here it ſhalbee profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture ſetteth out the holie Spirite, where it entreateth of beginning & whole reſtoring of our ſaluation. Firſt, he is called the Spirite of adoption, becauſe he is a witneſſe vnto vs of the free goodwill of God, wherwith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloued onelie begotten Sonne, that he might bee a Father vnto vs, and doth encourage vs to praie boldelie, yea and doth miniſter vs wordes to crie without feare, Abba, Father: by the ſame reaſon hee is called the earneſt pledge, and ſeale of our inheritance, becauſe he ſo giueth life from heauen to vs wandring in the worlde, and being like to dead men, that wee may be aſſured that our ſoule is in ſafegard vnder the faithfull keeping of God, for which cauſe hee is alſo called life, by reaſon of righteouſnes. And foraſmuch as by his ſecrete watering he maketh vs fruitful to bring foorth the buddes of righteouſneſſe, he is oftentimes called water as in Eſaie: Al ye that thirſt come to the waters. Againe: I will poure out my ſpirit vpon the thirſtie: & floods vpon the drie land: wherewith agreeth that ſaying of Chriſt, which I did euē now alleadge. If any thirſt let him come to me. Albeit ſometime he is ſo called, by reaſon of his power to purge and cleanſe, as in Ezechiel where the Lord promiſeth cleane waters wherewith he will waſhe his people from filthineſſe. And foraſmuch as hee reſtoreth and nourisheth into liuely quickneſſe, them vpon whom he hath powred the liquor of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oile and annoynment. Againe becauſe in continually ſeething out & burning vp the vices of our luſt, he ſetteth our heartes on fire with the loue of God and zeale of godlineſſe, he is alſo for this effect worthily called fire. Finally, hee is deſcribed vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence doe flowe vnto vs all heauenly riches, or the hande of God, wherewith hee vſeth his power: becauſe by the breath of his power he ſo breatheth diuine life into vs, that wee are not now ſtirred by our ſelues, but ruled by his ſtirring & mouing: ſo that if there be anie good thinges in vs, they bee the fruites of his grace: but our own giftes without him, be darkneſſe of mind, and peruerſneſſe of hearr. This point is ſet out plainly enough, that till our mindes bee bent vpon the holie Ghoſt, Chriſt lieth in a manner idle, becauſe we coldly eſpie him without vs, yea & farre away from vs. But wee knowe that hee profiteth none other but them whoſe head he is, and the firſt begotten among brethren, and them which haue put on Him. This conioyning only maketh that, as concerning vs, hee is come not vnprofitably with the name of Sauiour. And for proofe hereof ſerueth that holy mariage, whereby we are made fleſh of his fleſh, & bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirite onely he maketh him ſelfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the ſame Spirite wee are made his members, ſo that hee conteineth vs vnder him, and wee againe poſſeſſe him.

Ieſu the ſpirite vvhich vvorketh faith in our heartes.

4 But foraſmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the moſt part referred all thoſe thinges, that wee commonly finde ſpoken to expreſſe his force & working: becauſe he bringeth vs into the light of the Goſpell by nothing but by faith: as Iohn Baptiſt teacheth, that this prerogatiue is giuē to them that beleeue in Chriſt, that they be the children of God which are borne not of fleſh and blood, but of God: where ſetting God againſt fleſhe and blood, he affirmeth it to be a ſupernaturall gift that they receiue Chriſt by faith, who otherwiſe ſhoulde remaine ſubiect to their owne infidelitie. Like whereunto is that anſweare of Chriſt: Fleſh and blood hath not reuealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heauen. Theſe thinges I doe now but ſhortlie touch, becauſe I haue alreadie intreated of them at large. And like alſo is that ſaying of Paul, that the Epheſians were ſealed vp with the holie ſpirite of promiſe. For Paul ſheweth that hee is an inward teacher, by whoſe working the promiſe of ſaluation pearceth into our mindes, which otherwiſe ſhoulde but beate the aire or our eares. Likewiſe, when he ſaieth, that the Theſſalonians were choſen of God in the ſanctification of the ſpirite and beleeuing of the trueth: by which ioyning of them together, hee briefely admoniſheth that faith it ſelfe proceedeth from nothing elſe but from the holie ſpirite: whiche thing Iohn ſetteth out more plainly, ſaying: Wee knowe that there abideth in vs of the ſpirite whiche hee hath giuen vs. Againe, by this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, becauſe he hath giuen vs of his ſpirite. Therefore Chriſt promiſed to his Diſciples the Spirite of trueth which the worlde cannot receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heauenlie wiſedome. And hee aſſigneth to the ſame ſpirite this proper office, to put them in minde of thoſe things thinges that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine should ỳ light shewe it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirite of vnderstanding should open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightlie call the holie spirite, the keye by which the treasures of the heauenlie kingdome are opened vnto vs: and may call his enlightening, the eyesight of our minde to see. Therfore doth S. Paul so much commend the ministery of the spirite: because 2.Cor.3.6. teachers should crie without profiting, vnlesse Christe himselfe the inwarde master shoulde drawe them with his spirite that are giuen him by his Father. Therefore as we haue saide, that perfect saluation is founde in the per- Luk.3.16. son of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holie spirite and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospell, and so newe begetting vs, that we may be newe creatures: and purging vs from vnholie filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holie temples to God.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

BVt all these thinges shalbee easie to vnderstand: when there is shewed a plaine definition of faith, that the readers may knowe the force & nature thereof. But first it is conuenient to call to minde againe these thinges that haue beene alreadie spoken, that sith God doeth appoint vs by his law what wee ought to do, if we fall in anie point thereof, the same terrible iudgement of eternall death that hee pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Againe, that forasmuche as it is not onelie hard but altogether aboue our strength and beyond all our power to fulfill the law, if we onely behold our selues, and weigh what estate is worthie for our deseruings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast awaie from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdlie, this hath beene declared, that there is but one meane of deliuerance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hand it pleased the heauenly father, hauing mercie vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, so that we with sounde faith embrace this mercie, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But now it is conuenient for vs to weigh this, what maner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, doe enter vpon the possession of the heauenlie kingdome, forasmuch as it is certaine that not euery opinion nor yet euery perswasiō is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and studie must wee looke about for, and search out the naturall propertie of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the errour of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, cōceiueth no higher thing, but a certaine commō assent to the history of the gospel, Yea, when they dispute of faith in the scholes, in barely calling God the obiect of faith, they do nothing but (as we haue said in another place) by vain speculatiō rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true mark. For 1.Tim.6.16. wheras God dwelleth in a light ỳ none can atteine to, it behoueth of necessity sitie that Christ become meane betweene vs and it. For which cause he calleth himselfe the light of the world: & in another place, I he way, the truth, and the Life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountaine of life) but by him: because he only knoweth the Father, & by him the faithfull to whom it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this reason Paul affirmeth, that hee accounteth nothing excellent to be knowen, but Christ: and in the xx. chapter of the Actes he saith, that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in another place he bringeth in Christ speaking after this maner, I will send thee among the Gentiles, that they maie receiue forgiuenesse of sinnes, and portion among holy ones, by the faith which is in mee. And Paul testifieth, that the glory of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightening of the knowledge of Gods glory shineth in his face. It is true indeed that faith hath respect only to the one God, but this also is to bee added, that it acknowledge him whome hee hath sent, euen Iesus Christ. Because God himselfe should haue lyen secrete & hidden farre from vs, vnlesse the brightnesse of Christ did cast his beames vpon vs. For this entent the father left all that he had with his only begotté sonne, euen by the communicating of good things with him to expresse the true image of his glorie. For as it is said, that we must be drawen by the spirite, that we may be stirred to seeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the inuisible Father is no where else to bee sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently well, which intreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, saith that we must knowe whither wee must goe and which way: and then by & by after he gathereth that the safest waie against all errours is hee that is both God and man. For it is God to whom we goe, and man by whom we go: and both these are founde no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paul whē he speaketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrowe that which he so oft repeateth of faith that hath her whole stay vppon Christ. And Peter doth most fitly ioyne them both together, saying that by him we beleeue in God.

The obiect of faith is not barely God, as the schoolemen coldly dispute, but God displaying himselfe in Christ.

Faith is no infolded or vnexpressed knowledge.

2 Therefore this euill, euen as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which haue hidden Christ as it were with a veyle drawen before him, to the beholding of whom vnlesse wee bee directly bent, we shal alwaie wander in manye vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they doe deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance doe with great hurte deceiue the silly people, yea (to say truely and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuise doth not only burie but vtterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleeue, to vnderstand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not only of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obteine saluation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoeuer the church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to bee a mercifull father to vs by the reconciliation made by Christ, and that Christ is giuen vs vnto righteousnesse, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I saye, not by ſubmitting of our ſenſe, wee attaine an entrie into the kingdome of heauen. For when the Apoſtle ſaith, that with the heart we beleeue to righteouſnes, and with the mouth confeſſion is made to ſaluatiō, he ſheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpreſſedly beleue that which he vnderſtādeth not, nor ſeeketh to learne: but hee requireth an expreſſed acknowledging of Gods goodneſſe, in which conſiſteth our righteouſneſſe. Rom. 10. 10.

3 In deede I deny not (ſuch is the ignorance wherewith we are compaſſed) that there nowe bee and hereafter ſhalbe many thinges wrapped and hidden from vs, til hauing put off the burden of our fleſh we come neerer to the preſence of God: in which very thinges that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to ſuſpend our iudgement, but to ſtay our minde in determined purpoſe to keepe vnitie with the Churche. But vnder this colour to intitle ignorance tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great abſurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God & of Chriſt, not in reuerence of the Church. And we ſee what a maze they haue framed with this their hiddē implicatiō, that any thing whatſoeuer it be without any choiſe, ſo that it be thruſt in vnder title of the Church, is gredily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea ſometime alſo moſt monſtrous erroures. Which vnaduiſed lightneſſe of beleefe, whereas it is a moſt certaine downfall to ruine, is yet excuſed by them, for that it beleeueth nothing determinately, but with this condition adioyned, If the faith of the Church be ſuch. So do they faine, that truth is holden in error, light in blindnes, true knowledge in ignorance. But becauſe wee wil not tarrie long in confuting them, we doe onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the verie plainneſſe of the trueth it ſelfe will of it ſelfe miniſter a confutatiō ready enough. For this is not the queſtion among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnantes of ignorance, but they definitiuely ſaie that they beleeue a right, which ſtand amaſed in their ignorance, yea & do flatter themſelues therein, ſo that they do agree to the authority and iudgment of the Church, concerning thinges vnknowen. As though the Scripture did not euery where teach, that with faith is ioyned knowledge.

Simple men abuſed vvhē they are made beleeue it is faith indeterminately to holde vvhat the church holdeth, vvithout further ſeeking vvhat vvee haue by Chriſt at the hands of God and hovv. Ioh. 17. 3.

4 But we do grant, that ſo long as we wander from home in this world, our faith is not fully expreſſed, not onely becauſe many thinges are yet hidden from vs, but becauſe being compaſſed with many miſtes of errours, wee attaine not all things. For the higheſt wiſedom of the moſt perfect is this, to profit more and proceede on further forwarde with gentle willingneſſe to learne. Therefore Paul exhorteth the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from an other, to abide for reuelation. And truly experience teacheth, that till we be vnclothed of our fleſh, we attaine to knowe leſſe than were to bee wiſhed, and daily in readiwg wee light vpon many darke places which doe conuince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth vs in modeſtie, aſſigning to euerie one a meaſure of faith, that euen the very beſt teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpreſſed faith, we may mark in the Diſciples of Chriſt, before that they had obtained to bee fully enlightened. Wee ſee, howe they hardly taſted the very firſt introductions, howe they did ſticke euen in the ſmalleſt points, how they hanging at the mouth of their maiſter did not yet much proceede, yea when

at the womens information they ranne to the graue, the resurrection of their maister was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witnesse of their faith, we may not say that they were vtterly without faith: but rather if they had not beene perswaded that Christ shoulde rise againe, all care of him woulde haue perished in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpes of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleeued his wordes whome they knewe to be a speaker of trueth, yet the grosnesse that stil possessed their mindes so wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a maner amased at it, Whereupon it is saide, that they then at the last beleeued when they had by trial of the thing it self proued the truth of the words of Christ, not that they then beganne to beleeue, but becausse the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hearts, then receiuing liuelinesse, did spring vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, becausse they reuerently embraced Christ for their only teacher, & then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleeued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And wee need not to seeke any more familiar proofe hereof than this, that in al things alway vnbeleefe is mingled with faith.

When vve begin by faith to knovv somevvhat, and haue a desire to learne more, this may be termed an vnexpressed faith.

5 We may also call it an vnexpressed faith, which yet indeed is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelists do rehearse that many beleued, which only being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but ỳ Christ was the Messias which had bin promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subiection willingly to submitte themselues to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in deede but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christs promise, cõcerning the healing of his son when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth, beleeued againe: becausse he receiued as an oracle that which he heard of the mouth of Christ, & thẽ submitted himselfe to his authoritie to receiue his doctrine. Albeit it is to bee knowen, that he was so tractable and ready to learn, that yet in the first place the word of the beleeuing signifieth a particular beleefe: and in the second place maketh him of the number of the Disciples, that professed to be the scholers of Christ. A like example doth Iohn set forth in the Samaritans, which so beleeued the womans report, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had heard him, said thus: Now we beleeue not becausse of thy report, but we haue heard him, and we know that he is the Sauiour of the worlde. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithful, in deede not properly, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection. But this willingnesse to learne, with a desire to proceede further, differeth farre from that grosse ignoraunce, wherin they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papistes haue imagined. For if Paul seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet neuer come to the knowledge of trueth, howe much more grieuous reproche doe they deserue that of purpose purpose studie to know nothing?

6 This therefore is the true knoweledge of Christ, if wee receiue him such as hee is offered of his father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to bee the marke of our faith, so wee can not goe the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide vs. And truely there are opened to vs ỹ treasures of grace, which being shut vp, Christ should litle profit vs. So Paul ioyneth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Yee haue not so learned Christ, for yee haue beene taught what is the trueth in Christ. Yet doe I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I confesse that there hath beene so much taught by Moses and the Prophetes, as sufficed to the edification of faith, but because there hath beene deliuered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is worthilie called of Paul, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also hee saith in an other place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this worde faith, the newe and vnaccustomed manner of teaching, whereby Christ since he appeared our scholemaister, hath more plainly set forth the mercie of his father, and more certainely testified of our saluation. Albeit it shalbe the more easie and more conuenient order, if we descend by degrees from the generaltie to the specialtye. First we must bee put in minde that there is a generall relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the worde, than the sunne beames from the sunne from whome they proceede, Therefore in Esaie God crieth out: Heare me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, Iohn sheweth in these woordes: these thinges are written that yee maye beleeue. And the Prophet meaning to exhort the people to beleefe, saith: This day if yee shall heare his voyce. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beleeue. Moreouer, God doeth not without cause in Esaie set this marke of difference betweene the children of the Churche and straungers, that hee will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefite vniuersall to all, why shoulde hee directe his woordes to a few? Wherewith agreeth this that the Euangelists do commonly vse the wordes Faithfull, and Disciples, as seueral words expressing one thing, and specialie Luke verie oft in the Actes of the Apostles. Yea and hee stretcheth that name euen to a woman in the nienth Chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith do swarue neuer so litle from this marke, to which it ought to to be directly leuelled, it keepeth not her own nature, but becommeth an vncertain lightnesse of beleefe and wandring errour of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherwith faith is vpholden and susteined, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. We doe not here dispute whether the ministerie of man bee necessarie to sowe the worde of God that faith may be conceiued thereby, which question we will elsewhere intreate of: but we saie that the worde it selfe, howsoeuer it be conueyed to vs, is like a mirrour when faith maie beholde God. Whether God doeth therein vse the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne onelie power, yet hee doeth alwaie shewe him selfe by his worde to those, whom his will is to drawe vnto him: Whereupon Paul defineth faith to bee an obedience that is giuen to the Gospell *Rom.*1.

And

Phil. 2. 17. And in another place he praiſeth the obedience of faith in the Philippians. For this is not the only purpoſe in the vnderſtanding of faith, that we know that there is a God, but this alſo, yea this chiefly, that wee vnderſtand what will hee beareth vs For it not ſo much behooueth vs to knowe what hee is in himſelfe, but what a one he will be to vs. Nowe therefore wee are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceiued by the worde. And the foundation heereof is a foreconceiued perſwaſion of the trueth of God. Of the aſſuredneſſe whereof ſo long as thy minde ſhall diſpute with it ſelfe, the worde ſhall be but of doubtfull and weake credite, yea rather no credit at all. But alſo it ſufficeth not to beleeue that God is a true ſpeaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnleſſe thou further holde this for vndoubtedly determined, that whatſoeuer proceedeth from him, is the ſacred and inuiolable trueth.

The true and full definition of faith. 7 But becauſe not at euery worde of God mans hearte is raiſed vp to faith, wee muſt yet further ſearch what this faith in the word hath properly reſpect vnto. It was the ſaying of God to Adam: Thou ſhalt die the death. Gen. 2. 17. & 4. 10. It was the ſaying of God to Cain: The bloode of thy brother crieth to mee out of the earth. Yet theſe are ſuch ſayinges as of them ſelues can doe nothing but ſhake faith, ſo much leſſe are they able to ſtabliſh faith. We denie not in the meane ſeaſon that it is the office of faith to agree to the trueth of God, how oft ſoeuer, whatſoeuer, and in what ſort ſoeuer it ſpeaketh: but now our queſtion is onely, what faith findeth in the worde of the Lorde to leane and reſt vpon. When our conſcience beholdeth onely indignation & vengeance, how can it but tremble and quake for feare? And how ſhould it but flee God, of whome it is afraide? But faith ought to ſeeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we haue not yet a ful definition of faith, becauſe it is not to be accounted for faith to knowe the wil of God, of what ſort ſoeuer it bee: But what if in the place of will, whereof manie times the meſſage is ſorowfull and the declaration dreadful, wee put kindeneſſe or mercie? Truely ſo wee ſhall come neerer to the nature of faith. For wee are then allured to ſeeke God, after that wee haue learned that ſaluation is laide vp in ſtore with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when hee declareth that he hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promiſe of grace, whereby he may teſtifie that he is our merciſull father, for that otherwiſe we cannot approch vnto him, and vppon that alone the heart of man may ſafely reſt. For this reaſon commonly in the Pſalmes theſe two things Mercie & Truth do cleaue together, becauſe neither ſhuld it any thing profit vs to knowe that God is true, vnleſſe hee did mercifully allure vs vnto him: neither were it in our power to embrace his mercie, vnleſſe he did with his owne mouth offer it. Pſal. 40. 11. I haue reported thy truth and thy ſaluation, Pſal. 25. 20. I haue not hidden thy goodneſſe and thy trueth. Thy goodnes & thy trueth keepe me. In another place: Thy mercy to the heauens, Pſal. 36. 6. thy truth euen to the cloudes. Againe: Al the waies of the Lord are mercie and truth, to them that keepe his couenant. Againe, Pſal. 107. His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, Pſal. 138. and the trueth of the Lorde abideth for euer. Againe: I will ſing to thy name vpon thy mercie and trueth. I omitte that which is in the Prophetes to the ſame meaning, that God is merciſull and faithfull in his promiſes. For wee shall rashly determine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse himselfe doe testifie of himselfe, and preuent vs with his calling, least his will should bee doubtfull and vnknowen. But we haue alreadie seene, that Christ is the only pledge of his loue, without whome on euerie side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Nowe forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much preuaile, vnlesse hee make vs to rest in it, therefore such an vnderstanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not soundlie agree in it selfe, but as it were, disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blind and darkned, is far from attaining and climbing vp to perceiue the verie will of God: and also the hart of man, as it wauereth with perpetuall doubting, is far from resting assured in that persuasion. Therefore it behoueth both that our wit be eligh-ened, and our hearte strengthened by some other meane, that the worde of God may be of full credite with vs. Nowe we shall haue a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a stedfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnes toward vs, which beeing grounded vppon the truth of the free promise in Christ, is both reueiled to our mindes, and sealed in our hearts by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I proceed anie further, it shall be necessarie that I make some preambles to dissolue certaine doubtes that otherwise might make some stoppe to the readers. And first I must confute that distinction ỳ flyeth about in the schooles, betweene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, doe beleeue all that is necessarie to saluation. As though the holy Ghost in lightning our harts vnto faith, were not a witnes to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they giue the name of faith to such perswasion voide of the feare of God. We neede to striue no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, suche as it is declared by the woorde of God. Whereby shall plainelie appeare howe vnskilfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue alreadie touched parte, the rest I will adde hereafter as place shall serue. At this present I saye that there cannot bee imagined a greater absurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They wil haue faith to bee an assent, whereby euerie despiser of God may receiue ỳ which is vttered out of the Scripture. But first they should haue seene whether euery man of his owne power do bring faith to himselfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witnesse of adoption. Therefore they doe childishly plaie the fooles, in demanding whether faith which a qualitie added doth forme, be the same faith or an other and a newe faith. Whereby appeareth certainelie, that in so babling they neuer thought of the singular gift of the holie Ghost For the beginning of beleeuing doeth alreadie conteine in it the reconciliation, whereby man approcheth to God. But if they did weigh that saying of Paul: With the heart is beleeued to righteousnesse, they woulde cease to faine that same cold qualitie. If we had but this one reason, it should bee sufficient to ende this contention: that the verie same assent (as I haue alreadie touched, and will againe more largely repeate) is rather of the hearte than of the braine, rather of affection than of vnderstanding.

Against the distinction of faith vnformed, and faith formed by accesse of a godly affection added vnto assent.

Rom. 10. 10.

Rom. 1. 5. For which cauſe it is called the obedience of faith, which is ſuch as the Lord preferreth no kinde of obedience aboue it: and that worthily, forasmuch as nothing is more precious to him than his trueth, which as Iohn the Baptiſt witneſſeth, the beleeuers doe as it were ſubſcribe and ſeale vnto. Sith the matter is not doubtfull wee doe in one worde determinately saie, that they ſpeake fondly when they saye that faith is formed by adding of godlie affection vnto aſſent: whereas aſſent it ſelfe, at leaſt ſuch aſſent as is declared in the Scriptures, conſiſteth of godlie affection. But yet there is an other plainer argument that offereth it ſelfe to bee alleadged. For whereas faith embraceth Chriſt as hee is offered vs of the father: and Chriſt is offered not onely for righteouſneſſe, forgiueneſſe of ſinnes and peace, but alſo for ſanctification, and a fountaine of liuing water: without doubt no man can euer truely know him, vnleſſe he doe therewithall receiue the ſanctification of the Spirite. Or, if any man deſire to haue it more plainely ſpoken, Faith conſiſteth in the knowledge of Chriſt. And Chriſt cannot be known but with ſanctification of his ſpirite: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be ſeuered from godly affection.

Iohn 3. 25.

S. Pauls vvords abuſed for the maintenance of vnformed faith.

1. Cor. 12. 10. 9 Whereas they are wont to laie this againſt vs, that Paul ſaieth: If a man haue all faith, ſo that hee remoue mountaines, if he haue not charitie, hee is nothing: whereby they woulde deforme faith, in ſpoyling it of charitie: they conſider not what the Apoſtle in that place meaneth by faith. For when in the chapter next before it, he had ſpoken of the diuers giftes of the holie Ghoſt, among the which he had reckoned the diuerſe kinds of languages, power and prophecie, and had exhorted the Corinthians to followe the beſt of theſe giftes, that is to ſaie, ſuch giftes whereby more profite and commoditie might come to the whole bodie of the Church: hee ſtreightway ſaide further, that hee would ſhew them yet a more excellent waie. That all ſuch giftes, howe excellent ſoeuer they bee of themſelues, yet are nothing to bee eſteemed, vnleſſe they ſerue charitie. For they were giuen to the edifying of the Church, and vnleſſe they be applied thereunto, they looſe their grace. For proofe of this he particularly rehearſeth them repeating the ſelfe ſame giftes that hee had ſpoken of before, but in other names. And he vſeth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therfore this, whether ye call it power or faith, is a particular gifte of God, which euerie vngodlie man may both haue and abuſe, as the gifte of tongues, as prophecie and other giftes of grace: it is no maruell if it be ſeuered from charitie. But all the errour of theſe men ſtandeth in this, that where this worde Faith, hath diuerſe ſignifications, they not conſidering the diuerſitie of the thing ſignified, diſpute as though it were taken for one thing in all places alike. The place of Iames which they alleadge for maintenaunce of the ſame errour, ſhall bee elſe where diſcuſſed. But although for teachinges ſake, when wee meane to ſhew what manner of knowledge of God there is in the wicked, we grant that there are diuerſe ſortes of faith: yet wee acknowledge and ſpeake of but one faith of the godlie, as the Scripture teacheth. Manie indeede doe beleeue that there is a God, they thinke that the Hiſtorie of the Goſpel and other partes of the Scripture are true as (commonly wee are woont to iudge of such thinges, as either are reported being done long ago, or such as we our selues haue bin present at & sene.) There be also som that go further, for both they beleue the word of God to be a most assured oracle, & they do not altogether despise his commaundements, and they somewhat after a sortt are moued with his threatninges and promises. It is indeede testified that such hath faith: but that is spoken out by abuse, because they doe not with open vngodlines fight against the worde of God, or refuse or despise it: but rather pretend a certaine shewe of obedience.

A kinde of faith saide to be in them who notwithstanding are no true beleeuers.

10 But this image or shadow of faith, as it is of no value, so it is not worthie of the name of faith. From the founde trueth whereof how farre it differeth, although it shall bee hereafter more largelie entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrarie, why it should not nowe be touched by the way. It is saide, that Simon Magus beleeued, which yet within a litle after bewrayed his owne vnbeliefe. And whereas it is saide that hee beleeued, we do not vnderstande it as some doe, that hee fained a beliefe when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being ouercome with the maiesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluat on, that he willingly professed himselfe to bee one of his. After the same manner it is saide in the Gospell of Luke, that they beleeue for a time, in whom the seede of the woord is choked vp before it bring foorth fruite, or before it take anie roote at all, it by & by withereth away and perisheth: we doubt not that such delited with a certain tast of the word doe greedily receiue it, and begin to feele the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitfull counterfeiting of faith, they beguile not onelie other mens eyes, but also their owne mindes. For they perswade themselues, that that reuerence which they shewe to the worde of God, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no vngodlinesse but manifest and confessed reproch or cõtempt of his word. But what maner of assent soeuer that be, it pearceth not to the very heart to remaine there stablished: & though sometime it seemeth to haue taken rootes, yet those are not liuely rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is ful of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guileful hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueth himself. But let thẽ that glory in such shadowes of faith vnderstand, that therin they are no better than the Diuel. But that first sort of men are farre worse than the Diuel, which doe senseleslie heare & vnderstand those things, for knowledge wherof the Diuels do tremble. And the other are in this point equal with the diuel, that the feeling such as it is wherwith they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and discouragement.

Luke 8.7.& 13.

The difference betweene the faith of Gods elect and reprobates.

11 I know that some thinke it harde, that we assigne faith to the reprobate, whereas Paul affirmeth faith to bee the fruit of election. Which doubt yet is easilie dissolued: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor doe truely feele the effectuall working of the Gospell, but they that are foreordained to saluation: yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime moued with the same feeling that the elect are, so that in their owne iudgement they nothing differ from the elect. Wherefore it is no absurdity, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the taste of the heauenlie giftes, that

Heb. 6.

Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundlie perceiue the spirituall force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lorde, the more to condemne them and make them inexcusable, conueyeth himselfe into their minds so farre forth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If anie obiect, that then there remaineth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certainely their adoption: I answere that though there be a great likenes & affinitie betweene the elect of God and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there lieth in the elect onelie that assiance which Paul speaketh of, that they cry with ful mouth, Abba, Father. Therfore as God doth regenerate only the elect with incorruptible seede for euer, so that the seede of life planted in their hearts neuer perisheth: so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoption, that it maie be stable and sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferiour working of the Spirite may haue his course, euen in the reprobat. In the meane season the faithful are taught, carefully & humbly to examine themselues, least in steede of assurednes of faith, do creep in careless confidence of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobate do neuer conceiue but a confused feeling of grace, so that they rather take hold of the shadow thē of the founde bodie, because the holy Spirite doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect only, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their vse. But yet it is truely said, that the reprobate beleue God to be mercifull vnto thē, because they receiue the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainely enough: not that they are partakers of the selfe same faith or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, vnder a cloke of Hypocrisie. And I denie not, that God doeth so farre giue light vnto their mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feeling so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the sound effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shew himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that hee hauing truely deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his safegard, but only he discloseth to them a present mercy. But he vouchsafeth to grant to the only elect the liuely roote of faith, so that they continue to the ende. So is that obiection aunswered, if God doe truely shewe his grace, that the same remaineth perpetually stablished, for that there is no cause to the contrary, but that God may enlighten some with a present feeling of his grace, which afterwarde vanisheth away.

Wicked men who by reason of a vanishing sweetnes which they feele in the grace of God towards them for a time, are said to beleeue, yet indeed doe neither embrace what they should nor as they should.

12 Also though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindnesse towarde vs, and an assured perswasion of the truth thereof: yet it is no maruel that the feeling of Gods loue in temporall thinges doeth vanish away: which although it haue an affinitie with faith, yet doth it muche differ from faith. I graunt, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the trueth therof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I denie that the reprobate doe proceede so farre as to attayne vnto that secrete reuelation, which the Scripture sayeth to belong to the elect onelie. Therefore I denye that they doe eyther conceiue the will of GOD as it is vnchaungeable, or doe stedfastly embrace the truth therof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away:

Like

Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take liuelie rootes, in processe of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeeres it bringeth forth not onelie blossomes and leaues but also fruite. Finally, as by the fal of the first man, the Image of God might haue been blotted out of his minde, and soule, so it is no maruell, if God doe shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterwarde hee suffereth to bee quenched. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that hee may lightly ouerwash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to bee holden for trueth, that howe small and weake soeuer faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pleadge of the spirite of God, and a seale of their adoption, the printe thereof can neuer bee blotted out of their heartes: as for the reprobate, that they are ouerspred with such a light as afterwarde commeth to nought, and yet the Spirite is not deceitfull, because he giueth not life to the seede that he entreth in their heartes, to make it abide alwaies incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I goe yet further, for whereas it is euident by the teaching of the Scripture and by dailie experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feeling of Gods grace, it must needes be that there is raised in their heartes a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time there liued in Saul a godlie affection to loue God, by whom he knewe himselfe to bee fatherly handled, and therefore was delighted with a certaine sweetnesse of his goodnesse. But as the perswasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so doe they not soundly loue him againe as his children, but are led with a certaine affection like hired seruantes. For to Christ onelie was the spirite of loue giuen, to this end, that he should poure it into his members. And truely that saying of Paul extendeth no further, but to the elect onelie: The loue of God is powred abroad into our heartes by the holie Spirite that is giuen vs, euen the same loue that ingendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrary side wee see God to bee maruellously angrie with his children, whom yet hee ceasseth not to loue: not that in himselfe hee hateth them, but because his will is to make them afraide with the feeling of his wrath, to the intent to abate their pride of flesh, to shake off their drousinesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therfore al at one time they conceiue him to be both angrie with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not fainedly doe praie to appease his wrath, to whome yet they flee with quier assured trust. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some do counterfaite a shewe of faith, which yet doe lacke the true faith, but while they are carried with a sodayne violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion. And it is no doubt that sluggishnesse so possesseth them, that they doe not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is likely that they were suche to whome (as John witnesseth) Christ did not committe himselfe when yet they beleeued in him: because hee knewe them all, and knew what was in man. If manie did not fall from the common faith (I cal it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse and affinitie with the liuelie & continuing faith) Christ wold not haue

Rom. 5. 5.

Iohn 8.31. saide to his Disciples: If yee abide in my worde, then are ye truely my Disciples, and yee shall knowe the trueth, and the trueth shall make you free. For hee speaketh to them that had imbraced his doctrine, and exhorteth them to the increase of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishnesse quench the light that is giuen them. Therefore doeth Paul affirme, Titus.1.1. that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they haue not taken liuelie roote. Like as Christ also saith in Matth.15.13. Matthew: euery tree that my father hath not planted, shall bee rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kind of lying, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. Iames inueieth against that kinde of men, that with deceitfull pretence doe wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paul require of the Iac.2. 1.Tim.1.5. children of God a faith vnfained, but in respect that manie doe presumptuously chalenge vnto themselues that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deceit doe beguile other or sometime themselues. Therfore hee compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein faith is kept, because 1.Tim.1.19. manie in falling from good conscience, haue suffered shipwracke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doubtful signification of the word faith. The name of faith diuersly taken. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sounde doctrine of religion, as in the place that we nowe alleadge, and in the same Epistle where Paul wil haue 1.Tim.3.9. Deacons to holde fast the mysterie of faith in a pure conscience. Againe, where he publisheth the falling awaie of certaine from the faith. But on the 1.Tim.4.1.& 6. other side hee saieth that Timothie was nourished vp with the wordes of 2.Tim.2.15. & 3.8. faith. Againe, where hee saieth that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that manie departe from the faith: whom in another place hee calleth reprobate touching faith. As againe he Tit.1.13.& 2.2. chargeth Titus, saying, Warne them that they bee sounde in the faith. By soundnesse he meaneth nothing else but pureneſse of doctrine, which is easilie corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Euen Col.2.5. because in Christ, whom faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisedome and knowledge: therefore faith is woorthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heauenlie doctrine, from which it can not be seuered. Contrariwise sometime it is restrained to signifie some particular obiect, as when Matthew saith, that Christ sawe the faith of them that did let downe Matth.9.2. the man sicke of the palsie through the tiles: and Christ himselfe crieth out Matth.8.10. that hee founde not in Israell so great faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earnestly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care wereof occupied all his minde: yet because beeing contented with the onelie assent and answeare of Christ, hee required not Christes bodilie presence, therefore in respect of this circumstance his faith was so much commended. And a litle here before wee haue shewed, that Paul taketh faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue that neither are regenerate by the spirite of God, nor do hartily worship him. Also in an 1.Cor.13.10. other place he setteth faith for the doctrine whereby wee are instructed in faith. For where hee writeth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministerie of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these formes of speach standeth a proportionall portional relation. But when the name of faith is vnproperly remoued, to signifie a false profession, or a lying title of faith, that should seeme to bee as harde a figuratiue abuse, as when the feare of God is set for a corrupt & wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes saide in the holy History, that the forraine nations which had been transplanted into Samaria and the places bordering thereabout, feared the fained Gods & the God of Israel, which is as much, as to mingle heauen and earth together. But now our question is, What is that faith which maketh the children of God different from the vnbeleeuers, by which we call vpon God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall saluation and life dwelleth in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I haue shortly and plainly declared.

14 Now let vs againe goe through all the partes of it, euen from the beginning, which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doutfull. When in defining faith we call it a knowledge, we meane not thereby a comprehending, such as men vse to haue of those things that are subiect to mans vnderstanding. For it is so farre aboue it, that mans wit must go beyond & surmount it self to come vnto it, yea, & when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attaine that which it feeleth, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiueth not, it vnderstandeth more by the very assuredness of perswasion, than if it did with mans owne capacity throughlie perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paul saith verie well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, bredth, depth, & height, & to know the loue of Christ that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaning was to signifie, that the thing which our minde conceiueth by faith, is euerie way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre higher thā all vnderstanding. But yet becaufe the Lorde hath disclosed to his Saintes the secrete of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledging: and Iohn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where hee testifieth, that the faithful do certainly know that they are the childrē of God. And vndoubtedly they knowe it assuredly: but rather by beeing confirmed by perswasion of Gods trueth, than by beeing informed by naturall demonstration. And this also the wordes of Paul doe declare saying, that while wee dwell in the body, we are wandering abroad from the Lord, because we walke by faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those things which we vnderstand by faith, are yet absent from vs and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of faith standeth rather in certaintie than in comprehending.

Faith a sure and stedfast knowledge.

15 We further call it a sure and stedfast knowledge, to expresse thereby a more sound constancie of perswasion. For as faith is not contented with a doubtful and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke & entangled vnderstanding: but requireth a full & fixed assurednes, such as men are wont to haue of thinges found by experience and proued. For vnbeliefe sticketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our hearts, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men confesse with their mouth to be true, that God is faithfull, no man is without great contention perswaded in his hearte. Specially when hee commeth to the proofe, then the wauering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of commendation mainteineth the authoritie of the word of God, but endeuoureth to giue remedy for the aforesaid disease,

Psal. 19. 31. that God may obtaine to be fully beleeued of vs in his promises: The words of the Lord (saith Dauid) are pure wordes, as the Siluer tried in a fornace of earth, fined seuen times. Againe, The word of the Lorde fined is a shield to

Prou 30. 5. all that trust in him. And Salomon confirming the same, & in a maner in the same words, saith: Euery word of God is pure. But sith the whole 119. Psalme entreateth only in a maner vpon the same, it were superfluous to alleadge any moe places. Truly so oft as God doth so commend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the waie reproche vs with our vnbeleeuingnesse: because that commendation tendeth to no other ende, but to roote vp al peruerse doubtinges out of our heartes. There be also manie which so conceiue the mercie of God, that they take litle comfort thereof. For they be euen therwithall pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enclose within too narrowe bounds the very same mercifulnesse, of which they thinke themselues most assuredly persuaded. For thus they think with themselues, that his mercie is in deede great & plentiful poured out vpon manie, offering it selfe & ready for al men: but that it is not certaine whether it wil extend vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the mid race, is but an half. Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with assured quietnes, as it doth trouble it with vnquiet doubtfulnesse. But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to faith, euen such a one as plainely setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of dout. And that cānot be, but that wee must needes truely feele & proue in our selues the sweetnesse thereof. And therfore the Apostle out of faith deriueth assured confidence, and out of it againe boldnesse. For thus he saieth, that by Christ wee haue boldnes, Ephe. 3. 12. and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which wordes truely he sheweth, that it is no right faith, but when wee are bolde with quiet minds to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnes proceedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good wil & our saluatiō. Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is vsed for Confidence.

Faith such an assurance as maketh the promises of mercie our owne.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefe stay of our faith, that we doe not thinke the promises of mercie which the Lord offereth to bee true onely in other beside vs, & not at all in our selues: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our own. From hence procedeth that confidence which the same Paul in another place calleth peace, vnlesse som had rather say, that peace is deriued of it. It is an assurednes that maketh the conscience quiet & chereful before God, without which the conscience must of necessitie bee vexed, & in a maner torne in pieces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it do forget God & it selfe, and so slumber a litle while. And I may truely say, For a litle while, for it doth not long enioy that miserable forgetfulnesse, but is with often recourse of the remembrance of Gods iudgment sharply tormented. Briefely, there is none truely faithfull, but hee that being perſwaded with a ſound aſſuredneſſe that God is his merciful & louing father, doth promiſe him ſelfe all thinges vpon truſt of Gods goodneſſe: and none but he that truſting vpon the promiſes of Gods good will toward him, conceiueth an vndoubted looking for of ſaluation: as the Apoſtle ſheweth in theſe wordes: if we keepe ſure to the end our confidence and glorying of hope. For hereby hee meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lord, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kingdom of heauen. There is none (I ſay) faithfull, but hee that leaning vpon the aſſuredneſſe of his owne ſaluation, doth confidently triumph vpon the Deuil & death, as we are taught by that notable concluding ſentence of Paul: I am perſuaded (ſaith he) that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor thinges preſent, nor thinges to come, ſhall be able to ſeperate vs from the loue of God, wherewith hee embraceth vs in Chriſt Ieſu. And in like manner, the ſame Apoſtle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane wel lightened, vnleſſe we ſee what is the hope of the eternall inheritance to which we are called. And ech where his common manner of teaching is ſuch, that hee declareth that no otherwiſe we doe not well comprehend the goodneſſe of God, vnleſſe we gather of it the fruite of great aſſuredneſſe.

that

Heb. 3. 13.

Ephe. 1. 18.

17 But (ſome man will ſay) the faithful do find by experience a far other thing within themſelues, which in recording the grace of God toward thē, are not only tempted with vnquietneſſe, which oftentimes chanceth vnto them, but alſo are ſometime ſhaken with moſt grieuous terrours: ſo great is the vehemency of temptations to throwe downe their mindes: which thing ſeemeth not ſufficiently well to agree with that aſſuredneſſe of faith. Therfore this doubt muſt be anſwered, if we wil haue our aforeſaide doctrine to ſtand. But truely, when we teach that faith ought to bee certaine and aſſured, we doe not imagine ſuch a certaintie as is touched with no doubting, nor ſuch an aſſuredneſſe as is aſſailed with no carefulneſſe: but rather wee ſay, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall ſtrife with their owne diſtruſtfulneſſe. So farre be we from ſetling their conſciences in ſuch a peaceable quietneſſe, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other ſide we ſay, that in what ſort ſoeuer they be afflicted, they do neuer fall & depart frō that aſſured confidence which they haue conceiued of the mercy of God. The ſcripture ſetteth foorth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, ſpecially if a man beholde the whole continuall courſe of his life. But yet howe hee was not alway of quiet minde him ſelfe declareth by innumerable complaintes, of which at this time it ſhall be ſufficient to chooſe out a fewe. When he reprocheth his owne ſoule with trobleſome motions, what is it elſe but that he is angrie with his owne vnbeleeuingneſſe? Why trembleſt thou my ſoule (ſaith hee) and why art thou diſquieted within me? truſt in God. And truely ỹ ſame diſcouragement was a plain token of deſtruction, euen as if he thought himſelfe to be forſaken of God. And in another place we reade a larger confeſſion thereof, where he ſaith: I ſaide in my ouerthrowe, I am caſt out from the ſight of thy eyes. Alſo in another place he diſputeth with himſelf in careful & miſerable perplexity yea & quarrelleth of the very nature of God, ſaying: Hath

We haue no ſuch certaintie of faith as is free from being ſhaken with feares & terrors.

Pſal 42. 6. 43. 5.

God

Pſal. 77. 10. God forgotten to haue mercy? will he caſt off for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue ſayde, To die is mine: charges are of the right hand of the higheſt. For, as in deſpaire he condéneth himſelfe to deſtruction, and not only confeſſeth himſelf to be toſſed with douting, but as if he were vanquiſhed in battel, he leaueth nothing to himſelf, becauſe God hath forſaken him, & hath turned to deſtroy him, the ſame hand that was wont to be his helper. Wherfore not without cauſe he exhorteth his ſoule Pſal. 116. 7. to returne to her quietneſſe, becauſe he had found by experience, that he was toſſed among troubleſome waues. And yet (which is maruellous) in all theſe aſſaultes, faith vpholdeth the heartes of the godly, and is truely like vnto a Date tree to endeuor and riſe vpward againſt al burdens, how great ſoeuer they be: as Dauid when he might ſeeme to be vtterly ouerwhelmed, yet in rebuking himſelfe, ceaſeth not to riſe vp to God. And truely he that ſtriuing with his own weakneſſe, reſorteth to faith in his troubles, is alreadi in a manner conqueror. Which may bee gathered by this ſentence and Pſal. 27. 14. other like: Waite for the Lorde, be ſtrong, he ſhall ſtrengthen thy heart: wait for the Lord. He reprocheth himſelfe of fearfulneſſe, & in repeating ẏ ſame twiſe, confeſſeth himſelf to be ſomtimes ſubiect to many troubleſome motions. And in the mean time he doth not only become diſpleaſed with himſelfe in theſe faultes, but earneſtly endeuoureth to amendment. Truly if wee will more neerely by good examination compare him with Achaz, Eſay 7. 3. there ſhal be found great difference. Eſay was ſent to bring remedy to the careful greefe of the wicked king & hypocrite, and ſpake vnto him in theſe wotds: Be in ſafegard and be quiet: feare not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before ſaide, that his heart was moued as the trees of the wood are ſhaken with wind, though he hard the promiſe, yet he ceaſed not to quake for feare. This therfore is the proper reward and puniſhment of vnbeleef, ſo to tremble for feare, that in temptation he turneth himſelfe away from God, ẏ doth not open to himſelf the gate by faith. Cõtrariwiſe the faithfull whom the waighty burden of temptations maketh to ſtoupe, & in a maner oppreſſeth, do conſtantly riſe vp, although not without trouble and hardneſſe. And becauſe they knowe their owne weakneſſe, they pray with the Pſal. 119. 43. Prophet: Take not the worde of trueth away from my mouth continually. By which words we are taught, that ſometime they become dumme as though their faith were vtterly ouerthrown; yet they faint not, nor turn their backs, but proceed in their battell, & with praier do encourage their ſlouthfulneſſe, leaſt by fauouring themſelues they ſhould growe to vnſenſible dulneſſe.

18 For the vnderſtanding therof, it is needefull to returne to that diuiſion of the fleſh and the ſpirite, wherof we made mention in another place, which doth in this behalfe moſt clearely appear. The godly heart therfore feeleth a diuiſion in it ſelf, which is partly delited with ſweetnes by acknowledging of the goodnes of God, and partly grieued ẅ bitternes by feeling of his owne miſery, partly reſteth vpon the promiſe of the Goſpell, and partly trembleth by reaſon of the teſtimony of his own wickedneſſe: partly reioyſeth with conceiuing of life, and partly quaketh for feare of death. Which variation cõmeth by imperfection of faith, foraſmuch as we neuer be in so good case in the course of this present life, as being healed from all disease of distrustfulnes to be altogether filled and possessed with faith. Hereupon proceede those battels, when the distrustfulnes that abideth in the remnaunts of the flesh, riseth vp to assail the faith that is inwardly conceiued. But if in a faithfull minde assuredneſse be mixed with doubtfulnes, come we not then alway to this point, that faith standeth not in a certaine & cleare knowledge, but in a darke & doubtfullie entangled knowledge of Gods wil toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diuersly drawn with sundrie thoughts, yet are we not therefore by and by seuered frō faith, though we be vexed with tossing vp & down of distrustfulnes, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomles depth thereof: and though we bee shaken, yet be we not thrust down out of our place. For this is alway the end of this battell, that faith doth at length with wrastling ouercome those hard troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

The imbecillitie of our knowvledge excludeth not the certaintie of that vve knoovve by faith.

19 Let this bee the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it neuer so small, is poured into our hearts, wee by and by begin to behold the face of God milde and pleasant, and louing toward vs: yet the same we see from a farre off, & farre distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceiued. Frō thense forward, how much we profit (as we ought continually to profite) as it were by proceeding further, we come vnto so much the neerer, & therfore certainer beholding of him, & by very continuaunce he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the mind enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by little & little is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some thinges, or by darkly seeing that which she seeth, but that she enioyeth a cleare knowledge of Gods wil toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shining in sidelong at a narrowe windowe, or as it were but halfe glummering, he wanteth in deede the free beholding of the sonne, yet he seeth with his eyes an vndoubted brightnesse thereof, and receiueth the vse of it: so we being bound with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoeuer we be on ech side shadowed with much darkenes, yet we are sufficiently enlightned vnto perfect assuredneſse, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpon vs, though it bee but a litle, to shew foorth his mercy.

Our faith vnperfect but stedfast, though our hearts be both naturally inclined, & also partly by outvvard tentations, partly by invvard guiltinesse of conscience prouoked to distrustfulnes.

20 Both these points the Apostle verie well teacheth in diuerse places. For when he saith, that we know vnperfectly, and prophecy vnperfectly, & see by a dark speaking as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a little portion of the true godly wisedome is giuen vs in this present life. For though those wordes do not expressely shewe that our faith is vnperfect so long as wee grone vnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection, ye haue need to be continually exercised in learning, yet he secretly declareth that that thing which is infinite, can not be comprehended by our small capacity, and narrow compasse. And this Paul reporteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dulneſse is an hinderance and stay that he can not come so nere as were to be wished. But how sure and vndeceiuable a taste of it selfe, euen a small drop of faith

2.Cor.3.18. doth make vs feele, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where hee affirmeth, that by the Gospell we beholde the glorie of God with vncouered face, hauing no veile betweene vs and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglementes of ignoraunce there must needes be wrapped together both much douting and fearefull trembling, specially forasmuch as our hearte, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selfe, is enclined to vnbeleeuingnes. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and diuers in kinde, doe oftentimes with great sodaine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauie burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament & grone with it selfe, and sometime accuseth it selfe: sometime secretely murmureth, and sometime is openlie troubled. Whether therfore aduersities doe shewe an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it self any proofe or matter of his wrath, from thense vnbeleefe doth take weapons & engines to vanquish faith withall: which are alway directed to this end, that we thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, should both not hope for any helpe at his hande, and also be afraide of him as of our deadly enemy.

How faith being assaulted getteth the victorie, and remaineth stil vnconquerable.

21 To beare these assaults, faith doth arme and fortify her selfe with the worde of God And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enimy, because he is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he punisheth he is also mercifull, because his chasticement commeth rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought, that God is a reuēger of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardō readie for all offences, so oft as the sinner resorteth to the mercifulnesse of the Lord. So a godly minde howsoeuer it be in meruailous wise tossed & vexed, yet at length riseth vp aboue al daungers, & neuer suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatsoeuer contentions do trouble & weary it, in the end they turne to the assurednes of this confidence. And hereof this is a proof: that the holy ones, when they think them selues most of all pressed with the vengeāce of God, yet euen then do make their complaintes to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then neuertheless they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their mone to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truely they would neuer finde in their hearts to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleeued that there were some help at his hand prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smalnesse of faith, complained in deed that they perished, but yet they called to him for help. And when he rebuketh them for their small faith, yet hee doth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleeuers, but stirreth them to shake off ỹ fault. Therfore we affirm againe ỹ which we haue aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoeuer it bee shaken & seeme to bende this way or that way, the light thereof is so neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidde vnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the worde which is an vncorruptible seede, bringeth foorth fruite like to it selfe, the spring whereof doeth

neuer wither & vtterlie perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of despair to the holy ones, to feele according to the consideration of present thinges, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Iob affirmeth that his hope shall proceede so farre, that though God doe kill him, yet hee will not therefore cease to trust in him. This is the trueth therefore. Vnbeleefe reigneth not within the hearts of the godly, but outwardlie assaileth them: neither doth she deadly wound them with her weapons, but only troubleth them, or so hurteth them, that yet the wound is curable. For faith, as Paule teacheth, serueth vs for a shield that being holden vp against weapons, doth so receiue the force of them, that it either vtterlie driueth them back, or at least so breaketh their violence, that they cānot pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a strong souldier with the violent stroke of a dart be compelled to remoue his foot, and giue ground a little: & when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some part broken, but yet so that it is not striken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rise thus hye as to say with Dauid, Iob. 13. 15. Ephes. 6. 18. Psal. 23. 4. I walke in the middest of the shadowe of death, I wil feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is in deede terrible to walke in the darknesse of death, & it cannot be but that the faithfull, how much strength soeuer they haue, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, ỳ they haue God present with them, and prouiding for their safetie, that fear is ouercome with assuredneſſe. For (as Augustine saith) howe greate engines soeuer the deuil raiseth vp against vs, so long as he possesseth not the place of the heart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores. And so if wee may iudge by the successe, the faithfull not only escape safe from euery battel, so that by and by receiuing fresh courage they are ready to come again into the fielde: but also that is fulfilled which Iohn saith in his canonical Epistle: This is the victorie that ouercommeth the worlde, euen your fayth. For he affirmeth that it shall not only win the victory in one or few battels, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the ouer hande of the whole worlde, although it be a thousand times assailed. 1. Iohn. 5. 4.

22 There is another kind of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assuredneſſe of faith is so nothing at all diminished, that thereby it is the more soundly stablished. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learn by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselues with the same offences: or recording with themselues their own miserie, doe learn to hang altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselues to be more fickle and sooner vanishing than any blast of winde. For when the Apostle, in setting foorth the scourges wherwith the Lorde in old time had punished the people of Israel, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they intāgle not themselues with like euils: he doth not therby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dulnes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strēgthened. And when hee taketh occasion of the Iewes fall to exhort him that standeth, to take heede ỳ he fall not, he doth not thereby bid vs to wauer, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnes, but only he taketh away arro- All feare is not repugnant vnto faith. 1. Cor. 10. 12. Rom. 11. 22.

arrogant presumption & rash trusting too much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles being receiued into their place, should not too much outragiously triumph against them. Albeit hee speaketh there not onely to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the hypocrites that gloried only in outward shew. For neither doth he admonish euery man particularly, but making a cõparison betwene the Iewes and the Gentiles, after that he had shewed that the Iewes in this that they were reiected, did suffer iust iudgement for their vnbeleefe and vnthankfulnesse, he also exhorted the Gentiles that they should not, by being proud & extolling them selues, loose the grace of adoption lately conueied into them. But as in that general reiecting of the Iewes, there remained yet some that were not fallen from the couenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should bee puffed vp only with foolish confidence of the flesh, & so abuse Gods louing kindnes to their own destruction. But although you take this as spoke to the elect and faithfull, yet therupon shal follow no inconuenience. For it is one thing to hold down the rash presumption which out of the remnants of the flesh creepeth somtime euen into the holy ones, that with vain confidence it waxe not outragiously wanton: and another thing to strike the conscience with feare, that it rest not with full assurednes in the mercy of God.

We may feare at the consideration of our owne frailtie and corruption, and yet in his mercie rest with sure & certaine confidence.

Phil 2.12.
Psal.5.8.

23 Then, when he teacheth, that with fear & trembling we should work our own saluation, he requireth nothing else, but that we should accustome vs with much abasing of our selues, reuerently to looke vp into the mightines of God. For truely nothing doth so much awake vs to cast al our confidence & assurance of mind vpon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selues and carefulnes conceiued by knowledge in cõscience of our own wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to bee taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will enter into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where hee comly cõioineth the boldnes of faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent feare, which we must needes feel so oft as comming into the sight of Gods maiesty, we perceiue by the glorious brightnesse thereof, howe great is our owne filthines. And Salomon saith truly, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne heart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall headlong into euil. But such fear he meaneth as may make vs more heedefull, not such whereby we should be troubled and vtterly fall: euen such a feare as when the mind confounded in it selfe, doth recouer it selfe againe in God: when despairing it selfe, it reuiueth by trust in him. Therfore there is no cause to the contrary, but that the faithfull may at one time both be in feare, and also enioy most assured comfort, in respect ỹ somtime they turne their eies to behold their owne vanity, and somtime they cast the thought of their minde vpon the trueth of God. But how (wil some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one mind? Euen thus, as contrarily vnsensible dulnesse, and carefulnes. For whereas the wicked trauail to procure to themselfe a want of grief, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the iudgement of God so presseth them, that they can not attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstãd, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that in fighting valiantly, they may restrain themselues vnder the bridle of modesty. And by the processe of the text it appereth, that this was the entent of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of fear, and trembling to be the good pleasure of God, whereby he giueth to them that be his both to will well, and valiantly to goe through with it. According to this meaning ought we to take that saying of the Prophet: The children of Israel shall feare God and his goodnesse: because not only godlines engendreth the reuerence of God, but the very sweetnes & pleasant taste of grace, filleth man being discouraged in him self with feare & admiration, to make him hang vpon God, & humbly yeelde himselfe subiect to his power. Ose.3.5.

By faith we looke for assured saluation in Christ, notwithstanding the weakenesse and vnworthinesse which we finde to be in our selues.

24 Yet we do not hereby make roome to that most pestilent philosophy, which many halfe papists at this day begin to coine in corners. For, because they can not defende that grosse doutfulnes which hath bin taught in scholes, they flye to another deuise, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfulnesse. They confesse, that so oft as wee looke vnto Christ, wee finde in him full matter to hope wel: but because we are alwaies vnworthy of those good things that are offered vs in Christ, they woulde haue vs to wauer & stagger in beholding of our own vnworthines Breefly, they place conscience so betweene hope & feare, that it altereth from the one to the other, by enterchangable times & courses: & they so compare faith and hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is pressed down, when the one ariseth, the other again falleth. So when Sathā seeth ỳ those open engines wherwith before time he was wont to destroy the assurednes of faith, do now nothing preuail, he endeuoreth by crooked vnderminings to ouerthrowe it. But what manner of confidence shall that be, which shall now and then yeeld to desperation? If (say they) thou consider Christ, ther is assured saluation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assured damnation. Therefore of necessitie distrust & good hope must by enterchangable courses raigne in thy minde: As though we ought to imagine Christ standing a farre off, & not rather dwelling within vs. For therfore we looke for saluation at his hande, not because he appeareth a farre of vnto vs, but because he hath graffed vs into his body, & so maketh vs partakers not only of all his good thinges, but also of himselfe. Therfore I thus turne this their argument against themselues: If thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with all his good thinges is by way of communicating so giuen vnto thee that all his things are made thine, & thou art made a member of him, yea and all one with him: his righteousnesse drowneth thy sinnes, his saluation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthinesse commeth betwene thee and God, that thy vnworthines come not in the sight of God. Breefly, this is ỳ trueth: we ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor vs from him, but with both hands to hold fast that fellowship wherby he hath coupled himself vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The body indeede (saith he) is dead by reason of sinne: but the spirite of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for righteousnesse. According to these mens trifling deuise he should haue said, Christ in deede hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remain subiect to death and damnation. But he saith farre otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation Rom.8.10.

which wee deserue of our selues, is swallowed vp by the saluation of Christ, & to proue it, he vseth the same reason that I haue alleadged, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaueth vnto vs not onelie with vndiuidable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine meruellous comunion daily more and more groweth with vs into one body, till he bee made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue saide a little before, that sometime there happen certaine interruptions of faith, as the weaknes thereof is among violent sodeine motions bowed hither or thither. So in the thick mist of tentation the light thereof is choked, but whatsoeuer happeneth, it ceasseth not from endeuour to seeke God.

How wretched soeuer wee bee in our selues, by faith wee know that by Gods most gratious acceptation wee are blessed.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernard argue, when he purposelie intreateth of this question in his fift Homelie in the Dedication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefit of God studying vpon the soule, me thinke I find in it two thinges as it were contrarie. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is vtterly brought to naught. What neede I nowe to reckon vp particularly al the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, couered with darkenesse, entangled with deceitfull entisementes, itching with lusts, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway enclined to euill, bent to all kindes of vice, finally full of shame and confusion? Nowe if all the very righteousnesses of it being looked vpō by the light of truth be found like a cloth stained with floures, then what shall the vnrighteousnesses thereof be accounted? If the light that is in vs be darknesse, howe greate shall the verie darkenesse be? What then? without doubt man is made like vnto vanity: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But howe then is he vtterly nothing whom God doth magnify? How then is he nothing, towarde whom Gods heart is set? Brethren, let vs take heart againe. Though wee bee nothing our owne heartes, peraduenture there may somwhat of vs lie hidden in the heart of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, howe doest thou set thy heart toward vs? For thy heart is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shall be reputed as nothing. Euen before thee, not within thee: so in the iudgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou calleſt those thinges that are not, as though they were. Therfore both they are not, because thou calleſt those thinges that are not, and also they are because thou calleſt them. For though they are not, in respect of theselues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paul, not of the workes of righteousnesse, but of him that calleth. And then hee saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is maruellous. Truly those thinges that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion hee more plainly declareth in these words. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke vpon our selues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying seemeth to be tempered, but peraduenture it is more encreased. Truely it is perfectly stablished, that we glory not in our selues but in the Lorde. If wee thinke thus: if he hath determined to saue vs, we shall by and by be deliuered: now in this we may take courage. But let vs climb vp into a higher watch towre, & seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, wee I say be but in the heart of God. We be, but by his allowing as worthy, not by our owne worthinesse.

26 Now, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in euery place witnesse is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisedome, and in some places wisedome it selfe, although it be but one, yet it proceedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reuerence both of a father and of a Lorde. Therefore hee that will truely worship him, will endeuour to shewe himselfe both an obedient sonne and a seruisable seruaunt vnto him. The obedience that is giuen to him as to a father, the Lord by the Prophet calleth honour: the seruice that is done to him as to a Lord, he calleth feare. The some (saith he) honoreth the father, and the seruaunt the Lord. If I be a father, where is my honour? If I be a Lord, where is my feare? But howsoeuer he putteth difference betweene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therfore let the feare of the Lorde bee vnto vs a reuerence mingled with that same honour and feare. Neither is it any maruell if one minde receiue both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, hath cause enough, although ther were no hels at al, why he should dread his displeasure more greeuously thā any death. But also (such is the wantonnesse of our flesh to runne to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restraine the same by all meanes, wee ought therewithall to take holde of this thought, that the Lorde vnder whose power we liue, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in liuing wickedly doe prouoke his wrath against themselues.

A feare which we ought to nourish in our selues.

27 But that which Iohn saith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie casteth out feare, because feare centeineth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they dread to incurre his displeasure, if they might doe it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they think that it hangeth ouer them, for ỹ they looke euery moment when it shall fall vpon their heades. As for the faithfull: they (as is aboue saide) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang ouer their necks, but they are made the more ware not to procure it. So saith the Apostle when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceiued: for this commeth the wrath of God vpon the children of vnbeleef. He threatneth not ỹ Gods wrath wil come vpon thē, but putteth thē in mind to think vpon this, ỹ the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doinges as he had recited, ỹ they thēselues should not be willing also to proue it. Albeit it seldom happeneth that the reprobate be awakened with onely and bare threatnings, but rather being alreadie grosse and vnsensible dul with their own hardenes, so oft as God thundreth from heaue they harden thēselues to obstinacy, but when they are once striken with his hand, then whether they will or no, they be enforsed to feare. This feare they commonly call a seruill feare: and in comparison set it for contrary to free natured & willing feare which becommeth children. Some other doe suttlely thrust in a middle kind, because that same seruill and constrained affection sometime so subdueth mens mindes, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

Faith being perswaded of the good will of God cannot but perswade it selfe of all good things, especially eternall life and salvation at the hands of God.

28 Nowe wee vnderstande, that in the good will of God, whereunto faith is said to haue respect, the possession of saluation & eternall life is obtained. For if we can want no good thing, while God is fauourable vnto vs, it aboundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of saluation, when he him selfe doth assure vs of his loue. Let him shew his face (saith the Prophet) and we shall be safe. Whereupon the Scriptures determine this to bee the summe of our saluation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs there remaineth no perill, but that all thinges shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, hauing taken holde of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life, and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good things: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either ỹ length or honor or welth of his life, for asmuch as God willed none of these thinges to bee appointed vntō vs, but is contented with this assurednes, ỹ God will neuer fail how so euer many things faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the cheefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the word of God. But whatsoeuer miseries and calamities betide vnto them whom God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when we did meane to expresse the summe of blessednes, wee named the fauour of God, out of which spring doe flowe vnto vs all kindes of good thinges. And this we may commonly note through out the Scriptures, that whensoeuer mention is made not onely of eternall saluation, but also of any good thing in vs, wee bee alway called backe to the loue of God. For which cause Dauid saith, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly heart, is sweeter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all thinges else doe flowe vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and wee bee vncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shal be accursed, and therefore miserable: But if the fauourable face of God doe shine vnto vs, euen our verie miseries shall be blessed, because they are turned to helpes of our saluation. As Paul, when hee heapeth vp a rehearsall of all aduersities, yet he glorieth that he was not by them seuered from the loue of God: and in his praiers he alway beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitie. Likewise Dauid setteth the onely fauour of God against all the terrours that trouble vs. If (saith he) I shall walke in the middest of the shadowe of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes do wauer, vnlesse being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardly fixed in them that is saide in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose GOD is the Lorde, and the nation whome he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

29 Wee make the foundation of faith to be the free promise of GOD, because faith properly staieth vppon it. For though faith doe beleeue God to be true in all thinges, whether he commaunde or forbid, whether hee promise or threaten, and also obediently receiueth his commaundements, and beware th of thinges that he prohibiteth, & hath regard to his threateninges, yet properly it beginneth at the promise, and therein continueth, and thereupon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not found in commaundements or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely giuen. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sent to our owne workes, doeth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stand in our selues. Therefore if we will not haue our faith to tremble and wauer, we must stay it with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offered vs of the Lord, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our owne worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witnesse of the Gospell, that it is the word of faith, which name he taketh both from the commaundements and also from the promises of the lawe, because there is nothing that can stablish faith, but that liberall embassage, by which God reconcileth the world to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relation of faith and the Gospell together, when he teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospell was committed to him vnto the obedience of faith, that the same is the power of God, to saluation to euerie one that beleeueth: that in it is reuealed the righteousnes of God from faith to faith. And no maruel. For sith the Gospel is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is no other testimony sure enough of Gods good will toward vs, the knowledge whereof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, wee doe not denie but that the faithful doe euery way embrace and receiue the word of God, but we appoint the promise of mercie to be the proper marke of faith. Euen as the faithfull ought in deed to acknowledge God to be the iudge and punisher of wicked doings, and yet they properly haue regarde vnto his mercifull kindnes: for asmuch as he is described to them to be considered such a one as is louing and mercifull, farre from wrath, of much goodnes, gentle vnto all, powring foorth his mercy vpon all his workes.

Though faith do beleeue whatsoeuer God speaketh yet it principally respecteth the promise of saluation freely offered in the Gospell.

30 Neither yet doe I regarde the barkinges of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they find fault with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith it did take holde but of one peece thereof. I graunt (as I haue alreadie said) that the generall obiect of faith (as they tearme it) is the trueth of God, whether hee threaten or put vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe feared the destruction of the worlde, when it was not yet seene. If the feare of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatnings to bee excluded out of the definition of faith. This is indeede true. But the cauillers doe vniustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the worde of GOD. For our meaning is onely to shewe those two thinges, first, that faith neuer stedfastly standeth vntill it come to free promise: and then that wee are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but because it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those points are worthy to bee noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betweene the children of God & the rebrobate, betwene the faithful & the vnbeleeuing. If a man do beleue that God both iustly commaundeth all that he commaundeth, and truely threatneth, shall he be therfore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therfore there can be no stedfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vppon the mercy of God. But now to what end do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bring saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the bodie of Christ? Therefore there is no inconuenience, if in the definition wee doe enforce the principall effect thereof, and do ioine vnto the generall name, in steade of a difference that marke that seuereth the faithfull frō the vnbeleeuing. Finallie, the malicious haue nothing to find fault withal in this doctrin, but they must wrap vp Paul with vs in ỹ same blame, which calleth the gospel properly the word of faith.

21 But hereupon againe wee gather that which we haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the worde than the fruit doth neede the liuelie roote of the tree, because no other (as Dauid testifieth) can trust in the Lorde, but they that knowe his name But this knowledge is not according to euerie mans imagination, but so far as God himselfe is witnesse of his owne goodnes. Which the same Prophet confirmeth in an other place, saying: Thy saluation is according to thy worde. Againe, I haue trusted in thy worde, saue me. Where is to bee noted the relation of faith to the worde, and then how saluation followeth. And yet in the meane time we do not exclude the power of God, with beholding wherof, vnlesse faith sustein it selfe, it can neuer giue vnto God his due honor. Paul seemeth to rehearse a certaine slender and common thing of Abraham, that hee beleeued that God which had promised him the blessed seede, was able to performe it. Againe in another place, speaking of himselfe: I know whom I haue beleeued, and I am sure that he is able to keepe that which I haue left with him vntil that day. But if a man wey with himselfe how many doubtings of the power of God doe oftentimes creepe into mans minde, he shall wel perceiue that they which do highlie esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a little profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to doe what soeuer he will, but when euen the least tentation throweth vs downe with feare, and amaseth vs with horror, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we prefer aboue it those thinges, ỹ Sathan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esay, meaning to print into the harts of the people ỹ assurednes of saluation, doth so honorably intreat of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so soone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by turneth to another thing, and wandreth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehearsing how meruellously the Lorde gouerneth the frame of Heauen and earth and the whole order of nature, yet is heere nothing that serueth not fitly for the circumstaunce of the matter that hee speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to do all thinges be presently set before our eyes, our eares will hardly heare the woord, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, heere is declared his effectuall power, because godlinesse (as wee haue already shewed in an other place) doth alway apply the power of God to vse and woorke, specially it setteth before it selfe those workes of God, whereby hee hath testified himselfe to be a father. Hereupon commeth that in the scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was once the author of saluation, will be an euerlasting preseruer thereof. And Dauid putteth vs in mind by his owne example, that those benefites which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euery man, doe afterward auaile to the confirmation of his faith Yea when God seemeth to haue forsaké vs, it behoueth vs to stretch our wits further, that his auncient benefits may recomfort vs, as it is said in another Psalm, I haue beene mindfull of olde dayes. I haue studied vppon all thy workes. &c. Againe, I will remember the workes of the Lorde, and his meruelles from the beginning. But because without the word all quickly vanisheth away that wee conceiue of the power of God and of his works, therefore we doe not without cause affirme that there is no faith, vnlesse God giue light vnto it with testimony of his grace. But here a question might be mooued, what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which beeing moued as it seemeth with zeale of faith, passed beyonde the bondes of the worde. Sara, when she feruently desired the promised issue, gaue her bondmaide to her husbande. It cannot be denied but that she many wayes sinned: but nowe I touch onely this fault, that being caried away with her zeale, shee did not restraine herselfe within the boundes of Gods worde, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the Oracle of God of the election of her sonne Iacob, procured his blessing by euill crafty meanes: she deceiued her husband the witnesse & minister of the grace of God: she compelled her sonne to lye: shee by diuers guiles and deceits corrupted the trueth of God: Finally in making a scorne of his promise, she did as much as in her lay, destroy it. And yet this act, howe much soeuer it was euill, and worthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessarie that she shoulde ouercome many offences, that she might so earnestly endeuour to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was ful of great troubles and daungers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarch Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the yonger sonne, yet ceased not to be more fauourably bent to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truely these examples doe teach, that oftentimes errors are mingled with faith, but yet so that faith if it bee a true faith, hath alway the vpper hande. For as the particular errour of Rebecca did not make voide the effect of the blessing, so neyther did it make voyde her Fayth which generally reigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that dooing. Neuertheless therein Rebecca vttered howe ready mans minde is to fall so soone as hee giueth him selfe, neuer so little libertie. But though mans default and weakenesse doth darken faith, yet it doeth not quenche it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, howe carefully wee ought to hang vppon the mouth of GOD, and also confirmeth that which wee haue taught, that Faith vanisheth awaye, vnlesse it bee vpholden by the Woorde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Isaac and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wandrings out of the way, vnlesse they had beene by Gods secrete bridle holden in obedience of the word.

Faith embraceth no promise but in Christ by whom the thing promised vnderstood from God to vs.

32 Againe, not without cause wee include all the promises in Christe, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospell: and in another place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is ready to be shewed. For if God promise any thing, he therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimony of his loue, Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continuall benefites of Gods liberalitie heaped vppon them, doe thereby wrap them selues in so much the more greeuous iudgement. For sith they doe neither thinke nor acknowledge that those thinges come vnto them from the hande of God, for if they acknowledge it, they do not with them selues consider his goodnesse, therefore they can not thereby bee better taught of his mercy than bruit beasts, which according to the measure of their estate, doe receiue the same fruite of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doeth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises appointed for them, they doe by that occasion procure to them selues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises doe then only appear, when they haue found faith with vs, yet the force and naturall propertie of them is neuer extinguished by our vnbeleefe or vnthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lorde by his promises doth prouoke man not onelie to receiue, but also to thinke vpon the fruites of his bountifulnesse, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Whereupon we must returne to this point, that euery promise is a testifying of Gods loue toward vs. But it is out of question, ỹ no mã is loued of God but in Christ, he is the beloued sonne, in whom the loue of the father abideth and resteth, & then from him powreth it selfe abroade vnto vs: as Paul teacheth, that wee haue obteined fauor in the beloued one. Therfore it must needs be derived and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in another place calleth him our peace: in another place he setteth him out as a bond, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindnes bound vnto vs. It followeth then ỹ wee must cast our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs.

And that Paul teacheth no absurdity, ỹ al Gods promises whatsoeuer they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There be certaine examples ỹ make for the contrarie, For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when hee required of the Prophet the maner how to worship god aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlinesse is praised. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romaine, could scarcely vnderstand that which was known not to all the Iewes, yea and that verie darkly: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God, and the sacrifice of Naamã, by the prophets answere allowed. Which thing neither of them could obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whome Philip was carried, which if he had not had some faith, would not haue taken vpon him the trauel & expenses of so lõg a iourney, to worship. Yet we see, when Philip examined him, howe hee bewraied his ignorãce of the Mediator. And truly I grant that their faith was partly vnexpressed, not only concerning Christs person, but also cõcerning his power & the office committed vnto him of the father. Yet in the meane time it is certain, that they were instructed in such principles, as gaue them some tast of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither woould ỳ Eunuch haue come in hast to Ierusalem from a farre contry to worship an vnknown God, neither did Cornelius when he had once embraced the Iewish religion spend so much time, without being acquainted with the first grounds of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had beene to fond an absurditie for Elizeus when hee taught him of small things, to haue said nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a dark knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely that there was no knowledge because they did vse them selues in the sacrifices of the law, which must haue bene discerned by the very ende of them, that is Christe, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

The outwarde declaration of the vvord vvithout an invvard enlightening by the spirit doth not suffice either to breede or increase fayth in vs.

33 But this bare & outward declaration of the worde of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it to be beleeued, if our owne blindnes & stubbornesse did not withstand it. But our mind hath such an inclination to vanitie, ỳ it can neuer cleaue fast vnto the truth of God, & hath such a dulnes, ỳ it is alway blind & cannot see the light thereof. Therfore there is nothing availably done by the worde without the enlightning of the holy Ghoste. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is farre aboue mans vnderstanding. Neither shal it be sufficient that the minde be lightned with the spirite of God, vnlesse the heart bee also strengthened & stablished with his power. Wherein the schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith do only take hold of a bare & simple assent by knowledge, leauing out ỳ confidence & assurednesse of the heart. Therefore faith is both waies a singular gift of God, both ỳ the mind of man is cleansed to tast the trueth of God, & that his heart is stablished therin. For the holy Ghost not only is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees encreseth it, vntil by it he bring vs to the heauenly kingdom. That good thing (saith Paul) which was committed to thy keeping, keepe in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But howe Paul saith that the holy Ghost is giuen by the hearing of faith, we may easily dissolue it. If there had bene but one onely gift of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an absurditie for him to call the holy Ghoste the effect of faith, which is the author & cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the gifts wherwith God garnisheth his Church, & by encreasinges of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no maruail if he ascribe those things to faith which maketh vs fit to receiue them. This is reckened a most strange conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whome it is giuen, can beleeue in Christ. But that is partly because they do not cõsider either how secret & high the heauenly wisedome is, or how great mans dulnesse is in conceiuing the mysteries of God: and partly because they looke not vnto that assured & stedfast constantnesse of heart, that is to say, the cheefe part of faith.

Gal. 3. 2.

34 But if (as Paul preacheth) no man is witnesse of the will of man, but the spirit of man that is within him, then how should man be sure of the wil of God? And if the truth of God be vncertaine among vs, in those things ỳ we presently behold with our eye, how shoulde it be assured and stedfast among vs there where the Lord promiseth such things as neither eye seeth,

1. Cor. 2. 11.

Our blindnesse before the spirit open our eyes and the clearenesse of our mindes after.

nor wit comprehendeth? But herein mans sharpnes of vnderstanding is so ouerthrowne and faileth, that the first degree of profiting in Gods schole, is to forsake his own wit. For by it as by a veile cast before vs, we are hindered that we cannot attain the misteries of God, which are not disclosed but to little ones. For neither doth flesh, & bloud disclose, nor natural man perceiue those things that are of the spirit, but rather to him the learning of God is fooliſhnesse, because it is spiritually to be iudged. Therefore heerein the help of the holy Ghoste is necessarie, or rather herein his force only reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath bin his counseller: but the holy spirite searcheth out all things, euen the deepe secretes of God, by whom it is brought to passe, that we know the minde of Christ. No man (saith he) can come to me: vnlesse my father that sent mee, draw him. Euery one therefore that hath heard and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seene the father, but hee that is sent of God. Euen as therefore we cannot come vnto Christ, but being drawne by the spirite of God: so when we be drawne, wee are lifted vp in wit and mind aboue our vnderstanding. For the soule enlightened by him, taketh as it were a newe sharpnesse of vnderstanding, wherewith it may beholde heauenly mysteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before dazeled in it selfe. And so mans vnderstanding receiuing brightnesse by the light of the holy Ghost, doeth neuer till then truely begin to taste of those thinges that belong to the kingdome of God, beeing before altogether vnsauorie & without iudgement of taste to take assay of them. Therefore when Christe did notably set out vnto two of his disciples the mysteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing preuailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might vnderstand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his godly mouth, yet the Spirite of Trueth must bee sent vnto them, to poure into their mindes the same doctrine which they had heard with their eares. The woord of God is like vnto the Sunne that shineth vnto all them to whom it is preached, but to no profite among blinde men. But wee are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it cannot pearce into our mind but by the inward master the holy ghost, making by his enlightning an entrie for it.

The light of faith is the gift of God not bestowed indifferently vpon all men.

35 In another place, when we had to entreate of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnfit men are to beleeue. Therfore I will not wearie the readers with repeating the same again. Let this be sufficient that the spirit of faith is called of Paul faith it self, which the spirite giueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therfore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherein calling faith the worke of God, and giuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans own motion: and not contented therwith he addeth further, ỳ it is a declaratiõ of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdom of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh in deed of outward miracles: but because ỳ reprobate are blind at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth also that inwarde seale, whereof he maketh mention in an other place. And God, the more gloriously to set forth his liberality in so noble a gift, vouchsafeth not to graunt it to all vniuersally without difference, but by singular priuiledge giueth it to whom he wil. For proofe whereof we haue alleadged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expositor, crieth out that it would please the Sauiour to teach him, and that the verie beleuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deseruing. No man (saith he) commeth to mee, vnlesse my father draw him, and to whom it is giuen of my father. It is maruellous that two doe heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it vnto himselfe: lette him that ascendeth, not arrogantly assigne it to himselfe. In an other place. Why is it giuen to one and not to an other? It grieueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wote not what depth of the iudgements of God which we maie not search, proceedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is much to me. It is a bottomlesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I maie crie out with wondering, but not shew it in disputing. Finally, the summe commeth to this, that Christ when hee enlightneth vs vnto faith by the power of his Spirite, doeth therewith all graffe vs into his bodie, that wee maie be made partakers of al good thinges.

36 Now it remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may be further conueied into the heart. For the word of God is not throughly receiued by faith, if it swimme in the top of the braine, but when it hath taken root in the bottom of the heart that it may be an inuincible defēce to beare & repulse al the engines of tentations. Now if it be true, that the true vnderstanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the heart, his power much more euidently appeareth, euen by so much as the distrustfulnesse of the heart is greater than the blindnesse of the wit: & as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assurednes, than the wit to bee instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirit performeth the office of a seale, to seale vp in our hearts those same promises, the assurance whereof it first imprinted in our wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirme and stablish them. Sith ye beleued (saith the Apostle) yee are sealed vp with the holie Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the spirite the hearts of the faithfull are grauen as with a seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratifieth the Gospell vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he saith: God which annointed vs, which hath also sealed vs, and giuen the earnest of his Spirit in our heartes. And in an other place when he speaketh of confidence and boldenesse of hoping well, hee maketh the pledge of the Spirite the foundation thereof.

We haue not faith as soone as the truth is conceiued in our mindes except the spirit seale it also to our hearts.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I saide before, the remembrance wherof experience cōtinually reneweth, that is, that faith is tossed with diuerse doubtings, so that the minds of the godly are seldō quiet, or at least do not alway enioy a peaceable state: but with whatsoeuer engin they be shaken, either they rise vp out of the verie gulf of temptations, or doe abide fast in their standing. Truelie this assuredneesse onelie nourisheth and defendeth faith, when we holde fast that which is saide in the Psalme. The Lord is our protection, our helpe in trouble, therfore we wil not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shal leape into the heart of the sea. Also this most sweete quietnesse is spoken of in another place: I laie downe and slept, and rose againe, because the Lorde hath sustained me. it is not meant therby that Dauid was alway with one vndisturbed course framed to a merrie cheerefulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God, according to his proportion of faith, therfore he glorieth that he without feare despiseth al that euer might disquiet the peace of his mind. Therfore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Esaie it is saide: In hope and silence shall be your strength, In the Psalme: Holde thee still in the Lord, and waite for him. Wherwith agreeth that saying of the Apostle to the Hebrues: Pacience is needful, &c.

The certaintie of grace which we haue by faith is more than moral or coniecturall.

38 Hereby we may iudge how pestilent is that doctrine of the Schoolemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God towarde vs, than by morall coniecture as euerie man thinketh himself worthy of it. Truelie if we shal weigh by our works how God is minded toward vs, I grāt that we can attaine it with any coniecture, bee it neuer so slender: but sith faith ought to haue relation to a simple and free promise, there is left no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseech you) shall wee be armed, if we saie that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, so that the pureness of our life doe deserue it? But because I haue appointed one place properly for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially forasmuch as it is plaine enough, that there is nothing more contrarie to faith, thā either coniecture or any thing nere vnto doubting. And they do very ill writhe to this purpose that testimony of the preacher which they haue oft in their mouthes: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or loue. For to (speake nothing how this place is in the common translatiō corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such woordes: that is, that if anie man will iudge by the present state of thinges, whom God hateth, or whom God loueth, he laboreth in vaine, & troubleth himselfe to no profit for his paines: sith all thinges happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offereth sacrifices and him that offereth none. Whereupon followeth, that God doth not alway witnesse his loue to them to whom he maketh all thinges happen prosperously, nor doeth alwayes vtter the hatred to them whom hee punisheth. And that he doth to condemne the vanitie of mans wit, sith it is so dull in thinges most needefull to be knowen: as hee had written a litle before, that it cannot bee discerned what the soule of a man differeth from the soule of a beast, because it seemeth to die in like manner. If anie man will gather therof, that the opiniō that we hold of the immortalitie of soules, standeth vpō coniecture: may he not worthily be counted a mad man? Are they then in their right wits which gather that there is no certaintie of Gods grace, because wee can conceiue none by the carnal beholding of present thinges?

vnto them, if we did take so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secret purpose of God subiect to the slenderneſse of our witte. But when we simply saie with Paul, that we haue receiued not the spirit of this world, but the Spirite that is of God, by whose teaching wee may know those things that are giuen vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must slanderously speake against the Spirit of God? But it it be a horrible robberie of God to accuse the reuelation that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassured or vndoubtfull, what do we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they saie, that this also is not without great presumptuousneſse, that we dare so glorie of the Spirite of Christ. Who would think that their dulneſse were so great that would be counted masters of ỹ world, that they so fowlly stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vnleſse their owne writings that are abroad did testifie it. Paul pronounceth that they onelie are the children of God, that are moued with his spirite: and these men woulde haue them that bee the children of God, to be moued with their owne spirit, and to be without the Spirite of God. Paul teacheth that we call God our Father, as the holy Ghost ministreth that worde vnto vs, which onelie can beare witneſse to our spirite that we are the children of of God: These men, although they forbid vs not to call vpon God, yet doe take awaie his Spirite, by whose guiding hee should haue beene rightly called vpon. Paul denieth that they are the seruaunts of Christ, that are not moued with the Spirite of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirite of Christ. Paul maketh no hope of the blessed resurrection, vnleſse wee feele the holie Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope without anie such feeling. But peraduenture they will answeare, that they do not denie that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modestie & humilitie not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he then, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the faith, to proue themselues whether they haue Christ, whome vnleſse a man do acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath giuen vs (saith Iohn) we know that hee abideth in vs. And what do we elſe but call the promises of Christ in doubt. when we wil be counted the seruants of God without his spirite, which hee hath openly declared, that hee would poure out vpon all his? Beside that, wee doe wrong to the holy Ghost, which doe separate from him faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godlie religion, it is a token of miserable blindneſse, to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glorie of the presence of the holie Ghost, without which glorying Christianity it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truely Christ saide, that his Spirit is vnknowen to the worlde, & is onely knowen of them with whom he abideth.

40 And becauſe they will not goe about to ouerthrow the stedfastneſse of faith with digging onely of one mine, they assaile it also otherwiſe. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousneſse, we maie gather a iudgement of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseuerance to the end abideth in suspense. A goodlie confidence of salnation forsooth is left vnto vs, if wee iudge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment moment we be in fauour, and what shal become of vs to morow we cannot tel. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise: I am surely persuaded (saith hee) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death, nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shal seuer vs from the loue wherwith the Lord embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, prating that the Apostle had that by speciall reuelation. But they are holden too hard to slip away so. For there he entreateth of those good things ỳ commonly come by faith to the faithful, not those that he himselfe specially feleth. But the same Paul in another place putteth vs in feare with mention of our weakenesse & vnstedfastnesse: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fal not. It is true, but not such a feare whereby we should be ouerthrowen, but wherby we may learne to humble our selues vnder the mightie hand of God; as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against order and trueth is it to limit the assuredneſſe of faith to a moment of time, whose propertie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortalitie to come? Sith therefore the faithfull do impute it to the grace of God, that being lightened with his spirit they do by faith enioy the beholding of the heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnes, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulnes, in vnkindly hiding Gods goodnes, than he doeth declare his modestie or submission.

The Apostles definition of faith who termeth it a substance of things hoped for and a certaintie of things vnseene. Heb.11.1.

41 Because it seemed that the nature of faith could not otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substãce of the promise vpõ which it resteth as vpon her proper foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheth awaie: therefore we tooke our definition from thence, which yet varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applieth to his discourse, where he saith that faith is a substance of thinges to bee hoped for, & a certainty of thinges that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he vseth (he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, whereupon the godly mind leaneth & resteth. As if he should say that faith is a certaine & assured possession of those things ỳ are promised vs of god, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for affiance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonlie receiued. Againe, to signifie that euẽ to the last day whẽ the bookes shalbe opened, they are higher thã those thinges that may bee perceiued with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handeled with our handes, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by vs, but if we go beyond the capacity of our owne wit, & bend our vnderstanding aboue al things that are in the world, yea and climbe aboue our selues, he hath therfore added that this assurednes of possession, is of things that lie in hope, and therfore are not seene. For plaine appearance (as Paul writeth) is not hope, neither hope we for those thinges that we see. And when hee calleth it a certaintie or proofe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a coniunction of thinges not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he saieth as much as if he did say, that it is an euident shewing of thinges not appearing, a seeing of things not seene, a plainnesse of darke thinges: a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such such as they be that pertaine to our saluation, cannot be sene in themselues & in their owne nature as they call it: but we behold them only in his word, of whose trueth we ought to be so fully persuaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done & fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it self to receiue such a tast of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needs be therewith wholy kindled to loue God againe? For that flowing plentie of sweetnes which God hath laide vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truelie knowen, but that it must therewithall vehemently moue affection: & whose affection it once moueth, it vtterly rauisheth & carieth him beyonde himselfe. Therefore it is no marueile, if into a peruerse & crooked heart neuer entreth this affection, by which being conueied vp into ỳ verie heauen, we are suffred to come to the most secretly hidden treasures of god, & the most sacred priuy places of his kingdome, which may not bee defiled with the entrance of an vncleane hearte. For that which the Schoolemen teache, that charitie is before faith and hope, is a meere madnesse. For it is faith onelie that first engendreth charitie in vs. Howe muche more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleeue (saith hee) that the testimonie of conscience, which Paul calleth the glorie of the godlie, consisteth in three thinges. For first of al it is necessarie to beleue ỳ thou canst not haue forgiuenes of sins, but by the pardon of God: then ỳ thou canst haue no good work at al, vnlesse he also giue it: last of al ỳ thou canst by no works deserue eternal life, vnlesse it also be giuen freely. A litle after he addeth ỳ these things suffice not, but ỳ there is a certeine beginning of faith, because in beleeuing that sins cannot be forgiuen but of God, we ought also to beleeue that they are not forgiuen vs, til also we be perswaded by the testimonie of the holy Ghost, that saluation is laid vp in store for vs: because God forgiueth sinnes, he himselfe giueth merits, & he himselfe also giueth rewards, that wee may not stay still in this beginning. But these & other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it onely suffice to know what faith is.

Lib. 3. Sen. dist. 25. & sæpius. Ser 1. in Annuntiatione. 2. Cor. 1. 12.

43 Now whersoeuer this liuely faith shalbe, it cannot be possible but that it hath with it the hope of eternal saluation: as an vndiuidable companion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it foorth out of it selfe, which hope being taken awaie, how eloquently, gloriously soeuer we talk of faith, yet we are conuicted to haue no faith at al. For if faith (as is aboue said) be an assured persuasion of Gods trueth, that it cannot lie vnto vs nor deceiue vs, nor become voide, then they that haue conceiued this assuredneſse, truelie doe therewithall looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their persuasion cannot be but true. So that briefly, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those things which faith hath beleeued to be trulie promised of God. So faith beleeueth ỳ God is true, hope looketh for the performance of his trueth in conuenient time. Faith beleueth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shewe himselfe suche a one towarde vs. Faith beleueth that eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reueiled. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nourisheth & sustaineth faith. For as no man can looke for anie thing at Gods hande, but he that hath first beleeued his promises: so againe the weakneſse of our faith must with patient hope and expectation bee sustained and cherished, that

Hope an vndiuidable companion of faith.

Rom. 8. 24. that it fall not as fainting for wearineſſe. For which reaſon Paul doeth well place our ſaluation in hope. For hope, while it in ſilence loketh for the Lord, reſtraineth faith that it fal not headlong with too muſt haſt: hope ſtrēgthe-neth faith, that it wauer not in Gods promiſes, nor beginne to doubt of the trueth of them: hope refreſheth faith that it waxe not wearie: Hope ſtret-cheth faith to the vttermoſt bounde, that it faint not in the mid courſe, nor in the verie beginning. Finally, hope by continually renuing and reſto-ring, it maketh it now and then to riſe vp freſher than it ſelfe to continu-ance. But how many waies the helps of hope are neceſſarie to the ſtrēgthe-ning of faith, ſhall better appeare, if wee conſider with howe manie ſorts of temptations they are aſſailed and ſhaken, that haue embraced the word of God. Firſt, the Lord in differring his promiſes doeth oftentimes holde our mindes longer in ſuſpenſe than we would wiſh: here it is the office of hope

Heb. 2. 3. to performe, that which the Prophet commandeth, that though his pro-miſes doe tarie, yet we ſhould waite ſtill for them. Sometime he ſuffereth vs not onelie to faint, but alſo ſeemeth to be highly diſpleaſed: here it is much more neceſſarie to haue hope to help vs, that according to the ſaying of Eſay 8. 17. 2. Pet. 3. 4. an other Prophet, wee maie ſtill looke for the Lorde that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There riſe vp all ſcorners (as Peter ſaith) that aske: where is his promiſe or his comming? for as much as ſince the fathers ſlept, all things ſo continue from the beginning of the creation. Yea the fleſh & the Pſal. 90. 4. world do whiſper the ſame thing in our eares. Heere muſt faith ſtayed with ſufferance of hope be holden faſt fixed in beholding of eternitie that it may account a thouſand yeres like as one day.

The coniunctiō of faith and hope cauſeth many things to be ſpoken of the one which properly agree vnto the other.

43 For this conioyning and alliance the Scripture ſometimes confoun-deth the names of Faith and Hope. For when Peter teacheth that we are by the power of God preſerued through faith, vnto the diſcloſing of ſaluati-on, he giueth that vnto faith which did more fitly agree with hope, and not without cauſe, foraſmuch as we haue alreadie taught, that hope is nothing elſe but the nouriſhment & ſtrength of faith. Sometimes they are ioyned

2. Pet. 3. 8. 2. Pet. 1. 5. Phil. 1. 20. together: as in the ſame Epiſtle. That your faith & hope ſhould be in God. But Paul to the Philippians out of faith deriueth expectation, becauſe in pa-ciently hoping, we holde our deſires in ſuſpenſe, til Gods conuenient opor-tunitie be opened. Al which matter we may better vnderſtand by the tenth chapter to the Hebrues, which I haue alreadie alleadged. Paul in an other

Gal. 5. 5. place, although he ſpeake vnproperly, yet meaneth the ſame thing in theſe words: We looke in the ſpirit through faith for hope of righteouſnes, euen becauſe we embracing the teſtimonie of the Goſpell concerning his free loue, do looke for the time when God ſhal openlie ſhew that which is nowe hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how fooliſhly Peter Lombard lay-eth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, and the deſeruing of workes. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: & we haue alreadie declared that faith hath one only mark the mercie of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may ſo ſpeake) with both eies. But it is good to heare what a liuely reaſon he bringeth. If (ſaith he) thou dareſt hope for any thing without deſeruings, ỹ ſhalt not be worthie to be called hope, but pre-ſumption. Who (gentle reader) wil not worthily abhorre ſuch beaſtes, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his worde? For where the Lorde willeth vs to looke for all thinges at his goodnesse, they saie it is presumption to leane and rest vpon it. A maister meete for such scholers as he founde in the mad schoole of filthie babblers. But as for vs, when we see that we are commanded by the oracles of God to conceiue a hope of saluation, let vs gladly presume so much vpon his trueth, as trusting vpon his onlie mercie, casting away the confidence of workes, to be bolde to hope well. Hee will not deceiue that saide: Be it vnto you according to your faith. Matth. 9.29.

The iij. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. Wherein is entreated of Repentance.

Out of faith repentance springeth.

ALbeit wee haue alreadie partly taught how faith possesseth Christ, and how by it wee enioy his benefites: neuertheless this were yet darke, vnlesse we did also make declaration of the effectes that we feele thereby. Not without cause it is saide, that the sum of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiuenesse of sinnes. Therefore leauing out these two pointes, whatsoeuer we shall saie of faith, shall bee but a hungry & vnperfect, yea and in maner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and wee obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I beginne to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shalbe to Repentance, because when this article is well perceiued, it shal the better appeare how man is iustified by only faith and meere pardon, and yet how real holines of life (as I may so call it) is not seuered from free imputatiō of righteousnes. Now it ought to be out of questiō, that Repentance doth not only immediatly follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon & forgiuenes is therefore offered by the preaching of the Gospell, that the sinner being deliuered from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdome of God, truly no man can embrace the grace of the Gospel, but hee must returne from the errours of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a fruite out of a tree, they neuer knew the force thereof, and are mooued with too weake an argument to thinke so.

a Christ (say they) and Iohn in their preachings doe first exhort the people to repentance, & then they afterward saie that the kingdom of heauen is at hande. Such commaundement to preach, the Apostles receiued, such order Paul followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the ioyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the wordes hang together. For whē the Lord Christ & Iohn do preach in this manner: Repent yee, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand: doe they not fetch the cause of repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their woordes are asmuch in effect as if they had saide: because the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hand, therefore repent. Matth. 3.2. Matth. 3.7. Act. 20.21.

repent yee. For Matthew, when hee hath ſhewed that Iohn ſo preached faith that in him was fulfilled the prophecie of Eſaie, concerning the voice crying in the wilderneſſe, Prepare the waie of the Lorde, make ſtreight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commanded to begin at comfort and glad tydinges. Yet when we refer the beginning of repentance to faith, we do not dreame a certaine meane ſpace of time, wherin it bringeth it out, but we meane to ſhew that a man cannot earneſtly applie himſelfe to repentance, vnleſſe hee know himſelfe to bee of God. But no man is trulie perſwaded that he is of God, but he that hath firſt receiued his grace. But theſe thinges ſhall be more plainely diſcuſſed in the proceſſe folowing. Peraduenture this deceiued them, that many are firſt by terrors of conſcience tamed, or framed to obedience, before that they haue throughly diſgeſted, yea before they haue taſted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which ſome account among vertues, becauſe they ſee that it is neere to true and iuſt obedience. But our queſtion is not here how diuerſly Chriſt draweth vs vnto him, or prepareth vs to the endeuour of godlineſſe: only this I ſay, that there can be no vprightneſſe found where reigneth not the Spirit which Chriſt receiued to communicate the ſame to his members. Then according to that ſaying of the Pſalme: With thee is mercifulneſſe, that thou maieſt bee feared, no man ſhall euer reuerentlie feare God, but hee that truſteth that God is mercifull vnto him: no man will willingly prepare himſelfe to the keeping of the law, but he that is perſwaded that his ſeruices pleaſe him: which tenderneſſe in pardoning and bearing with faultes, is a ſigne of fatherly fauour. Which is alſo ſhewed by that exhortation of Oſee, Come let vs returne to the Lord, becauſe he hath plucked vs and he will heale vs: hee hath ſtricken vs, and he wil cure vs, becauſe the hope of pardon is vſed as a pricke to make them not to lie dull in their ſinnes. But their doting errour is without all colour of reaſon, which to begin at repentance do appoint certaine daies to their new conuerts, during the which they muſt exerciſe themſelues in penance: & when thoſe daies are once paſt, they admit them to the communion of the grace of the Goſpell. I ſpeake of manie of the Anabaptiſtes, ſpeciallie thoſe that marueloufly reioyce to be counted ſpiritual, and their companions the Ieſuites, & ſuch other dregs. Such fruits forſooth that ſpirit of giddines bringeth forth, to determine repentance within compaſſe of a few daies, which a Chriſtian man ought to extend in continuance throughout his whole life.

Repentãce rightly ſaide to conſiſt of two parts, Mortification & Viuification: ſo that Viuification be taken not for the cheriſhing which the ſoule receiueth when it recouereth out of feare & trouble, but for the purpoſe and deſire which it hath to leade a newe life.

3 But certaine learned men, euen long before theſe times, meaning to ſpeake ſimply & ſincerely of repentance, according to the trueth of ſcripture, haue ſaid that it conſiſteth of two parts, mortification, and viuificatiõ. Mortification they expound to bee a ſorow of the ſoule and feare conceiued of the acknowledging of ſinne, and of the feeling of the iudgement of God. For when a man is once brought into knowledge of ſinne, then hee truelie beginneth to hate and abhorre ſinne: then he heartily miſliketh himſelfe, confeſſeth himſelfe to bee miſerable and loſt, and wiſheth himſelfe to bee an other man. Further, when hee is touched with ſome feeling of the iudgement of God (for the one immediatly followeth vppon the other) then he lieth ſtriken and ouerthrowen, then he trembleth, humbled & caſt downe, then hee is discouraged and despayreth. This is the first part of repentance, which they haue commonly called contrition. Viuification they expound to bee the comfort that groweth of faith, when a man ouerthrowne with conscience of sinne, and stricken with feare of God, looking afterwarde vnto the goodnes of God, vnto the mercy, fauour and saluation, that is through Christ, raiseth vp himself, taketh breath againe, recouereth courage, and returneth as it were frō death to life. And these words, if they haue a right exposition, do aptly enough expresse the nature of repētance. But where they take Viuification for the cheerfulnesse, which the mind receiueth being brought into quietnesse from trouble and feare, therein I agree not with them: forasmuch as it rather signifieth a desire to liue holily & godlie which groweth of regeneration, as if it were saide, that man dieth to himselfe, to begin to liue to God.

4 Some other, because they sawe this word diuersly taken in Scripture, haue made two sortes of repentance: and because they shoulde make them differently knowen by some marke, they haue called the one Repentaunce of the Law, by which the sinner wounded with the searing iron of sinne, & worne away with feare of the wrath of God, sticketh fast in that trouble & cannot wind himselfe out of it. The other Repentance they call of the Gospell, by which the sinner is indeede greeuously vexed with himselfe, but he riseth vp higher and taketh holde of Christ, the salue of his sore, the cōfort of his feare, the hauen of his miserie. Of the repentaunce of the lawe they put those examples: Cain, Saul, and Iudas. Whose repentaunce when the scripture rehearseth vnto vs, it meaneth that they acknowledging the greeuousnesse of their sinne, were afraide of the wrath of God, but in thinking vpon God onelie as a reuenger and iudge, they fainted in that feeling. Therefore their repentance was nothing else but a certaine entrie of hell, whereinto they being entred into this present life, beganne alreadie to suffer punishment, from the face of the wrath of Gods Maiestie. The repentaunce of the Gospell, wee see in all them, that beeing galled with the spurre of sinne in themselues, but recomforted and refreshed with confidence of the mercie of God, are turned vnto the Lorde. Ezechias was stricken with feare, when he receiued the message of death: but he prayed weeping, and looking vnto the goodnes of God, hee tooke againe good confidence vnto him. The Niniuites were troubled with the horrible threatning of destruction. But they clothed themselues in sackcloth and ashes & praied, hoping that the Lord might be turned to thē & turned frō the furor of his wrath. Dauid confessed ỹ he had too much sinned in numbring ỹ people: but he saide further, Lorde take away the wickednesse of thy seruant. Hee acknowledged his offence of adulterie, when Nathan rebuked him, & did cast himselfe downe before the Lorde, but therewithall he also looked for pardon. Such was the repentance of them that at the preaching of Peter were pricked in their heart, but trusting vpon the goodnes of God, they said furthermore: Ye men and brethren, what shall we do? And such was the repentance of Peter himselfe, which wept indeede bitterly, but he ceassed not to hope well.

Two kindes of repentance the one of the Lawe, the other of the Gospell.

5 Although al these thinges be true, yet the very name of repentance

The definition of repentance. Acts.20.21.

(so far as I can learne by the Scriptures) is otherwise to be taken. For where they comprehend faith vnder repentance, it disagreeth with that which Paul saith in the Actes, that hee testified to the Iewes and Gentiles repentance vnto God and faith in Iesus Christ, where he reckoneth repentance & faith as two diuerse thinges. What then? Can true repentaunce stande without faith? No: But though they cannot bee seuered, yet they must bee distinguished. As faith is not without hope, and yet faith and hope are diuerse thinges: so repentaunce and faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bonde, yet they rather would bee conioyned than confounded. And truely I am not ignoraunt, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof faith is not the least part: but in what meaning it is so comprehended, shall most easily appeare when the force and nature thereof shall bee declared. The name of repentaunce in Hebrew is deriued of conuerting or returning, in Greeke of changing of the minde or purpose, and the thing it selfe doeth not ill agree with eyther deriuations, whereof the summe is, that we departing from our selues should turne vnto God, and putting off our olde minde, shoulde put on a newe. Wherefore in my iudgement, repentaunce maie thus not amisse be defined: that it is a true turning of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure and earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the spirite. In this sense are to bee taken all the preachinges wherein either the Prophetes in olde time, or the Apostles afterwarde exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onelie thing they traueiled to perswade, that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lordes iudgement, they shoulde fall downe and bee humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendement returne into his right way. Therefore these woordes, To bee turned or returne vnto the Lorde, To repent, or doe penaunce, are among them vsed without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy historie saith, that men repent after the Lorde, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regarding him, doe beginne to follow his woorde, and are readie at their captaines commaundement to goe whither hee calleth them. And Iohn and Paul vsed these woordes, to bring foorth fruites woorthie of repentaunce, for, to lead such a life as may represent and testifie such an amendment in all their doinges.

Mat.3.2. 1.Sam.7.

Luc.3.8. Rom.6.4. Acts.26.20.

The turning of our liues vnto God doth note an alteration not only of our outward actions, but also and that especially of our soules. Ezec.18.31.

6 But before wee goe anie further, It shall bee profitable that we doe more plainely set out at large the definition that wee haue made. Wherein there bee chiefely three pointes to bee considered. First when we call it a turning of life vnto God, wee require a transforming, not onelie in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put off her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring foorth the fruites of woorkes agreeable to her renuing. Which when the Prophet goeth about to expresse, hee commaundeth them whom hee calleth to repentaunce, to make them a newe hearte. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaning to shew howe the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned vnto the Lord, teacheth that it bee done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which manner of speaking king we see often repeated of the Prophetes) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, hee shaketh awaie all inwarde affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceiue what is the naturall propriety of repentance than the fourth Chapter of Ieremie. If thou returne to me, O Israell, (saith the Lord) returne to me, plow vp your arable land and sowe not vpon thorns. Be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the vncircumcised skinnes of your hearts. See how hee pronounceth that they shal nothing preuaile in taking vpon them the following of righteousnesse, vnles wickednes be first plucked out of the bottome of their heartes. And to moue them throughly, hee warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dalying, because he hateth a double heart. Ther- Ier.4.3.

in deede busily goe about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednes wherewith they held poore men fast tied. Where also he very wel sheweth in what duetes vnfained repentance properly standeth.

7 The second point was, that we taught that repentance procedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the minde of a sinner be enclined to repentance, it must be stirred vp with thinking vppon the iudgement of God. But when this thought is once throughly settled, that God wil one day go vp into his iudgement seate, to require an account of all sayings and doinges: it will not suffer the silly man to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but continually stirreth him vp to thinke vpon a newe trade of life, wherby he may safely appeare at that iudgement. Therfore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance maketh mention of the iudgement: as in Ieremie: least peraduenture my wrath go out as fire, and there be Ier.4.3.

mon to the Athenians: And wheras hitherto God hath borne with ỹ times of this ignorance, now he giueth warning to men, that all men euery where may repent them, because he hath appointed the daie wherein he wil iudge the worlde in equitie. And in manie other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishments already extended, that God is a iudge, that sinners should thinke with themselues, that worse thinges hang ouer them if they doe not repent in time. You haue an example thereof in the 29. of Exodus. But be- The beginning of our conuersion vnto God is feare.

pentance. And he calleth sorowfulnes according to God, when we are not onlie afraid of punishment, but do hate & abhorre sin it selfe, forasmuch as we vnderstand ỹ it displeaseth God. And no maruel. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, the slouthfulnes of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for the dulnes & slouthfulnes therof, vnles God instretching out his roddes shoulde pearce more deepely. This is also an obstinacie which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therfore the peruersnes of our nature enforceth God to the seuerity that he vseth in threatning, because he should in vaine call vs alluringly with faire speech while we lie a slepe. I recite not the testimonies ỹ commonlie offer thẽselues to be found. The feare of God is in an other manner also the beginning of repentance.

For though mans life were absolutely furnished with all points of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshipping of God, it may in deed be praised of the world, but in heauen it shalbe meere abhomination, forasmuch as the chief part of our righteousnesse is to giue God his due right and honour, whereof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our selues to yeelde vs subiect to his gouernement.

Repentance consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and the quickening of the spirit.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that wee saie, that Repentance consisteth in two partes, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickning of the spirite. The Prophets do plainely expresse it, although somewhat simply and grosly according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they saie: Cease from euil and doe goodnes. Againe: Bee washed, be cleane, take away the euill of your works from mine eies: Cease to doe peruersly, learne to doe well, seeke iudgement, helpe the oppressed, &c. For when they call men awaie from wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednes and peruersenesse. It is in deede an vneasie and hard thing to put off our selues, and to depart from our naturall dispositiō. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly dead, vnlesse all that wee haue of our selues be abolished. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enemie against God, the first entrie to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expresse the renuing by the fruits that follow thereof, as righteousnesse, iudgement and mercie. For it were not enough to do those duties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe and the heart haue first put on the affection of righteousnes, iudgement and mercie. That is done when the spirit of God hath soaked in new thoughts and affections, our soules first washed with his holines, that they may rightly be counted newe. And truely as we are naturally turned awaie from God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our selues do goe before, we can neuer go toward that which is right. Therefore we are so oft commaunded to put off the olde man, to forsake the worlde and flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, & to be renued in the spirit of our minde. Moreouer the very name of mortification doth put vs in mind how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we therby gather that we are not otherwise framed to y^e feare of God, nor do learne the principles of godlines, but when we are violently slaine with the word of the Spirit, and so brought to nought euen as though God should pronounce, that to haue vs to be accounted among his children there needeth a death of all our common nature.

Psal. 34. 15.
Esay 1. 16.

Rom. 8. 4.

True repentāce is nothing else but regeneration vvherby Christ restoreth vs vnto the righteousnesse of God from vvhence by sinne vve vvere fallen.

9 Both these thinges do happen vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we do truly cōmunicate of his death, by y^e power therof our old man is crucified, and the body of sin dieth, y^e the corruption of our former nature maie liue no more. If we be partakers of his resurrectiō, by it we are raised vp into a newnes of life, that may agree with the righteousnes of God. In one word I expounde repentance to bee regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence fowly defaced and in a maner vtterly blotted out, may be renued in vs. So the Apostle teacheth, when he saith: but we representing the glorie of God with vncouered face are trāsformed into the same image, out of glory into glory, as by the spirit of the Lord. Againe: Be ye renued in the spirite of your your minde and put on the new man, which is created according to God in righteousnesse and holinesse of trueth. Againe in another place: putting on the newe man, which is renewed after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneration wee bee by the benefit of Christ restored into the righteousnes of God, frō which we were fallē by Adam. After which maner it pleaseth the Lord wholly to restore al those whō he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one daie, or one yeare, but by continuall, yea and sometimes slowe proceedinges God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, cleanseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, renuing all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselues all their life in repentance, and know that this war hath no end but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthie railer & apostata Staphilus, which foolishly saieth that I confound the state of this present life with the heauenlie glorie, when I expound by Paul the image of God to be holinesse and true righteousnesse. As though when anie thing is defined, we should not seeke the whole fulnes & perfection of it. And yet we denie not place for increases: but I say that how nere any man approcheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine hereunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to run al their life long.

Col. 3. 10.

1. Cor. 7. 15.

2. Cor 4. 4.

10 The children of God therfore are so deliuered by regeneration from the bondage of sin, not that hauing now obteined the full possession of libertie, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should haue remaining a continuall matter of strife, wherwith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learne their own weaknes. And in this point all writers of sound iudgment agree together, that there remaineth in man regenerate a feeling of euil, from whence continually spring desires that allure & stir him to sin. They confesse also that the holy ones are stil so holden intangled with that disease of lusting, that they cannot withstand but that sometime they are tickled and stirred either to lust or to couetousnesse, or to ambitiō or to other vices. Neither is it needful to labour much in searching what the olde writers haue thought herein, forasmuch as onlie Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfullie and with great diligence gathered all their iudgements. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certaintie as they shal desire to learn of the opinion of antiquitie. But there may seme to be this difference betwene him & vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithful so long as they dwell in a mortal body are so holden bound with lusts, that they cannot but lust, yet dareth not cal that disease sin, but being content to expresse it by the name of weaknes, he teacheth ỳ then only it becōmeth sin, when either work or cōsent is added to cōceit or receiuing, ỳ is, whē wil yeldeth to ỳ first desire: but we account the very same for sin, ỳ mā is tickled with any desire at al against the law of God, yea we affirme that the very corruption that ingēdreth such desires in vs, is sin. We teach therefore that there is alwaie sin in the holie ones vntil they be vnclothed of the mortall bodie, because there remayneth in their flesh ỳ peruersnesse of lusting that fighteth against vprightnes.

In the regenerate there remaineth stil concupiscence, which concupiscence is sinne and not weakenesse only as S. Augustine termeth it.

Lib. ad Boni. 4. Li. 1. & 2. contra Iulianum.

Ser. 6. de verbis Apost.

And yet he doth not alway forbeare to vse the name of Sinne, as when hee saith: This Paul calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all sinnes vnto a fleshly concupiscence. This asmuch as pertaineth to the holye ones, looseth the kingdome in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which wordes he confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sinne, inasmuch as they are subiect to the lustes of the flesh.

How Christ is said to purge his Church from sinne and sinne to remaine in euerie member of his Church so purged.

Ephe. 5. 26.

11 But this that is saide, that God purgeth his Church from all sinne, that he promiseth that grace of deliuerance by baptisme, and fulfilleth it in his elect, we referre rather to the guiltinesse of sinne, than to the very matter of sinne. God truely performeth this by regenerating them that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the vpper hande and are conquerours in the battel) but it ceasseth onely to reigne & not so to dwel in them.

Rom. 6. 6.

Therefore we so say, that the olde man is crucified, and the lawe of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauinges, not to haue dominion in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenes. And wee confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but wee affirme that this commeth to passe by the mercie of God, that the holie ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should iustlie bee reckoned sinners and guiltie before God. And this sentence it shall not bee harde for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are euident testimonies of the Scripture vpon their matter. For what would we haue more plaine, than that which Paul crieth out to the Romanes chapter 7? First both wee haue in an other place shewed, and

Rom. 7. 6.

Augustine proueth by strong reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that hee vseth these wordes Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs maie not cauill against those woordes, but who canne denie, that a striuing against the lawe of GOD is euill, who can denie a withstanding of iustice to bee sinne? Finally, who will not graunt that there is a fault, where is a spirituall miserie? But all these thinges are reported of this disease by Paul. Againe, wee haue an assured demonstration by the Lawe, by which this whole question may easily be discussed. For wee are commaunded to loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our soule ought to be so occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the commaundement that conceiue in their heart any desire be it neuer so little, or suffer anie such thought at all to enter into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanitie? For what are not these the powers of the soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these do open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughts to enter into them, doe they not shew that they are euen so much voide of the loue of God? Wherfore, who so confesseth not that all the lust of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they cal a feeding, is the wel spring of sinne, he must needs denie that the transgression of the law is sinne.

Our naturall desires are corrupt not in that they are naturall but in that they are inordinate.

12 If any man thinke it an absurditie, that all the desires wherewith man is naturallie moued in affection, are vniuersally condemned, whereas they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answere, that wee do not condemne those desires that God hath so engrauen into the minde of man at the first creation, that they cannot be rooted out without destroiing the very nature of man, but only outragious & vnbrideled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But now sith by reason of the peruersenes of nature all her powers are infected & corrupted, that in all her doings appeareth a continual disorder & intemperāce, because the desires cannot be seuered from such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in fewer wordes) wee teach that al the desires of men are euil: & we accuse them to be guiltie of sin, not in that that they are naturall, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thing can come out of a corrupt & vncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much varie from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians laboured to bring him into, he somtime forbeareth to vse the name of sinne. Yet where he writeth that the law of sinne still remaining in the holie ones, the onely guiltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning. Ad Bonif.

13 We wil alleadge some other sentences, whereby shal better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Iulian: This lawe of sinne is both released by the spirituall regeneration, & abideth in the mortall flesh, released herein, because the guiltines is taken away in the sacrament wherby the faithfull are regenerate: & it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Againe, Therefore the law of sin (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is released in baptisme, but not ended. Againe. The law of sinne (of which yet remaining the guiltinesse, is in baptisme discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flesh to lust against the Spirit. Againe. Sinne is dead in respect of ỹ guiltines wherin it held vs, & euen being dead, it stil rebelleth til it be healed with perfection of burial. And yet plainer in the fifth book. As the blindnesse of heart is both a sinne, whereby man beleeueth not in God: and also a punishment of sinne, whereby a proud heart is chastised with worthie correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart: so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sin, because there is in it disobedience against the gouernment of the mind: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is giuen for recompence to the deseruings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he consenteth by defection, or in man, when he is borne by infection. Heere without any doubtful speech he calleth it sinne, because when error was once ouerthrowen, and the trueth confirmed, he lesse feared slanderous reports. As in the 41. Homely vpon Iohn, where doubtlesse he speaketh according to the true meaning of his minde, he saith: If in the flesh thou serue the law of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselfe saith: let not sinne reigne in your mortall bodie to obeie the desires thereof. Hee saieth not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needes bee in thy members at least, let reigne be taken from it. Let not that be done which it commandeth. They that defende that lust is no sinne, are woont to obiect that Rom.6,12.

Concupiscence acknowledged by S. Augustine and S. Ambrose to be sinne: wherunto S. Iames is not repugnant when he saith that concupiscence after it hath conceiued doth bring foorth sinne.

saying of Iames: Lust, after that it hath conceiued, bringeth foorth sinne. But this is easily confuted. For vnlesse wee thinke that hee speaketh of onely ill workes or actuall sinnes, euil will it selfe, shall not bee accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischieuous deeds & wicked offences the offsprings of sin, & giueth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by follow thereof, but that to lust, is an euil thing and damnable before God.

The phrentique imagination of Anabaptists teaching that men regenerate should take no care to bridle any disordered desire in them selues, but onely follow the conduct of the spirit which can not lead them into any euil: so that whatsoeuer they doe in this their state of imagined innocencie is spiritual & good.

14 Certaine Anabaptistes in this age, deuise I wote not what phrantike intemperance in steede of spirituall regeneration: saying that the children of God restored into the state of innocency, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirite is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they neuer goe out of the waie. It were incredible that mans minde coulde fal to so great madnesse, vnlesse they did openly & proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monstrous. But it is meete ỳ such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnes, that so haue persuaded their mind to turne the trueth of God into a lie. Shal all the choise of honestie & dishonestie, right & wrong, good and euill, vertue & vice, be taken away? Such difference (saie they) commeth of the cursednes of old Adam, from which wee are exempted by Christ. So nowe there shalbe no difference betwene fornication & chastitie, plaine dealing & suttletie, trueth & lying, iustice & extortion. Take awaie vaine feare, saie they, the Spirite wil commaund thee no euil thing, so that thou boldly and without feare yeeld thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choose but be astonished at these monstrous thinges? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lustes, haue put off all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spirite do they belch out? For we reknowledge one Christ, & his only Spirit whom the Prophets haue commended, whom the Gospell giuen vs doeth preach, of whom wee there heare no such thing. That Spirite is no patrone of manslaughter, whoredom, drunkennes, pride, contention, couetousnesse, & guile: but the author of loue, chastitie, sobrietie, modestie, peace, temperance and trueth. It is not a giddie spirit, & runneth headlong without consideration through right & wrong, but is full of wisedom, & vnderstanding, that discerneth rightly betweene iust & vniust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute & vnbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betweene lawfull and vnlawful, and teacheth to keepe measure and temperance: but why do we labour anie longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lorde is not a troublesome phantasie, which either themselues haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue receiued being forged of other: but they reuerentlie seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two thinges bee taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that hee might bring vs into the obedience of Gods wil, being purged from vncleannesse & defilings, which obedience cannot stand, vnlesse lusts be tamed & subdued, whereunto these men would giue the bridle at libertie. Secondly wee are taught that wee are so cleansed by his sanctification, that wee are stil besieged with many vices & much weakenesse, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body: whereby it commeth to passe, that beeing farre distant from perfection, we haue neede alway to encrease somewhat, and being entangled tangled in vices, we haue neede daily to wrastle with them. Whereupō also followeth, that shaking of sloth and careleſneſſe, we muſt watch with heedful mindes, that we be not compaſſed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Valeſſe peraduenture we thinke that we haue proceeded further than the Apoſtle, which yet was wearied of the Angell of Satan, that his ſtrength might be made perfect with weaknes: & which did vnfainedly repreſent in his flesh that diuiſion of the flesh, and of the ſpirite. 2. Cor. 12. 15. Rom. 7. 6.

15 But whereas the Apoſtle in deſcribing of repentaunce rekoneth ſeuen either cauſes or effectes or parts thereof, he doeth that of a very good cauſe: and theſe they be: endeuour or carefulneſſe, excuſing, indignation, feare, deſire, zeale, puniſhment. Neither ought it to ſeeme any abſurditie, ſ I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be counted cauſes or effectes. For both may be defended in diſputation. They may be alſo called affections ioyned with repentance: but becauſe, leauing out thoſe queſtions, we may vnderſtand what Paul meaneth, we ſhall bee content with a ſimple declaration of them. He ſaith therefore, that of the heauineſſe which is according to God, ariſeth carefulnes. For he ſ is touched with an earneſt feeling of diſpleaſure becauſe he hath ſinned againſt his God, is then withall ſtirred vp to diligence & heedefulnes, to winde himſelfe clearely out of the ſnares of the diuel, to take better heede of his ſnares, to fall no more from the gouernaunce of the holy ghoſt, not to be oppreſſed with ſecuritie. Next is Excuſing, which in this place ſignifieth not the defence, whereby a ſinner to eſcape the iudgement of God, either doeth denie that he hath offended, or diminiſheth the hainouſnes of his fault, but a purgation which ſtandeth rather in craving of pardon, than in defence of his cauſe. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confeſſe their faultes, do yet vſe entreating, and that it may take place, they proteſt by all meanes that they cā, that they haue not caſt away the reuerence that they owe to their parents. Finally, they ſo excuſe them, as they goe not about to prooue themſelues righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obtaine pardon. Then followeth indignation thereby the ſinner fretteth inwardlie with himſelfe, quarelleth with himſelf, is angrie with himſelf, when he recordeth his owne peruerſneſſe & his owne vnthankfulneſſe to God. By the name of feare, hee meaneth that trembling that is ſtriken into our mindes ſo oft as we thinke both what we haue deſerued, and how horrible is the ſeueritie of Gods wrath againſt ſinners. For wee muſt needes then be vexed with a merueilous vnquietneſſe, which both inſtructeth vs to humilitie, and maketh vs more ware againſt the time to come. Nowe if out of feare doe ſpring that carefulneſſe, whereof he had ſpoken before, then wee ſee with what linking they hang together. It ſeemeth to mee that he hath vſed this worde Deſire for diligence in our dutie and readie chearfulneſſe to obey, whereunto the acknowledgiug of our owne faultes ought cheefely to prouoke vs. And thereunto alſo belongeth zeale, which hee ioyneth immediatly next vnto it. For it ſignifieth a fearfulneſſe, wherewith we bee kindled when we be ſpurred forward with theſe pricking thoughts: what haue I done? whither had I throwne my ſelf headlong, if the mercy of God did not help me? The laſt of all is puniſhment, for the more rigorous that wee bee to our selues, & the streightlyer that we examine our owne sinnes, so much the more we ought to trust that God is fauourable and mercifull vnto vs. And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being stroken with horror of the iudgement of God must needes do some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly do feele what punishments are shame, confusion, mourning, loathing of themselues, & other affections that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes. But let vs remember that there is a measure to be kept, that sorrow do not swallow vs vp, because nothing more readily happeneth to fearefull consciences than falling to dispair. And also by that craftie meane whomesoeuer Satan findeth ouerthrowen with dreade of God, hee more and more drowneth them in ỹ gulfe of sorrowe, that they may neuer rise vp againe. Truely the feare can not be too greate which endeth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he moue himself to the loathing of himself, he dispaire not, oppressed with too great fear, for so doe we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Vpon which point this lesson of Bernard is very profitable: Sorrowe for sinnes is necessary, if it bee not continuall. I counsell you sometime to returne your fault from greeuous and painfull remembrance of your owne wayes, and to climbe vp to the plaine grounde of chearefull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle hony with wormewood, that the holsome bitternesse may bring vs health, when it shall be drunke tempered with sweetenesse. And if yee thinke of your selues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lorde in goodnesse.

Heb. 12. 3.

Sermone 11. in Cant.

The fruites of repentance, purging of the heart, outward amendment of life and maners. Besides which there are also certaine externall exercises seruing to humble or to declare that we are humbled, wherein the olde writers haue swo vpayes gone beyond measure.

16 Now it may be also perceiued what be the fruits of repentance, euen the dueties of godlinesse toward God, and of charitie toward men, & therwithall a holines & pureneſse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentaunce. Therfore the holy ghost oftentimes, when hee exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the commandements of the law, somtime to the dueties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vncleanneſse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterward to outward testimonies ỹ do set out true repentance, of which thing I wil hereafter set before the readers eies a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the prophets, wherin they partly scorn at their follies that go about to appease God with ceremonies, & do shew that they bee meere mockeries, and partly do teach that outward vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance, because God looketh vpon the heart: who so euer is euen meanly exercised in the scripture, shall perceiue of him selfe without any other mans putting in minde, that when we haue to doe with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse wee beginne at the inward affection of the heart. And the place of Ioel shall not a little helpe to the vnderstanding of the rest, where hee saith: Teare your hearts and not your garmentes. Also both those pointes are expressed in these wordes of Iames: Yee wicked doers, cleanse your handes: yee double men, purge your hearres. Where indeede there is an addition ioyned to the first part, but after is shewed

the verie fountain and beginning that they must wipe away their secrete filthines, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises, which we vse priuatly as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, & publikely for the declaration of repentance. And they proceed from that punishment of which Paul speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to bee in lothsomnesse, mourning and weeping, to flee gorgeousnesse & al trimming, and to forsake all delights. Then hee that feeleth how great an euill is the rebellion of the flesh, seeketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreouer hee that well bethinketh him how grieuous a thing it is to haue offended the iustice of God, cannot rest vntill he haue in his own humilitie giuen glory to God. Such exercises the old writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the fruites of repentance. But albeit they doe not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shal pardon mé, if I speak what I think: it seemeth vnto me that they stand to much vpon them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I trust he will agree with mee, that they haue two waies gone beyond measure. For when they so much enforced, & with immeasurable commendations aduaunced that bodily discipline, this in deede they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that, which ought to haue bene of much greater importance. Secondly, in giuing punishments they were somewhat more rigorous then ecclesiasticall mildnesse may beare, as we shal haue occasion to shewe in another place. 2. Cor. 7. 11.

17 But because many when they heare weeping, fasting & ashes spoken of, both often in other places & specially in Ioel, they measure the cheefe part of repentance by fasting & weeping: therefore their errour is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lord, of cutting their hearts and not their garments, is properly belonging to repentaunce: but weeping & fasting are not ioyned as continual or necessarie effectes thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a speciall circumstance. Because he had prophecied, that there hãged ouer the Iewes a most greeuous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to preuent the wrath of God, not onely in repenting, but also in vttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arrained, vseth humbly to abase himselfe with an ouergrowen beard, vncombed hairo & blacke apparel, to moue the iudge to pittie: so it behooued them when they stoode accused before the iudgement seate of God in pitcous aray to beseech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did peraduenture more fitly agree with those times: yet it is certaine, that weeping & fasting shold be to a very conuenient good vse among vs, so oft as the Lord seemeth to threaten vs any plague or calamitie. For when he maketh any danger to appear, he doth after a certaine manner giue warning, that he is prepared or armed to reuenge. Therefore the Prophet did well, when he exhorted his countrimen to weeping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a little before, were had in examination. Euen as ỹ Pastors of the Church should not doe ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they woulde cry out vppon them them to make haſt to faſting and weeping: ſo that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principall point, that they muſt cut their hearts and not their garmentes. It is Mat.9.15. out of doubt, that faſting is not alway ioyned w repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miſerable plagues: and therefore Chriſt ioyneth it with wayling, when he acquiteth the Apoſtles from neede thereof, vntill the time that being ſpoiled of his preſence, they ſhould be tormented with greefe. I ſpeak of ſolemne faſting. For the priuate life of the godly ought to be tempered with honeſt ſparing & ſobriety, that in the whole courſe thereof there may appeare a certaine kind of faſting But becauſe all this matter ſhall be to be declared againe in the place where we ſhal entreat of the diſcipline of the Church, therefore I doe now the more ſlenderly touch it.

The name of repentance vnproperly giuen to the outvvard teſtification of our penitence: vvhich teſtification by mouth or othervviſe although God doe not alvvaies require, yet he doeth exact alvvaies an vnfained ſorovv for ſinnes committed, and for more grieuous offences more than an ordinarie doing of penance.

18 But this one thing I wil ad here by the way: whē the name of repētāce is applied to this outward profeſſiō, then it is vnproperly turned frō the natural meaning which I haue aboue ſet foorth of it. For it is not ſo much a turning vnto God as a confeſſion of fault, with a beſeeching of God not to charge them with the paine & guiltineſſe. So to do penance in aſhes & ſackcloth is nothing elſe, then to vtter a diſpleaſednes when God is angry with vs for greeuous offences. And this is a publike kinde of confeſſion, whereby we condemning our ſelues before the Angels & the worlde, do preuent the iudgemēt of God. For Paul rebuking their ſlouthfulnes that tēderly bear w their own faults, ſaith: if we did iudge our ſelues, we ſhould not be iudged of God. But it is not alway neceſſarie to make men openly of counſell and witneſſes of our repentaunce: but to confeſſe priuately to God is a part of true repentance which cannot be omitted. For there is nothing more vnreaſonable than to looke to haue God to pardon vs the ſinnes in which we flatter our ſelues & do hide them by hypocriſy, leaſt hee ſhould bring them to light. And it behooueth vs not onely to confeſſe thoſe ſinnes which we daily commit, but more greeuous offences ought to drawe vs further, and to call againe into our remembrance thinges that ſeeme long ago buried.
Mat.11.21.
Luc.10.13.
1.Cor.11.3.
Which leſſon Dauid giueth vs by his example. For beeing touched with Pſal.51.7. ſhame of his newly committed fault, he examineth him ſelfe euen to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, & confeſſeth that euen then he was corrupted & infected with the filthineſſe of the fleſh. And this he doth not to diminiſh the hainouſnes of his fault, as many hide them ſelues in the multitude, & ſeeke to eſcape puniſhment by wrapping other with thē. But Dauid doth farre otherwiſe which with ſimple plainneſſe enforceth his Pſal 25.9. fault in ſaying, that being corrupt from his firſt infancy, he hath not ceaſſed to heape euils vpon euils. Alſo in another place he likewiſe ſo examineth his paſſed life, that he craueth the mercy of God for the ſinns of his youth. And truely then only ſhall wee prooue our drouſineſſe to bee ſhaken away from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euils, we aske releefe of God. It is moreouer to be noted, that the repentance which we are commaunded continually to apply, differeth from that repentaunce, that lifteth vp as it were from death, them that either haue filthily fallen, or with vnbridled licentiouſneſſe haue throwen forth themſelues to ſinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious reuolting, haue ſhaken off the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftétimes, when it exhorteth to repentance meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it rehearseth that the peole did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatry and other grosse offences. And in like manner Paul threatneth mourning vnto sinners that haue not done penance for thir wantonnesse, fornication and vnchastity. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare ỹ few are called to penance, a more than careless assuredness should creepe vpon vs, as though the mortifiyng of the flesh did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly bud vp in vs, do not suffer vs to release. Therefore the speciall repentaunce which is required but of some, whome the Deuil hath violently carried away from the feare of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to apply throughout all the whole course of our life. 2. Cor. 12. 21.

19 Nowe if that be true, which is moste euidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgiuenes of sinnes: do we not see, that the Lord doth therfore freely iustify them that be his, that hee may also by the sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousnesse? Iohn the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his waies, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come neere at hande. In calling them to repentaunce, hee did put them in mind to acknowledge themselues sinners, & al that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lorde, that they might with all their hearts desire the mortifying of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirite. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he called them to faith. For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgiuenesse of sinnes, saluation, and life, and all that euer we get in Christe. Wherefore in the other Euangelistes it is written, Iohn came preaching the baptisme of repentaunce vnto forgiuenesse of sinnes. And what is that els, but that they being oppressed and wearied with the burden of sinnes, should turne to the Lorde, and conceiue good hope of forgiuenesse and saluation? So Christ also beganne his preachings: The kingdom of God is come neere at hand: repent yee and beleeue the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercy are opened in him, and then hee requireth repentaunce, and last of all confidence in the promises of God. Therfore when he meant breefly to comprehende the whole summe of the Gospell, he saide that he must suffer and rise againe from the dead, and that repentance and forgiuenesse of sins must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrection, that he was raised vp by God, to giue to Israel repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men doe heare by the doctrine of the Gospell that all their thoughts, their affections, and their endeuours are corrupt & faulty, and that therefore it is necessary that they bee borne againe if they will enter into the kingdome of God. Forgiuenesse of sinnes is preached when men are taught ỹ Christ is made to them redemption, righteousnes, saluation and life: in whose name they are freely accounted righteous and innocēt in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are receiued by faith, as I haue in an other place declared: yet because the goodnes of God whereby sinnes are forgiuen, is the proper obiect of faith, therfore it shalbe good that it be diligently distinguished from repentance.

20 Nowe as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of repentance, openeth vs the first enterie vnto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labor, are loden, are hungry and thirstie, and pine away with sorow and misery: so must wee endeuour toward repentance, throughout al our life applie it, and folow it to the end, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to repentance: he was sent to blesse the vnworthy, but so that euery one should turne himselfe from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offereth forgiuenesse of sinnes, he likewise vseth to require on our part repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercy ought to be to men a cause to repent them, Doe (saith he) iudgement and righteousnesse, because saluation is come neere at hande. Again, there shall come to Sion a redeemer, & to them that in Iacob repent from their sinnes. Againe, Seeke the Lord while he may be found: call vpon him while he is neere. Let ỹ wicked leaue his way & the wickednes of his thoughts, & be turned to ỹ Lorde, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe. Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our repentaunce were a foundation to deserue pardon, but rather (because the Lord hath determined to haue mercy vpon men to this end that they should repent) hee teacheth men whither they shal trauel if they wil obtain grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrastle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our own naturall soule. Plato saith in certain places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditatiō of death, but we may more truly say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall studie and exercise of mortifying the flesh, til it being vtterly slaine, the spirite of God get the dominion in vs Therfore I think that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike him selfe: not that he should sticke fast in that mire & goe no further, but rather that he should hast and long towarde God, that being graffed into the death and life of Christ, he should study vpon a continuall repentance: as truely they cannot otherwise do, that haue a natural hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sinne, vnlesse hee were first in loue with righteousnesse. This doctrine, as it was moste simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the trueth of the scripture.

21 Now that Repentaunce is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so well knowne by the doctrine aboue taught, that I need not to repete a long discourse to proue it againe. Therefore the Church prayseth and hath in admiration the benefite of God, that he hath giuen the Gentiles repentance vnto saluation. And Paul commaunding Timothie to bee patient and milde towarde the vnbeleeuers, saith: If at any time GOD giue them repentance that they may repent frō the snares of the deuil. God in deede affirmeth that hee willeth the conuersion of all men, & directeth his exhortations generally to al men: but the effectual working therof hangeth vpon the

Spirite of regeneration. Becauſe it were more eaſy to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole courſe of regeneration we are not without cauſe called, the worke of God created to good woorkes, which hee hath prepared that wee ſhoulde walke in them. Whomſoeuer the Lordes will is to deliuer from death, thoſe he quickeneth with the ſpirit of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cauſe of ſaluation, but becauſe it is already ſeene that it is vnſeparable frō faith and from the mercy of God: ſith (as Eſay teſtifieth) that there is a redeemer come to him, and to thoſe that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesſe. This truely ſtandeth ſtedfaſtly determined, that where ſoeuer liueth the feare of God, there the ſpirite hath wrought vnto the ſaluation of man. Therefore, in Eſay, when the faithfull complaine and lament that they are forſaken of God, they reckon this as a token of beeing reprobates, that their harts were hardened by God. The Apoſtle alſo meaning to exclude apoſtataes from hope of ſaluation, appointeth this reaſon, that it is impoſſible for them to be renewed vnto repentance: becauſe God in renewing them whome he will not haue periſh, ſheweth a token of his fatherly fauour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with the beames of his cheerefull and merie countenance: on the other ſide with hardning them, he thundreth againſt the reprobate, whoſe wickednesſe is vnpardonable. Which kinde of vengeaunce the Apoſtle threatneth to wilfull apoſtataes, which when they depart from the faith of the Goſpell, doe make a ſcorne of God, reprochfully deſpiſe his grace, and defile and treade vnder feet the bloud of Chriſt, yea as much as in them is they crucify him againe. For he doeth not (as ſome fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut of hope of pardon from all wilfull ſinnes: but teacheth that apoſtaſie is vnworthie of all excuſe: ſo that it is no maruell that God doth puniſh a contempt of him ſelfe ſo full of ſacriledge, with vnapeaſable rigor. For he ſaith that it is impoſſible, that they which haue once bene enlightened, haue taſted of the heauenly gift, haue beene made partakers of the holy Ghoſt, haue taſted of the good woorde of God, and the powers of the worlde to come, if they fall, ſhoulde bee renewed to repentaunce, crucifying againe of newe, and making a ſcorne of the ſonne of God. Againe in another place: If (ſaith hee) wee willingly ſinne after knowledge of the truth receiued, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. Theſe alſo be the places, out of the wrong vnderſtanding whereof, the Nouatians in old time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whoſe rigorouſneſſe certaine good men beeing offended, beleeued this to be a counterfaite Epiſtle in the Apoſtles name, which yet in all partes do truely ſauour of an Apoſtolike ſpirite. But becauſe wee contende with none but with them that allowe it, it is eaſy to ſhewe, how theſe ſentences doe nothing maintaine their errour. Firſt it is neceſſarie that the Apoſtle agree with his maſter, which affirmeth that all ſinne and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiuen, except the ſinne againſt the holie Ghoſt, which is not forgiuen neither in this world nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I ſay) that the Apoſtle was contented with this exception, vnleſſe wee will make him an aduerſarie to the grace of Chriſt. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offences, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, cannot be ascribed to weaknes, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of the deuill.

The definition of sinne against the holie Ghost: which sinne proceedeth not of ignorance but of malice.

22 But to discusse this, it behooueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offence, that shall haue no forgiuenesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffenes euen vnto death, with despaire of pardon, that doeth not well agree with the very woordes of Christ, that it shall not be forgiuen in this worlde. For either that is spoken in vain, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definition be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue euen vnto death. Whereas some other say that he sinneth against the holy ghost, that enuieth the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definition, which being once proued with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe ouerthrowe all the rest. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the trueth of God, with brightnesse whereof they are so dazeled, that they cannot pretende ignorance: which they doe onely to this end to resist. For Christ meaning to expound that which he had saide, immediatly addeth: He ỳ speaketh a word against the sonne of man, it shall be forgiuen him: but he that blaspheme th against the holy Ghost, shal not be forgiuen. And Mathew for the blasphemy against the holy Spirite, putteth the Spirite of blasphemy. But howe can a man speake a reproche against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that stumble vnware against the trueth of God, not knowing it, which do ignorantly speake euill of Christ, hauing yet this mind, that they would not extinguish the trueth of God disclosed vnto them, or once with one worde offend him, whom they had knowne to be the Lordes annointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that doe moste hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of ỳ gospel, they would be ready to worship with al their heart. But they whose cõscience is conuinced, that it is the worde of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet cease not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holy ghost: forasmuch as they wrastle against the enlightning that is the worke of the holy ghost. Such were many of the Iewes, which when they coulde not resist the Spirite that spake by Stephen, yet endeuoured to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zeale of the lawe, but it appeareth that there were some other that of malicious wickednes did rage against God himselfe, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignoraunt to bee of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whom the Lord inueieth, which to ouerthrow the power of the holy Ghoste, defamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therfore is the spirite of blasphemy, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapeth forth to reproch of the name of God. Which Paul signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercy, because he had ignorauntly committed those things through vnbeleefe, for which otherwise he had bin vnworthy of Gods fauour. If ignoraunce ioined with vnbeleefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupõ followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knowledge is ioyned to vnbeleefe.

keth not of one or other particular fal, but of the vniuersal departing wher-by the reprobate doe forsake saluation. And it is no maruell, that they who Iohn in his canonicall Epistle affirmeth not to haue bene of the elect, from 2. Ioh. 1, 19.
whome they went out, doe feele God vnappeasable. For hee directeth his speach against them, that imagined, that they might return to the Christian religion, although they had once departed from it: and calling them frō this false and pestilent opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christe, that wittingly and willingly haue cast it away: but they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgresse the word of the Lord, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therfore the deceite is in these wordes of falling and sinning. Because the Nouatians expound Falling to be, if a man being taught by the lawe of the Lorde, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, absteineth not from stealing or fornicacation. But cōtrariwise I affirme, that there is a secrete comparison of contraries, wherein ought to bee repeted all thinges contrarie to that which was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular fault, but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therfore when he saith, they which haue fallen after that they Heb. 6. 4.
haue once bene enlightened, and haue tasted the heauenly gift, and beene made partakers of the holy ghost, and also tasted the good worde of God and the powers of the world to come: it is to be vnderstanded of them, that with aduised vngodlinesse haue choked the light of the holy spirite, haue spit out againe the taste of the heauenly gift, haue enstranged them selues from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnder foote the worde of God and the powers of the world to come. And the more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednesse, in another place afterward hee addeth this word by name Wilfully. For when he saith, that there is left no Heb. 10. 16.
sacrifice for them y sinne willingly after knowledge of the truth receiued, he doth not deny, y Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expresly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where hee declareth the priesthood of Christe) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when that is once forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the trueth of the Gospell is of set purpose renounced.

14 But whereas some doe thinke it too harde and too far from the tender mercifulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseeching the Lordes mercy: that is easily aunswered. For he doeth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lorde: but he vtrerly denieth, that they can rise vnto repentaunce, because they are by the iust iudgement of God striken with eternall blindnesse for their vnthankfulnes. And it ma-keth nothing to the contrarie that afterwarde he applieth to this purpose the example of Esau, which in vaine attempted with howling & weeping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophet, when they crie, I will not heare. For in such Phrases of speache is meant neither the true conuersion, nor calling vpon GOD, but that carefulnes of the wicked wherewith being bound, they are compelled in extremitie to looke vnto that which before they carelesly neglected,

To them that sinne against the holy Ghost pardon is not denied if they repent but repentance because they are vnworthie of pardon.
Zach. 7. 13.

that there is no good thing for them but in the Lords help But this they do not so much cal vpon, as they mourne that it is taken from them. Therfore the Prophet meaneth nothing else by crying, and the Apostle nothing else by weeping, but that horrible torment which by desperation fretteth and vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently, for else God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so soone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue already saide, it is certain that the mind of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preuenting it. Also his promise cõcerning calling vpon him, will neuer deceiue. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuersly drawen, when they see that they must needes seeke God, that they may find remedy for their euils, and yet doe flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Conuersion and prayer.

Ezec.18.21.

Although God for commo examples sake doe sometimes remit temporal punishments vpon a counterfet repentance as in Achab, yet his vvrath vvithout hearty conuersion is not turned avvay.

25 But a question is mooued, whereas the Apostle denieth that God is appeased with fained repentaunce, howe Achab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whome yet it appeareth by the rest of the course of his life to haue bene onely striken amased with souden feare. He did indeede put on sackcloth, scattered ashes vppon him, lay vppon the grounde, and (as it is testified of him) hee was humbled before GOD: but it was not enough to cut his garmentes when his heart remained thicke and swollen with malice. Yet we see howe God is turned to mercy. I aunswere that so sometime hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euer the wrath of God lieth vppon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profite got hee thereby, but that he shoulde not feele it aliue in earth? Therefore the course of GOD although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and hee himselfe went into eternall destruction. This same is to bee seene in Esay. For though hee had a repulse, yet a temporall blessing was graunted him at his weeping But becawse the spirituall inheritaunce, by the Oracle of God coulde not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refused that putting away did exclude the mercy of GOD: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that hee shoulde be fatte with the fat of the earth and the deawe of Heauen. And this is it that I saide euen nowe, that it ought to bee referred to the example of the other, that wee should learne the more chearefully to applie our mindes and endeuours to repentance, because it is not to be doubted that when we are truely & hartily turned, God will bee ready to forgiue vs, whose mercifulnesse extendeth it selfe euen to the vnworthy, so long as they shewe any greefe at all. And therewithall wee bee also taught, howe terrible iudgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which nowe make it a sport with no lesse shameleese face than yron heart to despise and set nought by the threatninges of God. After this manner hee oftentimes reached out his hande to the children of Israell, to releeue their miseries, although their crimes were counterfait, and their heartes double and false, as him selfe in the Psalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so friendly gentle dealing to bring them to earnest conuersion, or to make them vnexcusable. Yet in releasing punishmentes for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetual lawe thereby, but rather riseth somtimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their paine, that thereby may appear how much fayning displeaseth him. But (as I haue said) he shew eth some examples of his readines to giue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendment of life, & their pride may be the more greeuously condemned, that stubbornely kick against the pricke.

The iiij. Chapter.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their Schooles of Penance, is far from the pureneſſe of the Goſpell. Where is entreated of Confeſſion and ſatisfaction.

NOwe I come to discusse those things, which ye Schoole Sophisters haue taught of repentaunce. Which I will runne ouer in as fewe wordes as may bee, because I minde not to goe through all, least this booke, which I labour to drawe into a short abridgement, should growe to a huge greatnesse. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, beeing a matter otherwise not verie hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he once fall into their degrees. First, in defining it, they shewe that they neuer vnderstood what repentance was. For they take holde of certaine sayings of the olde writers, which doe nothing at all expresse that nature of repentance, as that to repent is to weepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to bee wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euils passed, and not to commit againe other euils to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorrowfull reuenge, punishing in him selfe that which he is sory to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorrowe of heart, and bitternesse of soule, for the euils that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to graunt these thinges well saide of the fathers (which a contentious man might easily enough deny) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe repentaunce, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offences, out of which they had bene drawn. But if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions, then other may also be adioyned as rightfully as they. As this of Chryſoſtome, Repentance is a medicine that destroieth sinne, a gift giuen from heauen, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the lawe. Yea and the doctrine which they afterwarde teache, is somewhat worse than these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises, that a man can gather nothing els out of infinit volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigorousneſſe that serueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastice and punish vices: but they keepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that drawerh with it correction of life. There is in deede much talke among them of Contrition and Attrition, they torment soules with many doubts, and do thrust into them much trouble and carefulneſſe: but when they seeme to haue throughly wounded the harts, they heale the bitternesse with a light sprinkling of ceremonies.

The ſchoolemens errour both in defining & deuiding repentance.

The first is out of Gregorie, & is rehearsed lib. 4. Sent. Dist. 14. cap. 1.

The 2. out of Amb. & refer. illic, & in Decr. Dist. 3. de pœnitent. c. Pœnit. priore.

The 3. out of August. refert. ea Dist. c. Pœn. poſt.

The 4. out of Amb. refert. Dist 1. Pœni. c. Vera pœnit.

Lib.4.Sen.d.16. ca.1.de Pœnit. disti.1.c.perfecta pœnitentia.

And when they haue thus curiously defined repentance, they diuide it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically than they defined it, although they woulde seeme to haue wasted all their age in framing of syllogismes. But if a man will goe about to proue by the definition (which kinde of argument is of force amõg logicians) that a man may weepe for his sinnes passed, & commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewayle his euils passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may punish himselfe for that which he was sorry to haue committed, &c. although hee doe not confesse with his mouth: howe will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man doe not confesse, then repentaunce may be without confession. But if they answere, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect ỳ it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentãce, which they comprehend not in their definitions, then is there no cause to blame mee, but let them lay the fault in themselues that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my grossenesse) when any thing is disputed of, doe referre all things to the verie definition, which is the stay and ground of the whole disputation. But admit that to be their masterlike licence. Nowe let vs particularly consider all the partes in order. Whereas I do negligently leape ouer as trifles those things that they with great grauity of countenance do publish for mysteries, I do it not vnwittingly, (neither were it verie painfull for me to confute al that they think thẽselues to haue deepely & suttlely disputed) but I would think it against conscience to weary the readers with such trifles without any profit. Truly it is easy to knowe by the questions which they moue aud tosse, and wherewith they miserably encomber themselues, that they prate of thinges that they knowe not. As for example: whether the repentaunce of our sinne pleaseth God, when obstinacy endureth in other. Againe: whether the punishmenres layd vpon man by God, do auaile to satisfaction. Againe whether repentaunce may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sinnes: where they fowly and wickedly define, that penaunce is daily done but for veniall sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselues with a grosse errour, vpon the saying of Hierome, that repentaunce is a second bourd after shipwracke. Wherein they shew that they neuer waked frõ their brutish dulnes, to feele so much as a farre off the thousandth part of their faultes.

We should neuer attaine to any quietnes of minde yf that which the Schoolemen haue taught concerning contrition were true.

2 But I would the readers should note, that here is not a quarell about ỳ shadow of an asse, but the moste earnest matter of all other is intreated of, that is to say, forgiuenes of sinnes. For whereas they require three things to repentaunce, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of woorke: they doe therewithall teach that those three thinges are necessarie to the obraining of forgiuenesse of sinnes. But if it behooue vs to knowe any thing at all in all our religion, this truely behooueth vs moste of all, I meane to vnderstande and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, vppon what condition, with what easinesse or hardnesse the forgiuenesse of sinnes is obtained. If this knowlege stande not plaine and certaine, the conscience shall haue no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assurednes, but continually trembleth, wauereth, is troubled, is tormẽted is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgiuenesse of sinnes hang vppon those conditions to which they doe binde it, then nothing is more miserable, nothing in more lamentable case than wee. They make Contrition the firste parte of obtaining pardon, and they require that to bee a true Contrition, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meane time they do not determine when a man may be assured, that he hath to the full measure perfectly perfourmed this contrition. Truely I graunt that euery man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his sinnes, to whet him selfe more and more to a loathing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrow not to be repented, that breedeth repentance vnto saluation. But when there is such a bitternesse of sorrow required as may proportionally answere the greatnesse of the fault, and such as may in balance counterpaise with the trust of pardon, here the poore consciences are meruellously tormented & troubled, when they see them selues charged with a due contrition of sins, and doe not so atteine the measure of that due, that they can determine with themselues, ỹ they haue duely performed so much as they duly ought. If they say that wee must doe as much as lieth in vs, then come we still to the same point that we were at before: for howe dare any man assure himselfe that he hath imploied all his force to bewaile his sinnes? So when the consciences hauing long wrastled with themselues, and long beene exercised with battels, doe at length finde no hauen to rest in, yet somewhat to ease themselues, they enforce themselues to a sorrowe, and wring out teares to make perfect their contrition.

3 But if they say that I slaunder them: Let them come foorth and shew any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either bene driuen to dispaire, or hath not set for his defence a counterfaiting of sorrowe in steede of true sorrowe, against the iudgement of God. Wee haue also our selues saide in one place, that forgiuenes of sins neuer commeth without repentaunce, because none but the afflicted & wounded with conscience of sinnes, can syncerely call vpon the mercy of God: but wee haue therewithall further saide, that repentance is not the cause of the forgiuenesse of sinnes. As for those tormentes of soules, which they say must bee perfourmed of duetie, we haue taken them away: wee haue taught the sinner not to looke vppon his owne contrition nor his own teares, but to fasten both his eyes vpon the onely mercy of God. Wee haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the labouring and loden, when hee was sent to publish glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preache remission to captiues, to deliuer prisoners, and to comfort them ỹ mourne. From which should be excluded both the Pharisees, ỹ filled with their own righteousnesse, doe not acknowledge their owne pouerty, and also the despisers that careless of Gods wrath doe seeke no remedy for their euilles. For such doe not labour, nor are loden, nor contrite in heart, nor bond, nor captiue. But there is greate difference betweene teaching a man to deserue forgiuenesse of sinnes with due and full contrition, which the sinner can neuer perfourme: and instructing him to hunger & thirste for the mercie of GOD, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne vnquietnesse, wearinesse and captiuitie, it may bee shewed him, where hee ought to seeke for releefe, rest and libertie: and finallie, he may bee taught in the humbling of himselfe, to giue glorie to God.

The grounds of Popish confession.

4 Concerning confession, there hath beene alwaies greate strife betweene the Canonistes and the Scholediuines: while the one sorte affirme, that confession is commaunded by the speciall commaundement of God, & the other sort deny it and say, that it is commanded onlie by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesnesse of the diuines, that haue corrupted and violentlie wrested as manie places of scripture, as they alleadged for their purpose. And when they sawe that they could not so obteine ẏ which they required, they which would be thought more suttle than the rest escaped away with this shift, ẏ confession came from the lawe of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward receiued forme of the lawe Positiue. Euen as the foolishest sort among the lawyers doe say, that Citations came from the law of God, becausse it is saide: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, becausse

Gen.3.9. Adam aunswered as it were by way of exception saying: The wife that thou gauest me. &c. But that both citations and exceptions receiued form giuen them by the Ciuill lawe. But let vs see by what arguments they proove this confession, either Formed or Vnformed to bee the commaundemente of God. The Lorde (say they) sent the leprous men to the Priests, But what? Sent he them to confession? Who euer hard it spoken, that the Leuiticall

Mat.8.4 Luke 5.14. priestes were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, And say: It was commaunded by the Lawe of Moses, that the priestes

Deut.17.8. shoulde discerne betweene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spirituall leprosie: therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce vppon it. Before that I aunswere them, I aske this by the way, If this place make them iudges of the spirituall leprosie? why do they draw to them the knowledge of naturall and fleshly leprosy? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures.

Heb.7.11. The lawe giueth to the Leuiticall Priestes the knowledge of the Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpon vs. Sinne is a spirituall leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Nowe I answere: sith the priesthoode is remooued, it is necessarie that the Lawe be remooued also. All priesthoodes are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honour of priesthoode is also remoued. If they loue so well to followe allegories, let him set Christ before them for the onely prieste, and heape vpon his iudgement seate the free iurisdiction of all thinges: this we can easily bee contented to suffer. Moreouer their allegorie is verie vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is meerely politike. Why then did Christ send the leprous men to the Priestes? That the Priestes shoulde not cauill that he did breake the lawe that commaunded the man healed of the leaprosy, to be shewed before the Priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commaunded the leprous men being cleansed, to doe that which belonged to the lawe. Goe (saith he) and shewe your selues to the Prieste, and offer the gift that Moses hath commaunded in the Lawe that it shoulde bee for a witnesse vnto them. And truely this miracle should haue beene a witnesse vnto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, & now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become witnesses of Christs miracles? Christ leaueth to them his miracle to be examined, they cannot deny it. But because they still dally with it, therefore this worke is for a witnes vnto them. So in another place: This Gospel shalbe preached in all the worlde, for a witnes to all nations. Againe: Ye shalbe led before kings & gouernors, for a witnesse to them, that is: that in the iudgement of God they may be more strongly conuinced. But if they had rather follow Chrysostome: he also teacheth that Christ did this for ỹ Iewes sake, that he should not be accounted a breaker of the lawe. Albeit in so cleare a matter I am ashamed to alleage the witnesse of any man: whereas Christ pronounceth that he leaueth the right of the lawe whole to the priestes as to the professed enimies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not beene stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priests may stil keepe this profession, let them openly take parts with them which must of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this nothing belongeth to his true ministers.

Matth. 24. 14. Mat. 10. 18.

Hom. 12. de mulier. Chananæa.

5 They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not proue that I can make a fairer shewe of them for my side, then they can for theirs. They say, The Lorde commaunded his Disciples, that when Lazarus was raised vp, they shoulde vnbind & loose him from his bondes. Heere first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the disciples: and it is much more likely that he saide to the Iewes that stoode by him, that the miracle might bee made the more euident without suspition of fraud, & his power appeare the greater, that without any touching, with his onely word he raised vp dead men. For thus I expound it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion frō the Iewes, willed them to roll away the stone, to feele the stincke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the only power of his word, and them first to feele him liuing. And this is the iudgement of Chrysostome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to the Disciples: what will they get therby? That the Lorde gaue his Apostles power to loose. But howe much more fitly and more handsomly might these things be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by this signe the Lorde meant to instruct his faithful, to loose them that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sinnes that he had forgotten: that they shoulde not condemne them for sinners whome hee had acquited: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiuen: that they should not be rigorous to punish, & lightly offended, where he is merciful & easily entreated to spare? Truely, nothing ought to moue vs more to readinesse to forgiue, than the example of the Iudge that threatneth that he will bee vnappeasable to them that be too rigorous & vngentle. Nowe let them goe and boast of their allegories.

Christes cōmanding to loose the bondes from Lazarus vvhom he raised out of the graue fruitlessly alledged to proue auricular confession.

Ioh. 11. 44.

Ser. contra Iudas, Gentiles & hæretic.

Auricular confession vveakely proued either by their acknowledging of their sins vvhom Iohn did baptize, or by S. Iames his vvilling men to make their mutuall confessions.

6 But nowe they ioine more neere hande with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to Iohns baptisme, did confesse their sinnes, and Iames willeth that we confesse our sinnes one to another. No marueile if they that woulde bee baptiſed did confeſſe their ſinnes, for it was ſaid before that Iohn preached the baptiſme of repentãce, and baptiſed in water vnto repentance. Whom ſhould he then haue baptized, but them that had confeſſed thẽſelues ſinners? Baptiſme is a token of the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes: and who ſhoulde be admitted to this token but ſinners, & they that acknowledge themſelues to bee ſuch? Therefore they confeſſed their ſins, that they might be baptized. And not without a cauſe doth Iames bid vs confeſſe one to another. But if they did marke what followeth next after, they would vnderſtande, that this alſo maketh little for them. Confeſſe (ſaith hee) one to another your ſinnes, & pray one for another. He ioyneth together mutual confeſſion & mutuall prayer. If wee muſt confeſſe to prieſtes only, then muſt we alſo pray for prieſts only. Yea, What and if it might follow of the wordes of Iames that onely prieſtes might confeſſe? for when he willeth that we ſhould confeſſe one to another, hee ſpeaketh onely to them that may heare the confeſſions of other: his word is in Greecke Allelous, mutually, interchangeably, by turnes, or (if they ſo like beſt to terme it) by way of reciprocation one to another. But ſo interchangeably none can confeſſe, but they that are meete to heare confeſſions. Which prerogatiue ſith they vouchſaue to graunt only to prieſts, we do alſo put ouer the office of confeſſing to them only. Therfore away with ſuch triflings, & let vs take the very meaning of the Apoſtle which is ſimple & plaine: ỹ is, that we ſhould lay our weakneſſe one in anothers boſom to receiue mutual counſel, mutuall compaſſion, & mutuall comfort one of another: then that we being naturally priuy to the weaknes of our brethren, ſhoulde pray for them to the Lord. Why do they then alleadge Iames againſt vs: which do ſo earneſtly require the confeſſion of the mercy of God? but no man can confeſſe Gods mercy, vnleſſe he haue firſt confeſſed his owne miſerie. Yea we rather pronounce him accurſed that doeth not before God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confeſſe himſelfe a ſinner. For the Lord hath concluded all vnder ſinnes, that all mouthes might be ſtopped, and all fleſh humbled before God, and hee onely iuſtified and exalted.

Gal. 3. 22. Rom. 3. 9.

This was the 183. Pope.

7 But I marueile with what face they dare affirme, that the confeſſion whereof they ſpeake, is of the lawe of God: the vſe whereof wee graunt in deede to be verie auncient, but ſuch as wee are able to proue in old time to haue bene at liberty. Truely euen their owne cronicles declare, that there was no certaine Lawe or conſtitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely, if they had had a more ancient lawe, they would rather haue taken hold therof, than haue bin contented with the decree of the counſell of Lateran, and ſo made themſelues to bee laughed at, euen of children. In other thinges they ſtick not to make forged decrees, which they father vpõ the moſt auncient Councels, that they may with very reuerence of antiquitie dazle the eyes of the ſimple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thruſt in ſuch a falſe pack. Therfore by their own witneſſe, there are not yet paſſed three hundred yeares ſince Innocent the third laid ỹ ſnare vpon men, & charged them with neceſſity of Confeſſion. But, to ſpeake nothing of the time: the verie barbarouſneſſe of the wordes miniſheth the credite of that lawe. For where these good fathers commaund euerie one of both kindes, male and female, once euery yeare to confesse al his sins to his owne priest, pleasant men doe merily take exception, that in this commaundement are contained onelie Hermaphrodites, and saie that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female onlie. Since that time, a more grosse beastlines hath bewraied it selfin their scholers, y can not expound what is meant by his own priest. Whatsoeuer al the Popes hyred bablers do prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the author of this lawe that compelleth men to reckon vp their sinnes, & also that there passed a thousand & two hundred yeares from the resurrection of Christ before that anie such law was made. And so, that this tyrannie was then first brought in, when all godlinesse & learning being destroyed, the visiors of Pastors had without choise taken al licentiousnesse vpon them. Moreouer there are euident testimonies both in histories and other auncient writers, which teach that this confessiō was a politike discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a lawe made by Christ or his Apostles I wil alleadge but one out of manie, which shalbe a plain proof thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitutiō of bishops was diligently kept in all the West churches, but specially at Rome. Whereby hee sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all Churches. But he saieth that there was one of the priestes peculiarly appointed to serue for this office. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men do falsly say of the keies giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthoode. For it was not the common office of all priests, but the special dutie of some one that was chosen thereunto by the bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedral Churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of hainous offences, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he saith immediatly after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman fayning that she came to confession, was found so to haue coloured vnder that pretence the vnhoneſt company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learning, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessing. Here, here let these asses lift vp their eares. If auricular confession were the lawe of God, how durst Nectarius repell and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schismatike Nectarius a holie man of God, allowed by the consenting voyces of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the manner of confessing was not only let slip for a time, but also discontinued euen till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of apostasie not only the church of Constantinople, but also al the East Churches which haue neglected that law, which (if they say true) is inuiolable and commanded to all Christians.

Tripart. hist. lib. 9.

8 This abrogation Chrysostome, which was also bishop of Constantinople, doth in so manie places euidently testifie, that it is maruell that these dare mutter to the contrarie. Tell (saith he) thy sins that thou maiest do thē awaie, if thou be ashamed to tel any man the sins that thou hast done, tel thē daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sins vpon thy bed,that there thy conſcience may dailie recogniſe her euils. Againe: But now it is not neceſſary to confeſſe when witneſſes be preſent:let the examination of thy ſinnes be done with thy thought: let this iudgement be without witneſſe: let onlie God ſee thee confeſſing. Againe:I do not lead thee into a ſtage of thy fellow ſeruants, I do not compel thee to diſcloſe thy ſinnes to men,rehearſe & vtter thy cõſcience before God. Shew thy woũds to the Lord the beſt ſurgion,and aske ſalue of him. Shew to him that will reproch thee with nothing,but will moſt gently heale thee. Againe:Tell not man,leaſt hee reproch thee, for neither is it to bee confeſſed to thy fellow ſeruant,that may vtter it abroade, but to the Lorde. To the Lord ſhew thy wounds which hath care of thee,that is both gentle and a Phiſition. Afterward he bringeth in God ſpeaking thus:I compel thee not to come into the mids of a ſtage,and call manie witneſſes, tel thy ſinne to me alone priuatly, that I may heale thy ſore. Shall wee ſay that Chryſoſtome did ſo raſhly, when he wrote this and other like things,that he would deliuer mens conſciẽces from theſe bonds wherwith they be bound by the law of God? not ſo. But he dare not require that as of neceſſitie,which hee doth not vnderſtand to be commaunded by the word of God.

The Scripture requireth confeſſion of ſinnes, but vnto God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer & eaſier,firſt we wil faithfully rehearſe,what kind of confeſſion is taught by the word of God: & then we will alſo declare their inuentions,but not all (for who could drawe the ſuch an infinite ſea?)but onelie thoſe wherein they comprehend the ſum of their ſecret confeſſion. Here I am loth to rehearſe how oft the old tranſlator hath giuen in tranſlation this word Confeſsion ſteed of Praiſe: which the groſſeſt vnlearned men commonly know:ſauing that it is good to haue their preſumptuouſneſſe bewraied,that do giue away that which was written of the praiſes of God, to their owne tyrannicall commaundement. To proue that confeſſion auaileth to cheare the mindes they thruſt in that place of the Pſalm:In the voice of reioycing and confeſſion. But if ſuch change maie ſerue,then we ſhal haue what we liſt,proued by what we liſt. But ſeeing they are ſo become paſt ſhame, let the godlie readers remember that by the iuſt vengeance of God they haue bin caſt into a reprobate mind, that their preſumption ſhould be the more deteſtable. But if we wil reſt in the ſimple doctrine of ỹ Scripture,we ſhall not be in danger of any ſuch deceits to beguile vs. For therein is appointed one order of confeſſing,that foraſmuch as it is the Lord ỹ forgiueth,forgetteth,and putteth away ſins,therefore we ſhould confeſſe our ſinnes to him for to obtaine pardon,he is the Phiſition,therefore let vs ſhewe our diſeaſes vnto him. It is he ỹ is grieued & offended,therfore let vs ſeeke peace at his hand. He is the knower of hearts,and priuie to all thoughts,therfore let vs make haſt to powre out our hearts before him. Finally it is he ỹ calleth ſinners,therefore let vs not delay to come to him.

In swaruing from thy commandements. And such are other cõfessions that are commonly found in the Scripture, the rehearsal whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnes (saith Iohn) the Lord is faithfull to forgiue vs our sinnes. To whom should wee confesse euen to him: that is, if we fall downe with a troubled & humbled heart before him, if heartily accusing and condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquited by his goodnes and mercie. 1. Ioh. 1. 9.

10 He that heartily & before God shall embrace this confession, shall vndoubtedly haue both a tongue readie to confesse, so oft as it shalbe needful for him to publish the mercie of God before men, & not onlie to whisper the secret of his heart to one man, & once & in his eare: but oft & openly, & in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificence & glory of God. After this maner when Dauid was rebuked of Nathan, he was pricked with the sting of conscience, & confessed his sinne before both God & man. I haue (saith he) sinned to the Lorde, that is to say, now I alleadge nothing for my excuse, I vse no shiftes, but that al men may iudge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would haue had secret from the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway followeth the secret confession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for the glorie of God or for the hũbling of our selues. For this reason the Lorde in old time ordained in the people of Israel, that the priest should first speake the words, & the people saying after him should openly confesse their iniquitie in the Church. For he foresaw that this help was necessarie for them that euery man might bee the better brought to a iust reknowledging of himselfe. And meete it is that with the confession of our owne miserie we should among our selues, and before al the worlde glorifie the goodnes and mercie of our God. A confession of our sinnes openly as occasion shall require euen vnto men also allowable. 2. Sa. 12. 13. Leu. 16. 19.

11 And it is conuenient that this kind of confession be both ordinary in the church, & also extraordinarily vsed in speciall maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guiltie of anie generall fault. Of this second kinde we haue an example in that solemne confession which al the people vsed by the meanes and guiding of Esdras & of Nehemias. For whereas that long banishment, the destruction of the City & Temple, the dissoluing of religion, was the punishment of the common reuolting of the: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliuerance in such sort as was meete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselues. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation some few sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulnesse. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselues gather some infection & beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or war, or barrennesse or any other plague: if it be our duetie to flie to mourning, to fasting, and to other signes of guiltines: then confession it self, wherupon all these things doe hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinarie confession, beside that it is commended by the Lordes owne mouth, there is no wise man that considering the profit therof, dare disalow it. For where as in all holie assemblies we make our apparance in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning maie there bee of our pleading, but our reknow- Publique confession of sinnes not onely in particular persons but in generall assemblies also both ordinarie and sometimes extraordinarie allowable and verie needful. Neh. 1. 7.

knowledging of vnworthinesse? But that (some man wil saie) is done by euery prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we thereby confesse our sinnes, I graunt. But if you consider how great is our careles nesse, or drousinesse, or sluggishnes, you wil graunt me that it should be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemne vse of confession, the Christian common people shoulde bee exercised to humbling themselues. For though the ceremony that the Lord commanded the Israelites, was parcel of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in wel ordered Churches profitably obserued, that euery Sunday the minister shoulde rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe & of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lorde. Finally, with this keie the gate to praier is opened as well priuately to euerie man, as vniuersally to all men.

Priuate confession of sinnes for some men in some cases requisite to be made vnto their pastors.
Iac. 5. 16.

12 Moreouer the Scripture alloweth two formes of priuate confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that saying of Iames is spoken, that we shoulde confesse our sinnes one to another, for his meaning is, that discloising our wickednesses one to another, we shoulde one helpe another with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appease him and reconcile him vnto vs, if hee haue in anie thing beene offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although Iames in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we should vnlode our selues, leaueth vs a free choise, to confesse to him ỳ shall seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the Church: yet we ought principally to choose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be iudged meetest. I saie that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lord appointeth them by the verie calling of their ministery, at whose mouth we should be instructed to subdue & correct our sinnes, and also may receiue comfort by trust of pardon. For as the office of mutuall admonishment and reprouing is committed to al men, yet it is specially enioyned to the ministers. So when as wee all ought to comfort & confirme one another in confidence of Gods mercie: yet wee see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, are ordeined as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be saide to forgiue sinnes and loose soules. When thou heares t this to bee ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profite. Therefore let euerie one of the faithfull remember this to be his duetie, if he be priuately so vexed & troubled with the feeling of sinnes that he cannot winde out himselfe without help of another, not to neglect the remedie that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to vse the priuate confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the priuate helpe of him, whose duety it is both publiquely and priuately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Gospel. But alwaie this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certainty, not to binde consciences with a certaine yoke. Heerevpon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to bee required of all men, but to bee ommended to those onelie that shal vnderstande themselues to haue need of it. Then that eue they that vse it for their need, shoulde not bee compelled by anie commaundement, or trained by anie

deceit, to reckon vp all their sinnes, but so farre as they shall thinke it behoueful for them, that they may receiue sound fruit of comfort. Faithful Pastors ought not only to leaue this libertie to the churches, but also to maintaine it, and stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will haue tyrannie absent from their ministerie and superstition from the people.

Particular men bound to confesse their faultes vnto men against vvhō they haue offended.

13 Of the oher sort of confession Christ speaketh in Matthewe. If thou offer thy gift at the altar, and there remembrest that thy brother hath anie thing against thee, leaue thy gift there, and go, & first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. For so charity ỹ hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging and crauing pardon of the offence that wee haue committed. Vnder this kind is contained their confession that haue sinned euen to the offending of the whole Church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the priuate offence of one man, to forbid from holie mysteries al them that haue sinned against their brother, til they be with iust amends reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euil example, should recouer the fauour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corinthian receiued againe to the cōmunion, when he had yelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vsed in the old church, as Cyprian maketh mention. They do penance (saith he) in due time, & then they come to confession, and by laying on of the hāds of the bishop & the Cleargy, they receiue leaue to come to the communion. Any other order or forme of confessing, the Scripture vtterly knoweth not, & it is not our dutie to bind consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I do so much not speake against it that the sheep should present themselues to their shepheard when they meane to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladlie haue it euery where obserued. For both they that haue an encombred conscience, may from thence receiue singular profit, & they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyrannie and superstition be away.

Mat.5.23.

2.Cor.2.6.

A commendable kinde of absolution correspondent to the former kindes of confession.

14 In these three kindes of confession, the power of the keies hath place: that is, either when the whole church with solemne reknowledging of their faultes craueth pardon: or when a priuate man, ỹ by any notable fault hath bred common offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnesse of his conscience, doth neede helpe of the minister discloseth his weaknes vnto him. But there are diuerse waies of taking awaie offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is prouided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be taken awaie, & mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this vse that I haue spoken of, is not to be despised, that we maie the more willingly confesse our sinnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the iudgement seate of God, confesseth it selfe guiltie, and hath one only refuge vnto the mercie of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christes embassador, hauing cōmandement of reconciliation, of whom it may heare absolutiō pronounced vnto it. Here the profitablenes of the keies is worthily commēded, whē this embassage is performed rightlie, & with such order & religiousnes

as beseemeth it. Likewise when he that had in a manner estranged himselfe frō the Church, receiueth pardon and is restored into brotherly vnitie: how great a benefit is it that he vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgiuen by them, to whom Christ hath saide: To whomsoeuer ye forgiue sinnes in earth, they shalbe forgiuen in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnes and profit is priuate absolution, when it is asked by them that haue neede of special remedie to relieue their weakenesse. For it happeneth oftentimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to the whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth neuertheles in some doubt, & hath stil an vnquiet mind, as though he had not yet obteined pardō: & the same mā, if he haue disclosed to his person the secret sore of his mind, and heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospel, Thy sins are forgiuen thee, be of good hope, stablisheth his minde vnto assuredneesse & is deliuered frō that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But whē we speake of the keies, we must take heed that we dreame not of a certain power seuered from the preaching of the Gospel. In another place we shal haue occasion more fullie to declare this matter againe, where we shal entreat of the gouernment of the church: and there shall we see that al the power to binde and to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his Church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the mysterie of the keies, the whole force whereof standeth in this, that the grace of the Gospel be publikely & priuately sealed vp in the heartes of the faithfull, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which can not be done but by onelie preaching.

Mat.18.19. Iohn.20.23.

The keies vvherevvith the Church of Rome supposeth her priestes authorized to binde and loose after confession made.

15 But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euerie one of either kinde, so soone as they come to the yeeres of discretion, must yearely once at the least confesse al their sins to their owne priest: and that their sin is not forgiuen, vnlesse they haue firmely conceiued an intent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offred that they may do it, there is now no more entrie open for them into Paradise. And ẏ the priest hath ẏ power of the keies, wherwith he may loose and bind a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vain. Whatsoeuer ye bind, &c. About this power they stoutely fight among themselues. Some saie that there is but one keie in substance, that is the power to bind and loose, and as for knowledge, that it is in deed requisite for a good vse, but that it is onelie as an accessarie & is not essentially ioyned with the other. Some other, because they saw this to be too much an vnbridled licence, haue reckoned vp two keies, discretiō & power. Other again, whē they saw the leud boldnes of priests to be restrained by this moderation, haue forged other keies, that is to saie, authoritie, of discerning which they should vse in giuing determinate sentence: & power, which they shold practise in executing of their sentence: & ẏ knowledge standeth by as a counseller. But they dare not simplie expound this binding and loosing to bee to forgiue and put awaie sinnes, because they heare the Lorde crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put awaie thy sinnes, O Israell, But they saie it is the priestes office to pronounce who be bound or loosed, and to declare whose sins are forgiuen or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolueth and retaineth sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicateth & receiueth receiueth againe to partaking of the Sacraments. Finally, when they vnderstand that they be not yet out of this doubt, but that it still maie be obiected against them, that oftentimes their priestes do binde and loose men vnworthie, which are not therfore bound or loosed in heauen: then (which is their last refuge) they answere that the giuing of the keies, must be cõstrued with a limitation, that is to saie, that Christ hath promised, that before his iudgment seat such sentence of the Priest shalbe allowed as hath bin iustly pronounced, according as the deseruings of him that is bound or loosed, did require. Moreouer, they saie, that these keies are giuen by Christ to all Priests, and are deliuered to them by their Bishoppes, at the time of their promoting to priesthood: but the free vse of them, remaineth onelie with such as doe exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate and suspended Priestes haue in deede the keies, but rustie and bound vp. And they that saie these things may wel seeme modest and sober in comparison of the rest, which vpon a newe anuield haue forged new keies with which they saie the treasure of the Church is locked vp. These keies we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16 Now I will in few wordes answere to euery one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wrong they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, forasmuch as wee will consider that when place serueth. But where they charge men with a lawe of reckoning vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiuen but vpon condition, if there be an intent conceiued to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessing bee neglected: this is in no wise to bee suffered. Must all sinnes be reckoned vp? But Dauid, (Who as I thinke) had wel studied vpon the confession of his sinnes, yet cried out: who shall vnderstand his errours? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in an other place. My iniquities haue passed aboue my head, & like a weightie burden haue waxed heauie aboue my strength. Truly he vnderstood how great was the bottomlesse depth of our sinnes: how many were the sorts of our mischieuous doings, how many heads this monster Hydra did beare, and how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon vp a registet of them, but out of the depth of euils, he cried vnto the Lord: I am ouerwhelmed, I am buried and choked, the gates of hels haue compassed me, let thy hand drawe mee out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and readie to die. Who now may thinke vpon the numbring of his sinnes, when he seeth that Dauid can make no number of his?

Psal. 19. 13.

Psal. 38. 5.

17 With this butcherie, the soules that haue bin touched with anie feeling of God, haue bene more cruelly vexed. First they called themselues to account: then they diuided sinnes into armes, into boowes, into branches, and into twigges, according to these mens rules: then they weighed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a litle forward. But when they had proceeded a litle further, than was on ech side skie, and on eche side sea, no hauen, no safe roade: the mo that they had passed ouer, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as high mountains, & there appeared no hope, not so much as after long long compassings, any waie to escape. And so they did sticke fast betweene the sacrifice and the stone, & at last was found no other issue but desperatiō. Then these cruel butchers, to ease the wounds that themselues had made, laid certaine gentle plaisters, that euery man shold do as much as he could. But new cares again rose vp, yea new torméts did slea the silly soules, as to thinke: I haue not emploied time enough, I haue not endeuoured my selfe with such diligéce as I ought, I haue passed ouer many things by negligéce, & the forgetfulnes ỳ commeth by negligence is not excusable. Then were there ministred other plaisters to assuage such paines, as, Repent thee of thy negligence: if it be not altogether careless, it shalbe pardoned. But al these things can not close vp the wound, and are not so much easment of the euil, as poyson couered with honie, that they shoulde not with their bitternesse offend the first tast but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth vpon them & soundeth in their eares: Confesse all thy sinnes. And this horrour can not be appeased but by assured comfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into account all the doings of a whole yeere, and to gather together what sins they haue done euery day: forasmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at euening he shall reckon vp the faultes but of one daie, his memory is confounded therwith, so great a multitude & diuersitie presenteth it self For I speake not of grosse & blockish hypocrits that thinke they haue done sufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greatest sins: but I speake of the true woorshippers of God, which when they see themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, do adde also this saying of Iohn: If our owne heart do accuse vs, God is greater than our heart: & so they quake for feare at the sight of that iudge, whose knowledge far surmounteth our vnderstanding.

The miserie wherewith their soules were vexed which had a care & did make a conscience of cõfessing in such sort as the Church of Rome required.

The confessing of all our sinnes a thing impossible, neither is the confessing of them if it were possible so necessarie that without it all men are excluded heauen.

18 But whereas a great part of the world rested them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleeued that God was satisfied, or because they themselues were fully satisfied: but that the anchor cast as it were in the mid sea, should rest a litle from sailing, or as a wayfaring man weary and fainting, should lie downe in the way. I labour not much in prouing this. For euerie man maie be witnesse to himselfe, I will in a short summe shew, what manner of law this was. First simplie it is impossible, and therefore it can doe nothing but destroie, damne, confound, and cast in ruine & desperation. And then when it hath ledde sinners from the true feeling of their sinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignorant of God and themselues. For while they are wholly busied in reckoning vp of their sinnes, in the meane time they forget the secret sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthines, by knowledge wherof they should chiefly haue weighed their miserie. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our euill to bee so great as passeth our vnderstanding. After this rule we see that the Publicanes confession was made. Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner: as if he should saie: All that euer I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I can not attaine with witte or expresse with tongue the greatnesse of my sinnes: let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercie swallow vp the

bottomlesse depth of my sin. But then thou wilt saie, what? are not all our sinnes to bee confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knitte vp in these two wordes, I am a sinner? No, but rather wee must endeuour our selues as much as in vs lieth, to poure out our heart before the Lorde, and not onelie in one worde confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and heartily acknowledge our selues to bee such: and with all our thought recorde, howe great and diuerse is our filth of sinnes, not onlie that wee bee vncleane, but what, howe great, and in howe manie partes is our vncleannesse: not onelie that wo be debters, but with how great debtes we be loden, and how many waies charged: not onelie that wee bee wounded, but also with how manie and deadlie strokes wee bee wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholly powred out himselfe before God, let him earnestly & syncerely thinke, that yet there remaine moe sins, & that the secret corners of their euils are so depe, that they cannot be throughly disclosed: And he crieth out with Dauid: Who vnderstandeth his errours? Lord cleanse me from my hidden sinnes. Now where they affirme that sinnes are not forgiuen but with an intent of confessing firmely conceiued, and that the gate of paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we should graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuenesse of sinnes, than alwaies hath beene. It is not read that all they haue confessed their sinnes in the eare of some priest, yᵉ we read to haue obtained forgiuenes of sins at Christes hand. And truely they could not confesse, where there were neither any priestes confessors, nor anie confessing at al. And in manie ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time sinnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that wee may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doubtfull matter, the word of God is plaine, which abideth for euer: Whensoeuer the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this worde, bindeth not sinnes, but the mercie of God. For whereas they say, that iudgement cannot bee giuen but when the cause is heard, wee haue a solution in readinesse, that they doe presumptuously take that vpon themselues, which haue made themselues iudges. And it is a maruel that they do so boldly frame to themselues such principles, as no man in his right wit will graunt. They boast that the office of Binding & Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine iurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Moreouer their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authoritie was vnknowne to the Apostles. Neither doeth it belong to the priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as hee that heareth can neuer knowe whether the reckoning be iust and perfect. So shoulde there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his words that is to be iudged. Moreouer the whole order of loosing standeth of faith and repentaunce, which two thinges are hidden from the knowledge of man, when sentence must be giuen vpon an other man. It followeth therefore that the assurance of binding and loosing is not subiect to the iudgement of an earthly iudge: because the minister of the worde, when hee doeth his office, can not giue absolution but conditionally: but that this is spoken for the sinnes sake,

Psal.19.12.

Eze.18.21.

Whose sinnes ye forgiue, &c. that they shoulde not doubt that the pardon which is promised by the commaundement and worde of God, shalbe ratified in heauen.

Auricular confession a meane to make men not ashamed of sinning but bolde to sinne.

19 Therefore it is no maruell, if wee condemne and desire to haue vterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent and so manie waies hurtfull to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath giuen cause to so many wickednesses, sacrileges and errours, who wil not thinke that it ought to bee presently abolished? They doe indeede reckon vp some good vses, which they boast vpon as verie profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One onely they commend with a singular prerogatiue, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, whereby the sinner both is for a time to come made warer, and preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though wee did not humble a man with shamefastnesse enough when we call him to that high iudgement seate of heauen, I meane to the hearing of God. It is forsooth verie well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge wee ceasse to sinne, and bee not ashamed to haue God witnes of our euill conscience. Although the verie same is also most false, for it is to bee seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when men hauing made confession to a priest, think they may wipe their mouth and saie, I did it not. And not only they are made all the yeere long the bolder to sinne: but all the rest of the yeere bearing themselues bolde vpon confession, they neuer sigh vnto God, they neuer returne to themselues, but heape sinnes vpon sinnes, till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke themselues discharged of their burden, and that they haue taken away from God the iudgement that they haue giuen to the priest, and that they haue brought God in forgetfulnesse when they haue made the priest priuie. Moreouer who doth merily see the day of confession at hand? Who goeth to confession with a cheerefull heart, and commeth not to it rather aganst his will, and as it were drawing backwarde, like as if he were taken by the necke and drawen to prison? vnlesse peraduenture it bee the verie priestes, that vse ioyfully to delight themselues with mutuall rehearsals of their doings, as it were with merie tales? I wil not defile much paper with monstrous abhominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth ful. Onelie this I saie, If that holy man did not vnwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke awaie confession out of the Church, yea out of the remembraunce of his flock: then we be thereby put in minde what is needefull to bee done at this daie vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incests, and bawderies.

Authoritie granted to binde and loose is no authorizing of Popish priestes to absolue in such sort as they doe.

20 Where the Confessioners alleadge for this purpose the power of the keies, and doe thereupon set the peupe and prore of their kingdome, as the prouerbe is: it is to be seene howe much they ought to auaile. Then (saie they) are the keyes giuen without cause? Is it saide without cause: Whatsoeuer you loose vpon earth, shall bee also loosed in heauen? Doe we then make the worde of Christ voyde? I aunsweare there was a weightie cause why the keyes shoulde bee giuen, as both I haue euen now alreadie decla-

declared, and shall more plainely shewe againe when I come to entreate of Excómunication. But what if I do with one sword cut off the hold of all that they require, that is, with saying, that sacrificing priestes are not the vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also bee to bee intreated of in an other place: but now they rayse vp an engine whereby they woulde most of all defende themselues, and thereby maie all their buildinges be ouerthrowen. For Christ did not giue his Apostles the power to binde and loose, before that hee gaue them the holie Ghost. Therefore I saie, that none haue the power of the keies that haue not first receiued the holie Ghost. I denie that anie man can vse the keies, but hauing the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to bee done. They trifling saie, that they haue the holie Ghost. But indeede they denie it, vnlesse peraduenture they faine (as they doe faine indeede) the holie Ghost to be a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therein they shal not be beleued. And by this engine they are vtterly ouerthrowen, that of whatsoeuer dore they boast that they haue the keie, a man maie alway aske them whether they haue the holie Ghost which is the iudge and gouernour of the keies. If they aunsweare that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holie Ghost may erre. This they wil not be glad to speake expresly, although they crokedly vtter the same by their doctrine. It is therefore to bee gathered, that no priestes haue power of the keyes which doe commonly without consideration loose those thinges that the Lorde woulde haue to bee bounde, and binde those thinges that the Lord commaunded to be loosed.

21 Whereas they see themselues conuinced by most cleere experimentes, that they do without choise loose & bind the worthie and vnworthie, they vsurpe a power without knowledge. And though they dare not denie that knowledge is requisite for a good vse, yet they write that the verie power is giuen to euill disposers of it. But this is the power, whatsoeuer thou bindest or loosest in earth, shall bee bounde or loosed in heauen. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that haue this power doe well binde and loose. Neither maie they dallie & saie, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the deseruings of him that is bound or loosed. And wee also confesse, that none can bee bounde or loosed, but they that are worthie to bee bound or loosed. But the messengers of the Gospell and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this woorthinesse, in this worde the messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgiuenesse of sinnes in Christ by faith, they maie proclaime damnation into all and vpon all that embrace not Christ. In this worde the Churche pronounceth that fornicators, adulterers, theeues, mansleyers, couetous men, vniust men, haue no parte in the kingdome of God, and bindeth such with most sure bondes. With the same woorde the Church looseth them whom it comforteth beeing repentant. But what power shall this bee, not to know what is to bee bounde or loosed, and not to bee able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then doe they saie that they loose by authoritie giuen vnto them, when the loosing is vncertaine? What haue wee to do with this imaginatiue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it alrea-

1. Cor. 6. 9.

die prooued that either there is no vſe of it, or ſo vncertaine an vſe as maie be accounted for none at al. For wheras they confeſſe that there is a great part of Prieſtes that doe not rightlie vſe the keyes, and that the power without lawfull vſe is of no effect. Who ſhall aſſure mee that he of whom I am looſed is a good vſer of the keies? if hee be an euill vſer of it, what hath hee elſe but ſuch a voide diſpoſing of them, as to ſaie, what is to be bound or looſed in thee I know not, foraſmuch as I lacke the right vſe of the keyes, but if thou deſerue I looſe thee. But ſo much might doe, I will not ſaie a laie man (for they could not beare that with patient eares) but a Turke or a Diuell. For it is aſmuch as to ſaie, I haue not the worde of God the ſure rule of looſing, but there is power giuen mee to looſe thee, if thy deſeruinges be ſo. We ſee therefore what they meant, when they defined the keies to bee the authoritie of diſcerning, and power of executing: and that knowledge is adioyned for a counſeller, and like a counſeller ſerueth for a good vſe: vndoubtedly euen they deſired to raigne at their owne will, licentiouſly without God and his word.

The vncertainties and abſurdities of popiſh abſolution.

22 If anie man take exception and ſaie, that the lawfull miniſters of Chriſt ſhall be no leſſe doubtfull in their office, becauſe the abſolution that hangeth vpon faith ſhall alwaie remaine doubtfull: and then that ſinners ſhall haue either none or a colde comfort, becauſe the miniſter himſelfe which is no competent iudge of their faith, cannot be aſſured of their abſolution: wee haue anſweare thereunto in readineſſe. For they ſaie that no ſinnes are forgiuen by the prieſt, but ſuch whereof himſelfe hath beene the hearer: ſo by their opinion, the forgiuenes hangeth vpon the iudgemẽt of the prieſt, & if he doe not wiſely diſcerne who be worthie of pardon, the whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power wherof they ſpeak, is a iuriſdiction adioyned to examination, whereunto pardon and abſolution is reſtrained. In this point is found no ſure ground, but rather it is a bottomleſſe depth. For where the confeſſion is not ſound, the hope of pardon is alſo lame, and then the prieſt himſelfe muſt needs ſticke in ſuſpenſe while hee can not tell, whether the ſinner doe faithfully reckon vp all the euill deedes. Finally (ſuch is the ignorance and rudeneſſe of prieſtes) the moſt part are no fitter to doe this office, than a ſhoomaker to plowe the ground, and the reſt in a maner all ought worthily to ſuſpect themſelues. Hereupon therefore riſeth the perplexitie and doubtfulneſſe of the Popes abſolution, becauſe they will haue it grounded vpon the perſon of the prieſt, & not only that, but alſo vpon knowledge, that he may iudge only of things informed, examined and proued. Nowe if a man ſhoulde aske of theſe good doctors, whether a ſinner be reconciled to God, when ſome ſinnes are forgiuen: I ſee not what they haue to anſweare, but that they ſhall bee compelled to confeſſe that all is vnprofitable, that the prieſt pronounceth of the forgiuenes of thoſe ſinnes that he hath hearde rehearſed, ſo long as the other ſins are not deliuered frõ condemnation. On the behalf of him that confeſſeth how hurtful carefulneſſe holdeth his conſcience bound, appeareth hereby that when he reſteth vpon the prieſtes diſcretion, as they call it, hee can determine nothing certainely by the worde of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleere from all theſe abſurdities. For the abſolution is conditi-ditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that hee syncerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, & obey the grace offered him. So hee can not erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is giuen him in instructions by the worde of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the maister himselfe, Bee it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath beene wickedly despised in the Papacie. Matth. 9. 29.

23 How foolishly they confounde those thinges that the Scripture teacheth of the power of keyes, I haue promised that I will speake in an other place, and there shall be a more conuenient place for it, when I come to intreat of the gouernement of the church. But let the readers remember that those thinges are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secrete confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospel, and partly of excommunication. Wherefore when they obiect that the power of loosing is giuen to the Apostles, which priestes may vse in forgiuing sins acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fonde principle, because the absolution that serueth faith, is nothing else but a witnesse of pardon taken out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth vpon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secrete sinnes, but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken awaie. But whereas they scrape together here & there testimonies, to proue that it sufficeth not to confesse sins either to God onlie or to laie men, vnlesse a priest be the hearer of them, their trauell therein is but leawd, and such as they maie bee ashamed of. For when the auncient fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselues to their owne pastour, it can not be expounded of particular rehearsall which then was not in vse. Then, Lombard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seeme of set purpose to haue giuen themselues to fained bookes, by pretēce wherof they might deceiue the simple. They doe indeede truely confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although he haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the priest doeth not so much forgiue sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgiuen. Albeit in the word of declaring they sliely bring in a grosse errour, thrusting a ceremonie in steede of doctrine. But whereas they patch vnto it, that he is absolued in the face of the Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they do inconueniently draw to the peculiar vse of euerie particular man, that which wee haue alreadie saide to bee appointed for the common discipline, where the offence of a hainous and notorious fault is to bee taken awaie. But by and by after, they depraue and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgiuing, with an enioyning of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to part that in halfes, which GOD hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when hee simplie requireth repentaunce and faith, this partition or exception is a verie robberie of God. For it is in effect asmuch

Thinges spoken of the Gospel and of excommunication vvrested to the maintenance of auricular confession, vaine deuises concerning the absolution of them that confesse, corrupt iniunctions of penalties & satisfactions laide vpon them that are absolued.

as if the priest taking vpon him the person of a Tribune, shoulde become intercessour to God and woulde not suffer God of his meere liberalitie to receiue him into fauour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seate and there hath bin punished.

Auricular confession an humane constitution, established in most corrupte times of the Church, bringing some to despaire and some to be careless, impossible to be defended or coloured by any shift in the world

24 The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they will make God the author of this counterfaite confession, therein is their falsehoode condemned, as I haue proued them falle forgers in the fewe places that they alleadge. But sith it is euident that it is a lawe made by men, I say that it is both tyrannical & made iniuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his worde, will haue them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lorde woulde to bee free, I saie that this is a sacrilege not to be suffered, because there is nothing more properlie belonging to God, than to forgiue sinnes, wherein consisteth saluation for vs. Moreouer I haue shewed that this tyrannie was first brought in, when the worlde was oppressed with filthie barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth downe headlong into desperation the poore soules in whom soeuer abideth a feare of God: or where there reigneth carelesnes, delighteth them with vaine flatteries, & so maketh the duller. Last of all I haue declared, that whatsoeuer mitigations they bring, tend to no other end, but to entangle, darken and deprave pure doctrine, and hide vngodlines with deceitful colours.

Satisfaction grossly added as a part necessarie in repentance.

25 The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that euer they babble may bee ouerthrowen with one worde. They saie that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to absteine from his former euils, and change his behauiour into better, vnlesse he make satisfaction to God for those thinges that hee hath done: And that there be many helpes by which wee maie redeeme sinnes, as weepings, fastings, oblations and the workes of charitie. With these we must winne the Lorde to bee fauorable, with these wee must pay our debtes to the righteousnesse of God, with these wee must make amendes for our defaultes, with these wee must deserue pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercie hee hath forgiuen our fault, yet by the discipline of his iustice he reteineth the paine, & that this is the paine that must bee redeemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they saie commeth to this point, that wee doe indeed obteyne pardon of our sinnes at the mercifulnesse of God, but by meanes of the deseruing of our works, by which the offence of our sinnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may bee fully made to Gods righteousnes. Against such lies, I set the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, than which there is nothing more euidently spoken of in the scripture. First, what is forgiuenes, but a gift of meere liberalitie? For the creditor is not said to forgiue, ỹ acknowledgeth by acquitãce that the mony is paid, but he ỹ without any paiment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the debters bond Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away al opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore doe they yet set vp their satisfaction, that are stricken downe with so mighty a thunderbolt? But what? when the Lord crieth out by Esaie, It is I, it is I, that doe put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindfull of thy sinnes: doeth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgiuenes onlie from his own goodnes? Moreouer wheras the whole Scripture beareth this witnesse of Christ, that forgiuenesse of sinnes is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then doe they teach that it is receiued by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they giue this to satisfactions, although they saie that the same be vsed as helps by waie of meanes. For whereas the Scripture saith By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we all cadge nothing of our own, but rest vpon the only commendation of Christ. As Paul, where hee affirmeth that God is reconciling the world to himselfe in Christ, for his sake not imputing to men their sins, he immediatly sheweth the meane & maner how, because he that was without sinne, was made sinne for vs. Act.10.43. 2.Cor.5.19.

16 But (such is their peruersnesse) they say that both forgiuenesse of sinnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptisme receiued into the fauour of God by Christ: that after baptisme we must rise againe by satisfactions, and that the blood of Christ profiteth nothing, but so far as it is distributed by the keies of the Church. Neither do I speak of a doubtful matter, forasmuch as they haue in most euident writings bewraied their own filthines, & not one or two of them, but al the Schoolemen vniuersally For their master after that he had cõfessed that Christ had paied the penaltie of sinnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediatly correcteth his saying with adding this exception, that in baptisme all temporall penalties of sinnes are released, but after baptisme they are minished by the helpe of penance, that so the crosse of Christ and our penance maie worke together. But Iohn saith farre otherwise, if any sin, wee haue an aduocate with the Father, euen Iesus Christ, which is the propitiation for our sinnes, I write vnto you children, because your sinnes are forgiuen you for his names sake. Truelie, hee speakeah to the faithfull, to whom when he setteth forth Christ to be the propitiation of sinnes, he sheweth that there is no other satisfaction, by which God beeing displeased, maie be made fauourable and appeased. He doeth not saie: God was once reconciled vnto you by Christ, nowe seeke you other meanes, but hee maketh him a perpetuall aduocate, alway to restore vs by his intercession into the fauour of his father: a perpetual propitiation, by which our sinnes maie be cleansed awaie. For this is euer true that the other Iohn saide: Beholde, the Lambe of God, beholde him that taketh awaie the sinnes of the world. He taketh them away (saith he) himselfe and none other, that is to say, for asmuch as he alone is the Lambe of God, hee alone also is the oblation for sinnes, he alone the propitiation sacrifice, he alone the satisfactiõ. For wheras the right and power to forgiue belongeth properly to the father, in the respect that he is distinguished from the sonne, as we haue alreadie seene: Christ is here set in another degree, that taking vpon himself the paine due vnto vs, hee hath taken away our guiltinesse before the iudgement of God. Whereupon followeth, that we shal no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, vnlesse the same honour remaine whole with him, which they doe wrongfully take to themselues that goe about to appease

The faith which holdeth Christ to be the propitiatiõ for our sinnes can not stand with that doctrine which teacheth satisfaction to be made by vs for sins committed after baptisme. Lib.3.Sentent. dist.9. 1.Pet.2.24. 2 Tim.1.9. 1.Iohn.2. 2 & 12. Iohn.1.36.

note the papists error

God with their owne recompensings.

They can not yeelde vnto Christ that honor vvhich they should nor giue that peace in their owvn consciences vvhich they might vvho rest any thing vpon the force of their owvne satisfactions.

27 And heere it is good to consider two thinges: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and vnminished: and that the consciences being assured of the forgiuenesse of sinne, may haue peace with God. Esaie saith, that the father hath laide the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that we shoulde be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes saith: that Christ did in his body beare our sins vpon the tree. Paul writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sin for vs. That is to saie, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was giuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sins with al their malediction & curse, with the dreadful iudgement of God, and condemnation of death should bee cast. Heere those trifling are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, euery one of vs doth none other wise feele the effectualnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we bee called backe to the onelie satisfaction of Christ. Nowe set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgiuenesse of sinnes: that if we afterward fall, to the obtaining of a second forgiuenesse our woorkes doe woorke with it. If these thinges may haue place, do these things that are here before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It is a maruellous great difference, betweene this that our iniquities are laid vpon Christ, that they should be cleansed in him, & this that they are cleansed by our own works: betwene this that Christ is the procuring of mercy, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if wee speake of pacifying the conscience: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to neare that his sinnes are redemed by satisfactions? When shal he certainly know the measure of his satisfaction? Therfore he shal alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, hee shall alwaie be vexed, and alway quake for feare For they that rest vpon light petie satisfactions, doe too contemptuously esteeme the iudgement of God, and doe little consider how great is the grieuousnesse of sinne, as we shal declare in another place. But although we graunt them to redeeme some sinnes with iust satisfaction: yet what wil they doe when they are oppressed with so manie sinnes, for satisfaction whereof an hundred liues although they were wholly applied thereunto cannot suffice? Beside that, all the places wherein the forgiuenesse of sinnes is affirmed, doe not belong to yonglinges, but to the alreadie regenerate children of GOD, and them that haue beene long nourished in the bosome of the Church. That embassadge which Paul so honourably extolleth, I beseech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not directed to strangers, but to them that had beene alreadie regenerate. But he, bidding satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the blood of the crosse hath pacified all things in heauen or in earth, hee restraineth not this to the onelie moment wherein we are receiued into the Church, but extendeth it to our whole course Which easily appeareth by the processe of the text, where hee saith, ỳ the faithful haue a redemption by the blood of Christ, that is forgiuenes of sins Albeit it is superfluous to heape together moe places, that readily readily offer themselues to be founde.

28 Heere they flee to the sanctuary of the fooliſh diſtinction, that ſome sinnes are veniall, and ſome deadly: that for deadly ſinnes is great ſatisfaction due, that venial ſinnes are purged with more eaſy remedies, as with ſaying of the Lordes prayer, with ſprinckling of holy water, with abſolution at the maſſe. So they mock & trifle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth venial and deadlie ſinne, yet they could neuer diſcern the one from the other, ſauing that they make vngodlines and vncleannes of heart a veniall ſinne. But we (as the ſcripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) doe pronounce, that the reward of ſinne is death, and that the ſoul that ſinneth is worthy of death. But that the ſinnes of the faithfull are veniall, not for that they doe not deſerue death, but becauſe by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Ieſus, becauſe they are not imputed: becauſe they are taken away by pardon. I know howe vniuſtly they ſlander this our doctrine. For they ſay, ỹ it is the Stoiks ſtrãge concluſion, concerning the equalitie of ſinnes. But they ſhall eaſilie be conuinced by their owne mouth. For I demaund of them, whether among the very ſame ſins that they cõfeſſe to be deadly, they do not acknowledge one to be greater than another. It doth not therefore immediatly followe, that ſinnes are equall, becauſe they are altogether deadly. When the ſcripture definitiuely ſaith, that the reward of ſinne is death, that the obedience of the Lawe is the way of life, and that the tranſgreſſion of the law is death, they can not eſcape this ſentence. What ende of ſatisfying then will they find in ſo great a heap of ſinnes? If the ſatisfaction of one day be the ſatisfaction of one ſinne, while they are about that one ſatisfaction, they wrap thẽ ſelues in many ſinnes, ſith the iuſteſt man paſſeth no one day wherein hee falleth not many times. Nowe when they ſhall prepare themſelues to make ſatisfaction for the ſinnes, they ſhall heape vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of ſatisfying being cut of, what do they ſtay vpon? how dare they ſtill thinke of ſatisfying?

29 They goe about to winde out themſelues: but (as the prouerb is) the water ſtill cleaueth vpon them. They forge a diſtinction of fault and penalty. They confeſſe that the fault is forgiuen by the mercy of God, but that when the fault is forgiuen, the penaltie remaineth which the righteouſnes of God requireth to be paied: and that ſatisfactions doe properly belong to the releaſe of the penalty. Good God, what a skipping lightneſſe is this? now they confeſſe that the forgiuenes of the fault lieth freely open for men which ſometime they teach men to deſerue with praiers and weepinges, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet ſtill all that is taught vs in the ſcripture concerning the forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, doth directly fight againſt this diſtinction. Which although I thinke that I haue alreadie more than ſufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde ſome other teſtimonies wherewith theſe winding ſnakes may be holden ſo faſt, that they ſhall not be able once to folde in the toppe of their taile. This is the newe Teſtament which the Lorde hath couenaunted with vs in his Chriſt, ỹ he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by theſe wordes, we learne by another Prophet, where the Lord ſaith: If the righteous turne away from his righteouſneſſe, God doeth not remit our ſinnes and leaue the penalties ſtill without our owne ſatisfaction take them away to be endured.

Eze. 18. 24.

I will

Esa.38.17. I will not remember all his righteousnesses. If the wicked depart from his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Whereas he saith that he will not remember their righteousnes, this is as much to say, that he wil haue no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therfore not to remember sinnes, is asmuch as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in another place to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such maners of speech the holy ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing eares to learne. Truely, if God do punish sinnes, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to iudgement, he doth not hide them: if hee examine them: he doth not cast them behinde his backe: if hee looke vppon them, he hath not wiped them away like a clowde: if he sift thē, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordes. If God haue couered sinnes, then he woulde not looke vpon them: if he would not looke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he woulde not marke them, then he would not punish them: he would not know them, hee had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they shoulde not be seene? What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs here also out of another place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lorde forgiueth sinnes. If (saith he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shall bee made white as snowe: if they be red like crimson, they shalbe as wol. And in Ieremy wee reade thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shall be sought for, and shall not be founde: the sinne of Iudah, and it shall not be. Because I will be fauourable to the remnaunts that I shall preserue. Wilt thou briefly vnderstand what is the meaning of those wordes? Weigh on the other side what is meant by these speeches: that the Lord doth bind vp iniquities in a sack, doth gather them into a bundell and lay thē vp, and doth graue them with an yron pointell in an Adament stone. If they signify (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shall be giuen for recompence, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lord affirmeth, that he remitteth all recompensing of vengeance. Heere I must beseech the Readers not to harken to my glosses, but onely that they will suffer the worde of God to take some place.

Esa.1.18. Ier.50.20. Iob.14.17. Osee.13.12. Ier.17.1.

Christ in bearing our sinnes did suffer, & God in pardoning them doth remitte the payne which we had thereby deserued.

30 What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should stil be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did beare all our sins in his body vpon the tree, we mean nothing else thereby, but that he suffered al the pain and punishment that was due vnto our sinnes. And the same hath Esay more liuely declared where hee saith the chastisement (or correction) of our peace, was vppon him. What is the correction of our peace but the pain due to sinnes? & which we should haue suffered before that we could be reconciled to God, vnlesse ỹ he had entred into our stead? Lo, thou seest plainly, that Christ suffered the paines of sinnes, to deliuer them that be his from them. And so oft as Paul maketh mention of the redemption perfourmed by Christ, hee vseth to call it in Greeke Apolutrosin, whereby hee meaneth not redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the verie price price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gaue himselfe Antilutron, a price of raunsome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lorde (saith Augustine) but sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offred for vs in the death in Christ? But that which is appointed in the law of Moses for cleansing the offences of sinnes, ministreth vs a strong battell ramme. For the Lord doth not there appoint this or that maner of satisfying, but requireth the whole recompence in sacrifices, Whereas yet in other things, he doeth most diligently and in most exact order set out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe commeth it to passe, that he commaundeth to recompence faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth only sacrifices for satisfaction, but because his will is so to declare, that there is onely one kinde of satisfaction, whereby his iudgement is appeased? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weighed by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their trueth, that is to say, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what manner of recompence the Lorde receiueth of vs, Osee hath verie well expressed in few wordes. Thou shalt (saith hee) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, heere is forgiuenesse of sinnes. And we shall pay thee calues of our lippes: Loe, here is satisfaction. I knowe that they yet doe suttly slippe away, when they make distinction betweene euerlasting paine, and temporall paines. But when they teach that temporall paine is any kind of punishment that God taketh as well of the body as of the soule, except onely euerlasting death, this restraining of it doth little helpe them. For the places that we haue aboue recited, doe expreslie meane this, that God receiueth vs into fauour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the paine whatsoeuer wee had thereby deserued. And so oft as Dauid or the other Prophetes doe craue pardon of sinnes, they do also therewithall pray to be released of the paine. Yea, the verie feeling of Gods iudgement doth driue them thereunto. Againe, when they promise mercy at the Lords hand, they do in manner alwaie of purpose preach of the paines and the forgiuenesse thereof. Truely, when the Lord in Ezechiel pronounceth that he will make an end of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne sake, not for the Iewes sake, he doth sufficientlie shewe that both are of free gift. Finally, if wee be deliuered by Christ from guiltines of fault, the paines that come thereof, must needes cease.

31 But forasmuch as they do also arme themselues with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of arguments those be that they alleage. Dauid (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie & manslaughter, receiued pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterward punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. Wee are taught to redeem with satisfactions such paines as were to be extended after forgiuenesse of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeeme his sinnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlinesse, inquities are forgiuen. And in an other place, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is couered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth. Againe, in Luke the Lorde saith of the woman that was a sinner, that many sinnes are forgiuen her, because shee hath loued much. Howe peruerslie and wrong-

wronfully they euer wey the doings of God, But if they had marked (as they ſhould not haue ouerpaſſed it) that there are two kindes of Gods iudgement, they would haue ſeene in this rebuking of Dauid, a farre other maner of puniſhment, than ſuch as might be thought to tend to reuengement. But becauſe, it not a little behoueth vs al to vnderſtand wherunto the chaſtiſements haue reſpect, wherewith God correcteth vs for our ſinnes, and how much they differ from thoſe examples wherwith he purſueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therfore I thinke it ſhall be not beſide the purpoſe to comprehend it ſhortly in a ſumme. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs cal the one kinde of iudgement, the iudgement of reuenge, the other of Chaſtiſement. It is to be vnderſtanded, that God ſo puniſheth his enimies with the iudgement of reuenge, that he vſeth his wrath againſt them, confoundeth them, deſtroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his puniſhing is ioyned with his indignation: with the iudgement of chaſtiſement he dealeth not ſo cruelly, as to bee angrie: nor puniſheth to deſtroy, nor ſendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly puniſhment or vengeance, but correction and admoniſhment. The one is the dooing of a Iudge, the other of a Father. For the iudge when hee puniſheth an euil doer, he hath regard to the offence, and puniſheth the verie fault: when the father ſomewhat rigorouſly correcteth his childe, hee doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to puniſh him, but rather to teache him, & make him warier in time to come. Chryſoſtome in a certaine place vſeth a ſimilitude ſomewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the ſame point. The ſonne (ſaith he) is beaten, and the ſeruant alſo is beaten: but the one is puniſhed as a bondſeruant, becauſe he hath offended, and the other is chaſticed as a free man and as a ſonne, needing correction. To the one his correction ſerueth for proofe and amendment, to the other for a ſcourge and puniſhment.

God puniſheth his enemies in wrath, his children in loue.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter ſhortly & in a ready ſumme, let this bee the firſt of two diſtinctions. Whereſoeuer puniſhment is to reuenge, there ſheweth it ſelfe the curſe and wrath of God, which hee alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrariwiſe, Chaſtiſement both is a bleſſing of God, and beareth a teſtimony of his loue, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commouly euery where ſufficiently expreſſed in ỹ word of God. For whatſoeuer afflictions the wicked ſuffer in this preſent life, therein is painted out vnto vs as it were a certaine entrie of hel, frō whence they do already ſee a farre off their eternall damnation: and they are ſo far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by ſuch beginnings they are prepared to the moſt cruel hel that at length abideth for them. But the Lord chaſticing chaſticeth his ſeruants, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confeſſe that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vnto true inſtruction. But as we read euerie where that the holy ones ſuffer ſuch puniſhments with quiet mind, ſo they haue alway praied to eſcape the firſt kind of ſcourges. Chaſtice me Lorde (ſaith Ieremy) but in thy iudgement, not in thy wrath, leaſt thou deſtroy mee. Poure out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowne thee, and vpon the kingdomes that haue not called vpon thy name. And Dauid saith: Lorde rebuke mee not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. Pſal.6.2.&.38.2

And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that oftentimes it is saide, that the Lorde is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth thier sinnes. As in Esay: I wil confesse to thee O Lord, because thou haste bene angry with me: thy wrath is turned, & thou hast comforted me. Againe Abacuc, Thou that hast bene angry shall remember mercy. And Michee: I will beare the wrath of the Lord, because I haue sinned against him. Where hee putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull haue asswagement of their sorrowe, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that he doeth defile his own inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he wil neuer defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God ỹ punisheth, but of the vehement feeling of sorrowe which they feele that suffer any of his seuerity whatsoeuer it be. But hee not onelye pricketh his faithfull with no small rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselues not far from the damnation of hell. So he testifieth that they haue deserued his wrath, and so it behooueth that they shoulde loath themselues in their euils, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make haste to craue pardon. But euen in the verie same doing he sheweth a more euident testimonye of his fauourable kindenesse than of his wrath. For the couenaunt continueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the trueth wherof he that cannot decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall neuer be made voide. If (saith he) his children forsake my law, & walke not in my iudgementes: if they defile my statutes, and keepe not my commaundements. I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercy from him. Of which mercy to make vs assured, hee saith, that the rodde wherewith hee will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shall bee of men, and stripes of the children of men: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they cannot but be confounded with extreame and deadly horror, that feele the hãd of God to be against them. How great regard hee hath of this lenity in chastising his Israel, he sheweth in the Prophet: I haue purged thee (saith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou shouldest haue beene all consumed. Albeit he teacheth that chasticements serue him for to cleanse him, but he further saith, that hee vseth the same so temperatly, that he bee not too much consumed by them. And that is needefull. Pſal.89.32. 2.Sam.7.14. Esa.48.10.

For the more that euery man reuerently feareth GOD, and giueth himselfe to followe godlinesse, so much the tenderer hee is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they groane vnder his scourges, yet for that they weigh not the cause, but rather turne their back both to their owne sinnes and to the iudgement of GOD, by that slouthfulnesse they gather a hardnesse: or because they murmure and kicke against him, and doe make an vprore against their iudge, that furious sudden rage astonieth them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by & by descend to consider their sinnes, and being striken with dread and horrour, they flee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, vnlesse the Lorde did asswage these sorrowes wherewith the poore soules torment themselues, they woulde faint a hundred times euen in small tokens of his wrath.

God punisheth the wicked to be reuenged on them for hauing sinned, but his children to make them careful not to sinne.

33 Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are striken with the scourges of God, they doe already after a certaine maner begin to suffer paines by his iudgement, and though they shall not escape vnpunished, for that they haue not taken heed to such tokens of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this end, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they shoulde prooue God to be a iudge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rods, not that they should thereby bee punished of God for their sinnes, but that they shoulde thereby profite to amendment. Therefore we take it that they rather haue respect to the time to come, then to ỹ time past. This I had rather expresse in Chrysostomes wordes than mine owne. For this (saith hee) God doth lay paine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so saith Augustine: That which thou suffereſt, that for which thou lamenteſt, is a medicine to thee and no paine, a chastisement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritaunce, &c. Knowe ye brethren that all this miserie of mankind when the world groneth is a medicinall sorrowe, and not a penall sentence, &c. These sentences I haue therfore thought good to alleage, that the maner of speach that I haue aboue written, shoulde not seeme to any man new & vnused. And hereunto serue all the complaints full of indignation wherein the Lorde oftentimes doth expostulate of the vnkindnesse of the people, for that they stiffely despised all punishments. In Esay hee saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to ỹ crown of the head, there is no whole place. But because the Prophetes are full of such sayings, it shall be sufficient to haue breefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it should be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdome, hee punished him to reuengement: When he tooke from Dauid his yong sonne, hee corrected him to amendment According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paul saith, wee are iudged of the Lorde, wee are corrected that wee should not be damned with this world That is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hand of our heauenly father, this is no pain wherewith wee should be confounded, but only a chastisement wherwith we shoulde be instructed. In which point Augustine is plainely on our side. For he teacheth that the pains wherewith men are a like chasticed by God, are diuersly to be considered: because to the holy ones they are battels and exercises after the forgiuenesse of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgiuenesse paines of wickednesse. In which place hee rehearseth how paines were laide vppon Dauid and other godly men, and saith, that the same tended to this end, that their godlinesse should by such humbling of them, bee exercised and prooued. And where Esay saith, that the Iewish people had their iniquitie forgiuen them, because they had receiued full chastisement at the Lords hand: this prooueth not that the pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the ful paiment of the paine: but it is in effect asmuch asmuch as if he had saide: Because ye haue alreadie suffered paines enough, and by the greeuousnesse and multitude thereof haue bene nowe pined away with long mourning and sorrow, therefore it is nowe time that receiuing the tidings of ful mercy, your hearts should reioyce and feele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the person of a father, which repenteth him euen of his iust seueritie, when he was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughts it is necessarie that the faithfull be furnished in bitternesse of afflictions. It is time that the iudgement began at the house of the Lord, in which his name is called vpon. What shoulde the children of God do, if they did beleeue the seueritie of God that they feele to be his vengeance? For he that being striken by the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing iudge, cannot conceiue him but angrie and enimie vnto him, and detest the verie scourge of GOD as a curse & damnation. Finally, he can neuer be perswaded that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is stil minded to punish him. But he only profiteth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to bee angrie with his sinnes, but mercifull and louing to himselfe. For otherwise that must needes happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where he saith. Thy wrathes, O God haue passed ouer me: thy terrors haue oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, because we haue fainted in thy wrath: & we haue beene troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secretes in the light of thy countenance: because al our dayes are gone away in thy wrath: our yeeres are consumed as the worde that is passed out of a mouth. On the other side Dauid saith thus of his fatherly chastisementes, to teach that the faithful are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lord, & hast instructrd in thy law, to giue him quiet from euill dayes, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truly it is a hard tentation, when God sparing the vnbeleeuers and winking at their faultes, seemeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therfore he gaue them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the law, whereby they shoulde learne, that it is done to prouide for their saluation when they are called again into the way, and the wicked are caried headlong into their errors, whose end is the pit. And it is no difference whether the paine be euerlasting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, & sickenes, as the iudgement of eternall death are the curses of God: whē they are laid vpon men to this end, to be instruments of the Lordes wrath and vengeaunce against the reprobate.

Dauid the giltineſſe of his ſinne: but becauſe it pertained both to the publike examples of all ages, and alſo to the humbling of Dauid, that ſuch a hainous offence ſhould not remaine vnpuniſhed: therfore he moſt ſharply chaſtiſed him with his rod. Which mark alſo we ought to haue before our eyes in the vniuerſall courſe of mankind. For whereas after pardon obteined, we do all yet ſuffer the miſeries that were laide vppon our firſt parent for paine of ſinne: we perceiue our ſelues by ſuch exerciſes to be admoniſhed, how grieuouſly God is diſpleaſed with the tranſgreſſion of his lawe: that beeing throwne downe & humbled with knowledge in conſcience of our owne miſerable eſtate, we may the more feruently aſpire to true bleſſednesse. But he ſhall be moſt fooliſh that ſhall thinke, that the calamities of this preſent life are layde vpon vs for the giltines of ſinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chryſoſtome when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines vpon vs, that he ſhould call vs, perſeuering in euils to repentaunce, then when repentance is once ſhewed, the paine ſhall be ſuperfluous. Therefore as he knoweth it to be expedient for euery mans nature, ſo he hādleth one man more roughly, and another with more louing tendernes. Therefore where he mindeth to teach that he is not vnmeaſurable in taking puniſhmentes, he reprocheth to the hard hearted and obſtinate people that being ſtriken yet they make not an end of ſinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was as a cake ſcorched on the one ſide, & raw on the other, becauſe the corrections did not pearce into their mindes, that the people hauing their vices boiled out, might be made meete to receiue pardon. Truely hee that ſo ſpeaketh, ſheweth, that ſo ſoone as a man hath repented, he will by and by become appeaſable: and that by our ſtifnes he is enforced to that rigour in chaſtiſing of faults, which ſhould haue bene preuented with willing amendment. Yet foraſmuch as we all are of ſuch hardneſſe and rudeneſſe, as vniuerſally needeth chaſtiſement: it ſeemed good to him beeing a moſte wiſe Father, to exerciſe all without exception with a common ſcourge all their life long. But it is meruellous why they ſo caſt their eyes vpon the onely example of Dauid, and are not mooued with ſo many examples, in which they might haue beholden free forgiuenes of ſinnes. It is read that the Publicane went out of the Temple iuſtified. There followed no paine. Peter obtained pardon of his offence, his teares wee reade (ſaith Ambroſe) his ſatisfaction we reade not. And the man ſicke of the Palſie heard it ſpoken to him: Riſe: thy ſinnes are forgiuen thee. There was no paine layd vpon him. All the abſolutions that are rehearſed in the Scripture, are ſet out as giuen freely. Out of this great number of examples, a rule ſhould rather haue beene gathered than of that only example that containeth in it a certaine ſpeciall matter.

36 Daniel in his exhortation wherein he counſelleth Nabuchadnezer to redeem his ſinnes with righteouſnes, and his iniquities with pitying of the poore: his meaning was not to ſay, that righteouſneſſe and mercy are ſatisfactorie appeaſementes of God, and redemption of paines (for God forbid that there were euer any redemption ſauing onely the bloud of Chriſt) but to referre this woord Redeeming rather to men than to GOD, as if hee had ſayde: O king, thou haſt vſed an vnrighteous and violent gouernment, thou hast oppressed the humble, thou hast spoiled the poore, thou hast hardlie and vniustlie handled thy people: for thy vniust exactions, for thy violence and oppression, now render to them mercie and righteousnes. Likewise Salomon saith, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is couered: not before God, but among men themselues. For thus is the whole verse: Hatred raiseth vp contentions, but charitie couereth all iniquitie. In which verse, as his manner is, he doth by waie of comparison of contraries, compare the euils that growe of hatreds, with the fruites of charitie: in this meaning, they that hate together, doe one bite, barke at, reproch & raile at an other, and turne all thinges to the worst, but they that loue together, doe dissemble many things among themselues, do wink at many things, & pardō many things one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faults, but beareth with them, & helpeth thē with admonishing, rather thā galleth them with reproching them. And it is not to be doubted ỳ Peter alleageth this place in the same sense, vnlesse we wil accuse him of deprauing & wrōgfully wresting the scripture. But wheras he teacheth ỳ sin is purged with mercifulnes & liberalitie, he doth not meane ỳ recompēce is therwith made for sin before the face of the Lorde, so that God being appeased by such satisfactiō doth release the paine that otherwise he would haue laide vpon them, but after the accustomed manner of the Scripture hee declareth that they shall finde him mercifull vnto them that leauing their former vices and iniquities, doe turne to him by godlines & trueth: as if hee shoulde saie, that the wrath of God doth cease & his iudgement rest, when we cease from our euil doinges. Neither doth hee there describe the cause of pardon, but rather the manner of true conuersion. As many times the Prophetes doe declare that Hypocrites doe in vaine pester God with forged ceremonious vsages in steede of repentaunce, wheras it is vprightnes of life with the duties of charitie that delighteth him. As also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues commending liberalitie & gentlenes, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And whē Christ, taūting the Pharisies that giuing heede onely to cleansing of dishes, they neglected the cleannesse of the heart, commaunded them to giue almes that al might be cleane: he did not thereby exhort them to make satisfaction: but only teacheth what manner of cleannesse pleaseth God. 37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sound iudgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, wil make vs any cōtrouersie therevpon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not know the womā, which he had so easily receiued into his presence. For he thought that Christ woulde not haue receiued her, if he had known her such a sinner as she was. And thereby he gathered, that Christ was not a Prophet that might in such sort be deceiued. The Lorde, to shew that she was no sinner to whom her sinnes was alreadie forgiuen, did put out this parable. There were two detters to one creditour vpō vsurie: the one ought fifty, ỳ other ought fiue hundred, both had their dets forgiuē thē. Whether oweth more thanke? ỳ Pharisee aunswered: he to whō most is forgiuē. The Lord replied: learne hereby ỳ this womans sinnes are forgiuen her, because she shee hath loued much. In which wordes (as you see) hee maketh not her loue the cause, but the proofe of the forgiuenes of her sinnes. For they are deriued vpon a similitude of that detrour, to whom fiue hundred was forgiuen, to whom he did not say that therefore it was forgiuen, because he had loued much: but therefore loued much, because it was forgiuen. And herunto must that similitude be applied in this sort: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner: but thou oughtest to know that she is none such, forasmuch as her sinnes be forgiuen her. And that her sins be forgiuen her, her loue ought to proue vnto thee, whereby she rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, wherby any thing is proued by signes ensuing. By what meane shee obtained forgiuenesse of sinnes, the Lorde openly testifieth: Thy faith, saith hee, hath saued thee. Therefore we obteine forgiuenesse by faith: By charitie we giue thankes, and testifie the bountifulnes of the Lord.

The Fathers though speaking somewhat hardly concerning satisfactions do notwithstanding meane far otherwise than these newe satisfactioners.

38 As for those things that are commonly found in the bookes of old writers concerning satisfaction, they litle moue me. I see indeed that many of them, (I will speake plainely) in a manner al whose bookes remaine, haue either erred in this point, or spoken too crabbedly and hardly: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and vnskilfull as to haue written those thinges in that sense that the newe Satisfactionars doe reade them. Chrysostome in one place writeth thus: where mercie is required, examination ceaseth: where mercy is asked, iudgement is not rigorous: where mercie is craued, there is no place for pain: where is mercie, there is no inquisition. Where is mercie, the aunswere is pardoned. Which wordes howsoeuer they be wrested, yet they cannot be made to agre with the scholemens doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiastical doctrines, which is fathered vpon Augustine, is read thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut off the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was saide to be giuen in recompence of sinnes committed, was euen in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedfulnesse in abstaining from sinnes in time to come. I will not alleadge that which the same Chrisostome saith, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we should confesse our sinnes vnto him with teares sith suche sentences are manie times found in his writinges and others. Augustine indeede in some places calleth the workes of mercie, remedies to obteine forgiuenesse of sinne: but because no man shoulde stumble at that litle worde, hee himselfe preuenteth it in another place. The flesh of Christ (saith hee) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not only these sinnes that are wholly put awaie in baptisme, but also these that afterwarde creepe in by weakenesse: for which the whole Church crieth out at this day, Forgiue vs our trespasses. And they are forgiuen by that singular sacrifice.

39 They haue for the most part called satisfaction, not a recompence to be rendred to God, but an open declaration wherby they that had bene excommunicate when they woulde be receiued againe to the communió, did ascertaine the Church of their repentaunce. For there were ioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastings & other things, whereby they might perſwade men that they were truely & heartily wearie of their former life, or rather blot out the remembrance of their former doinges: and ſo they were ſaide to make ſatisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is alſo expreſſed of Auguſtine in theſe words in his Enchiridion to Laurence: Out of that auncient cuſtome the confeſſions & ſatisfactions ỹ are at this daie vſed, tooke their beginning. Truely very vipe-rous birthes, by which is brought to paſſe, ỹ there remaineth not ſo much as a ſhadow of that better forme, I know that the old writers do ſometime ſpeake ſomewhat hardly, and as I ſaid euen now, I do not deny that peraduenture they erred herein. But thoſe things that were beſprinkled with a few ſpots, when they are once handled with theſe mens vnwaſhed hands, are altogether defiled. And if we muſt contend with the authority of olde writers: good God, what old writers do they thruſt vnto vs? A good part of thoſe wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnſauory dotages of certain mõks that are carried about vnder the name of Ambroſe, Hierome, Auguſtine and Chryſoſtome. As about this preſent queſtion hee taketh in a manner all out of Auguſtines booke of repentaunce, which is fooliſhly botched of good & bad by ſome ſcraper together. It beareth in deede the name of Auguſtine, but ſuch a booke as no man being but meanely learned, would vouchſafe to acknowledge for his. But whereas I doe not ſo narrowly examine their follies, let the readers pardon me whom I would eaſe of that tediouſneſſe. For to me it ſhoulde not be verie labourſome, and yet verie plauſible to bewray to their great ſhame thoſe things that they haue heretofore hoaſted vpon as myſteries, but becauſe my purpoſe is to teache fruitefully, therefore I paſſe them ouer.

Cap. 65. & is rehearſed in the Decrets, Cap. in actionibus de pœnit. diſtin. 1.

The v. Chapter.

Of the ſupplyings vvhich they adde to ſatisfactions, as pardons and purgatorie.

OVt of this doctrine of ſatis factions do flowe indulgences or pardons. For they ſay that that which our power wanteth to make ſatisfactiõ, is ſupplied by theſe pardons. And they run ſo farre foorth into madneſſe, that they define them to be the diſtribution of the merites of Chriſt and of the Martyres, which the Pope dealeth abroade by his bulles. But although they haue more need of Helleborus to purge their frentike braine, than argumentes to anſweare them, ſo that it is not much woorthie the trauayle to ſtande vppon confuting ſuch trifling errours, which are already ſhaken with many battlerammes, and of themſelues grow into decaied age, and bend toward falling: yet becauſe a ſhort confutation of thẽ ſhalbe profitable for ſome that be ignorant, I wil not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons haue ſo long ſtand ſafe, and haue ſo long beene vnpuniſhed, hauing bene vſed with ſo outragious and furious licentiouſneſſe: this may ſerue to teach vs in how darke a night of errors, men in certayn ages paſt haue bene drowned. They ſaw themſelues to be openly and vncolouredly ſcorned of the Pope and his Bulbearers, gainful markets to be made of the ſaluation of their ſoules, the price of ſaluation to be valued at a few pence, & nothing ſet out to be freely giuē: that by this colour they be wyped of offeringes to be filthily ſpent vpon brothels, bawdi & banketings, that the greateſt blowers abroad of pardons are the greateſt diſpiſers of them, that this monſter doth dailie more and more with greater licentiouſneſſe ouerrunne the world, and grow into outrage, and that there is no ende, new leade dailie brought, & new mony gotten. Yet with hie reuerence they receyued, they worſhipped and bought pardons, and ſuch as among the reſt ſawe ſomewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceits, wherby men might be beguiled with ſome profit, At the length, ſince the world ſuffered it ſelfe to be ſomewhat wiſer, pardons waxe colde, & by litle and litle become froſen, till they vtterly vaniſh away.

The ground of pardons is the merit of Saints then which vnto the merite of Chriſt nothing can be more oppoſite.

2 But foraſmuch as manie that ſee the filthy gaminges, the deceites, theftes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners haue heretofore mocked & beguiled vs, yet ſee not the verie fountaine of vngodlines from whence they ſpring: it is good to ſhew not onely of what ſort pardons be, but alſo what they be, when they are wiped from all ſpots. They cal the treaſure of the church, the merites of Chriſt and of the holye Apoſtles and Martyres. The principall cuſtody of this barne (as I haue alredy touched) they faine to be deliuered to the Biſhop of Rome, that he ſhould haue the diſtribution of ſo great giftes, that he might both giue them by himſelfe, and alſo graunt iuriſdiction to other to giue them. Hereupon proceede from the Pope ſometime plenary pardons, ſometime pardons for certaine yeeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred daies: frō Biſhops, pardons for fourty daies. But they be (as I may naturally deſcribe thē) the profaning of the bloud of Chriſt, Satans mockery, to leade away the chriſtiā people frō the grace of God, from the life that is in Chriſt, & to turne them from the true way of ſaluatiō. For how could the bloud of Chriſt be more filthilye prophaned, than when it is denied to ſuffice to the remiſſion of ſinnes, to reconciliation & ſatisfaction, vnleſſe the want therof as being withered & waſted, ſhould be otherwiſe ſupplied & perfited? The law and all the Prophets (ſaith Peter) beare witneſſe of Chriſt, that by him forgiueneſſe of ſin is to be receiued: Pardons giue remiſſion of ſinnes by Peter, Paul & the Martyrs. The bloud of Chriſt (ſaith Iohn) cleanſeth vs from ſinne: Pardons do make the bloud of Martirs the waſhing away of ſins. Chriſt (ſaith Paul) which knew not ſin, was made ſin for vs, that is, the ſatisfaction of ſin, that we might be made the righteouſneſſe of God in him: Pardons do ſette the ſatisfaction of ſins in the bloud of Martyrs. Paul cryed out and teſtified to the Corinthians, that onely Chriſt was crucified & died for them: the pardons pronounce, that Paul & other died for vs. In an other place he ſaith that Chriſt purchaſed the church with his bloud: the pardons appoint an other price of purchaſe in the bloud of Martyres. The Apoſtle ſaith, that Chriſt with one oblation made perfect for euer them that were ſanctified: the pardons cry out to the contrarie and ſay, that ſanctification is made perfect by the Martyres, which otherwiſe were not ſufficient. Iohn ſaith that all the ſaintes waſhed their gownes in the bloud of the lambe: the pardons teach men to waſh their gownes in bloud of ſaintes.

Leo Bishoppe of Rome, writeth notablie wel to the Palestines against these sacrileges. Although (saith he) the death of manie saintes hath beene precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the killing of no innocent hath beene the propitiatiō of the world. The righteous receiued, but gaue not crownes: and out of the valiantnesse of the faithful are grauen examples of patience, not giftes of righteousnesse. For their dearhes were euery one singular to themselues, and none of them did by his ende pay the debt of an other, forasmuch as there is one Lord Christ, in whom all are crucified, all are dead, buried, and raised vp againe. Which sentence (as it was worthie to bee remembred) he repeated in an other place. There can nothing be required more plaine to destroye this wicked doctrine. Yet Augustine speaketh no lesse fitly to the same effect. Though (saith he) we die brethren for brethren, yet the bloud of no Martyrs is shed for the forgiueuesse of sinnes. Which thing Christ hath done for vs, neither hath he therein done that for vs, that wee shoulde followe him, but hath giuen vs a thing to reioyce vpon. Againe in an other place, As only the sonne of God was made the sonne of man, to make vs with him the sonnes of God: so he alone for vs hath taken vpō him punishmēt without euil deseruings, ỳ we by him might without good deseruings obteine grace not due vnto vs. Truely wheras al their doctrine is patched together of horrible sacrileges & blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemie than all the other. Let them remember themselues, whether these be not their decrees: ỳ martyrs haue by their death done more to God, & deserued more, than was needful for thēselues: & that they had remaining so great a plentie of deseruings, as did also ouerflow vnto other: & that therfore, least so great goodnes should be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, & of both these bloods is made the treasure of the Church, for the remission & satisfaction of sinnes. And that so is the saying of Paul to bee taken: I supplie in my bodie those thinges that want of the sufferinges of Christ for his bodie, which is the Church. What is this else but to leaue Christ onelie his name, otherwise to make him but a common perie saint, that may scarcely among the multitude bee knowen from the rest? He onely, only should haue bin preached, he only set forth, he only named, he only bene looked vnto, whē the obteining of forgiueneſſe of sin, satisfaction, and sanctificatiō are entreated of. But let vs heare their curtalled arguments. Least the blood of the Martyrs should bee shed in vaine, therefore let it be emploied to the common benefite of the Church. Is it so? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his truth with their blood? by despising this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by their stedfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the Church, & ouercome the stubbornnesse of the enemies? But this is the matter indeed: they acknowledge no profite of the Martyrs death, if Christ onely bee the propitiator, if he onlie died for our sins, if he only was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might neuertheless haue obteined the crowne of victorie, if they had died in their beddes. And whereas they haue fought euen to the shedding of their blood, it woulde not agree with the iustice of God to leaue the same barren and fruitlesse. As though God could not tel how to encrease in his seruants their glorie, according to Christ vouchsafeth to doe vs so great honour, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. In Psal. 16. Christ. If they yet require an other expositor, let them heare Augustine. The sufferinges of Christ (saith hee) are in Christ onely as in the heade: & both in Christ and the Church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paul being one member saith, I supplie in my bodie that which wanteth in the sufferinges of Christ. Therefore if thou whatsoeuer thou bee that hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoeuer thou suffereſt of them that are not the members of Christ, that same wãted in the sufferings of Christ. But whervnto the sufferings of the Apostles taken for the Church of Christ doe tende, he expoundeth in an other place where hee saith: Christ is to

Then he addeth, As he hath giuen his soule, so ought we to giue our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, and confirme faith. These are Augustines wordes. But God forbid, that Paul should haue thought that

But why doe I tarrie herevpon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doubtfull, seith the verie bewraying of such monstrous errours is a sufficient confutation of them?

Whence the gracious indulgẽce of Christ vvhich

5 Nowe (to passe ouer suche abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose enclose in lead and parchement the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lorde willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospel? Truely either the gospel of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offred vs in the gospel, with al abundance of heauenly benefits, with all his merites, with al his righteousnes, wisdom & grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deliuered to the ministers, whereby they might vse this forme of message, as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: wee beseeth you, be yee so reconciled to God. He hath made him that knew no sinne, to be made sinne for vs, y we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. And the faithfull knowe of what value is that common partaking of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offred vs to be enioyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardons do bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pitance of grace, and fasten it to lead parchement, yea & to a certaine place, and seuer it from the word of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it semeth to haue proceeded hereof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfactions than all could beare, they which felt themselues aboue measure oppressed with penance enioyned them, required of the church a release. The mitigatiō that was granted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned satisfactions from the church to God, & said that they were recompenses whereby men may redeeme themselues from the iudgement of God, then they therwithal did also draw these indulgēces or pardons to be propitiatorie remedies, to deliuer vs from deserued punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged them so shamelesly, that they can haue no colour at al.

1.Cor.1.17.

6 Now let them no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe alreadie broken, hewed down, & ouerthrowen from the verie foundatiōs. For I do not agree to some mē, that think best to dissēble in this point, & make no mention at al of Purgatorie, wherupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truely I my self would also think such trifles worthie to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not account them earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatorie is builded of many blasphemies, & is daily vpholden with new blasphemies, & raiseth vp many & grieuous offences, truely it is not to be winked at. This peraduēture might after a sort haue bin dissembled for a time, that it was inuented by curious and bold rashnesse without the word of God: that men beleeued of it by I wot not what reuelations, fained by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giueth not leaue to mans presumptuousnes so to breake into the secret places of his iudgements, & hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for trueth at dead men, neglecting his worde, and permitteth not his word to be so vnreuerently defiled. But let vs graunt, that all those thinges might for a while haue bene borne with, as things of no great importance. But when the cleansing of sinnes is sought elsewhere than in the bloud of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thing, then it is moste perillous not to speake of it. Therefore wee must crie out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throate and sides: that Pur-

gatorie is the damnable deuise of Sathan, that it maketh voide the Crosse of Christ, that it laieth an intollerable slander vpon the mercie of God, that it feebleth and ouerthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatorie among them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that ouerthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatorie is immediatly ouerthrowen by the verie rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the blood of Christ is the only satisfacton, propitiatorie sacrifice, and cleansing for the sinnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that purgatorie is a meere & horrible blasphemie against Christ? I passe ouer the robberies of God wherwith it is daily defended, the offences that it breedeth in religion, and other things innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the same spring of vngodlinesse.

That sinne against the holie Ghost shal neither in this world, nor in the world to come be forgiuen, is a slander proofe for purgatorie.
Matth. 12. 32.
Mar. 3. 28.
Luc. 12. 10.

7 But it is good to wring out of their handes such places as they haue falsly & wrongfully taken out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lorde affirmeth that the sinne against the holy Ghost shoulde not bee forgiuen in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he sheweth that there is a forgiuenesse of some sinnes in the worlde to come. But who seeth not that the Lorde there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Nowe if it be so, what is that to their purgatorie forasmuch as by their opinion the paine is there suffred of those sinnes, wherof they deny not the fault to bee forgiuen in this present life? But that they may no more carp against vs, they shal haue yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut off all hope of pardon frō so hainous wickednesse, he thought it not ynough to say that it should neuer bee forgiuen, but the more to amplifie it, he vsed a diuision, wherin he cōprehended both the iudgemēt that euery mans cōscience feeleth in this life, & the last iudgement that shalbe openly pronounced at the resurrectiō: as though he should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellion, as of most present damnation. For he that of set purpose shal endeuour to quēch the light of ỹ holie Ghost, shal not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to sinners for their conuersion, nor in the last day whē the lambs shalbe seuered by the Angels of God from the goates, & the kingdome of heauen shalbe cleansed from all offences. Then they bring forth ỹ parable out of Matthew

Matt. 5. 25.

Agree with thine aduersarie, least he deliuer thee to the Iudge, & the Iudge to the Sargeant, & the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, vntil thou hast payed the vttermost farthing. If in this place the iudge do signifie God, & the aduersarie plaintife the diuel, the Sargeant the Angel, & the prison purgatorie, I wil gladly yeld vnto them. But if it bee euident to all men, that Christ meant there to shew into how many dangers & mischieues they cast themselues, that had rather obstinately pursue the extremitie of the law, than deale according to equity & good right, to the end to exhort his disciples the more earnestly to agreement with equity: where then I pray you shal Purgatorie be found?

Other proofs alleaged out of S. Paul the booke of Reuelation and the booke of Macabees.
Phil. 2. 10.

8 They fetch an argument out of the saying of Paul, where he affirmeth, that the knees of things in heauen, earth, & hels, shal bowe to Christ, For they take it as confessed, that hels cannot there be meant of those that are adiudged to eternall damnation. Therfore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatorie. They did not reason verie euill, if the Apostle did by kneeling meane the true godly worshipping. But sith he teacheth onely, that there is a dominion giuen to Christ, whereby al creatures are to be subdued, what proofe is there to the contrarie, but that we may by hel vnderstande the Deuils, that shalbe brought before the iudgemẽt of God, to acknowledge him their iudge with feare & trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expoundeth the same prophecie in another place. All (saieth he) shalbe brought before the iudgemẽt seat of Christ. For it is written: So truly as I liue, euery knee shall bow to me, &c. Rom. 13 10.

Apostle

But we may not so expound that which is in the Reuelation: I haue heard al creatures, both these things that are in heauen, & those that are vpon the earth, & these that are vnder the earth, & those that are in the sea, & al those that are in them, I haue heard them al say to him that sitteth on the throne & to the Lambe, Blessing & honor, and glorie, & power, for euer & euer. Reuc. 5. 13. That I do in deede easily grant, but what creatures do they think to be here rehearsed? For it is most certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reason and without sense. Whereby is affirmed nothing else, but that al the partes of the world, from the highest top of the heauens, to the verie middle point of the earth, do in their maner declare the glory of their creator. As for that which they alleage out of the history of the Machabees, I wil not vouchsafe to answere it, least I should seeme to recke that worke in the number of the holy bookes. 2. Mac. 12. 43. But Augustine receiued it for Canonical. But first, of what sure credit did he receiue it? The Iewes (saith he) esteeme not the writing of the Machabees as they do the law, the Prophets & the Psalmes, of which the Lord himselfe hath witnessed as of his witnesses, saying: I was necessarie, that all thinges should be fulfilled that are written in the lawe, and the Psalmes, and Prophets concerning me. Luke 23. But it hath bin receiued of the Church not vnprofitably, if it be soberly read or heard. Cõtra gaudent. epist. 2. cap. 23. And Hierome teacheth without any douting that the authoritie thereof is of no force to proue any doctrines. And it euidently appeareth by that old booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerning the exposition of the Creede, that it had no place at all in the old Church. But why doe I here striue without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, when in the end he craueth pardon, if he haue spoke any thing not wel. 2. Mach. 15. 36. Truly he that confesseth his writings to neede pardon, saieth plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy ghost. Beside that, the godlines of Iudas is praised for none other cause, but for that he had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doeth the writer of that historie refuse that which Iudas did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithful, that had dyed for their countrey & religion. This doing was in deede not without superstition & preposterous zeale, but they are more than fooles, that draw a sacrifice of the lawe so farre as vnto vs: forasmuch as we know that things do cease by the comming of Christ, that then were in vse.

The first vvherof S. Paul maketh mention to the Corinthians is no purgatorie fire.

9 But they haue an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which can not so easily be battered. If any man (saith he) build vpon this foundation, gold, siluer, precious stones, timber, heye, stubble, the Lord shal shewe euery mans worke 1. Cor. 3.

what it is: because it shalbe reuealed in fire, & the fire shal trie euery mans worke what it is. If any mans worke do burne, it shal suffer losse; but he shalbe safe, but as through the fire. What fire (say they) can that be, but the fire of Purgatorie: by which the filthinesse of sinne are clensed away, that we may enter pure into the kingdome of God? But the most part of the old writers thought it to be another fire, that is to say, Trouble or the crosse, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filthines of the flesh: & that is much more probable, than in fayning purgatorie. Albeit I do neither agree with these men, because I thinke I haue attained a certain and much plainer vnderstãding of that place. But before that I vtter it, I would haue them answere me, whether the Apostles and all the saincties must haue gone through this fire of Purgatorie? I know they will say, nay. For it were too much inconuenient that they must haue needed to be purged, whose merites they dreame to ouerflow aboue measure to al the members of the church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say ỳ the worke of some shalbe proued, but the worke of al. Neither is this my argument, but Augustines, which so confuteth that exposition. And (which is more absurditie) he doth not say, that they shal passe through the fire for al workes: but if they haue faithfully builded the church, they shal receiue reward when their worke is examined with fire. First, we see that the Apostle vsed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrins inuented by mans braines, wood, hey, & stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant rescue: that as wood so soone as it is put in the fire, consumeth & wasteth, so cannot those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that such trial cometh of the holy Ghost. Therefore to follow the true cause of his metaphore, & match the partes together with iust relation, he called the trial of the holy Ghost, fire. For euen as the necret that gold and siluer are put to the fire, so much ỳ surer proofe they haue of their goodnes & fineneſſe: so the Lords trueth, the more exactly it is wayed with spiritual examination, so much the greater confirmation of credit it receiueth. As hey, wood, & stubble put to the fire, are brought to sudde consuming, so the inuentions of men not stablished by the word of God, cannot beare ỳ trial of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fall away & perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and stubble, because like wood, hey, and stubble, they are burned with fire & destroied: but they are not destroied or driuen away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth ỳ the holy ghost is the fire wherwith they shalbe proued, whose proofe Paul, according to the cõmon vse of the scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called ỳ day of the Lord, whensoeuer he doeth any way shewe his presence to men. But then his face principally shineth, when his trueth shineth vpon vs. Now haue we proued, that Paul meaneth no other fire, but the triall of the holy ghost. But how are they saued by ỳ fire, ỳ suffer losse of their work? That shal not be hard to vnderstãd, if we consider of what kind of mẽ he speketh. For he toucheth those builders of the church, ỳ keping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swarueing from the chiefe & necessarie articles of faith, do erre in points that be smaller & lesse perilous, mingling their owne deuises with the word of God. Such I say, say, must suffer losse of their worke, hauing their deuises destroied. But themselues are saued, but as by the fire: that is to say, not that their ignorance & errour is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holie ghost. Therefore, whosoeuer haue defiled the golden fineneſſe of Gods word with this dong of purgatorie, they must needes suffer losse of their worke.

Chrysost. Auguſt. and others.

10 But they wil say, it hath beene an ancient vsage of the Church. Paul aunswered this obiection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where he saith, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the Church, do lay any thing vpon the foundation that agreeth not with it. Therfore when the aduersaries obiect against me, that it hath bin vsed aboue a thousand & three hundreth yeres, to haue prayers made for the dead: I aske them again, by what word of God, by what Reuelation, by what example it was done. For here they do not onely want testimonies of Scripture but also al the exãples of holy men that there are red, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning & order of funerals there are sometimes found many & long tales: but of praiers you cannot see one title. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue bene expreſſely spoken. But the very olde fathers themselues that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both cõmaundement of God, & lawful exãple. Why then durst they so do? In this I say, they did suffer somwhat as men: & therefore I affirme that that which they did, ought not to be drawen into example. For where as ỹ faithful ought to enterprise the doing of nothing, but vpon assured conscience, as Paul teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in praier. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieue their sorrow: and it seemed vnnaturall not to shewe before God some testimony of their loue toward the dead. How mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also ỹ receiued custome was like a burning brand to set many mens mindes on fier. We know that with all nations & in al ages there were funerals done for the dead, & their soules yerely purged. For though Satan beguiled fooliſh men with these deceits: yet he toke occasiõ so to beguile by a true principle: that death is not a destruction, but a passage out of this life into another. And it is no doubt, but ỹ euen very superstition condemneth the Gentiles before the iudgement seat of god, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselues to beleeue. Now Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathen men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were vtterly destroyed. Hereupon cam ỹ ill aduised diligence: because if they were slow in looking to the funerals, in banketings and offrings, they thought that they had put themselues in danger of a great reproche. And that which first proceded from a wrongful following of the Heathens exãple, was so multiplied by often new encreases, that now it is the prncipall holinesse of Papistrie, to helpe the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministreth another much better & perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in ỹ Lord. And it addeth a reason: because from thence forth they rest from their labors. And we ought not so much tenderly to followe our owne affection of loue, as set

The occasion whence prayer for the dead first rose, which notwithstanding doth not argue the soules of the dead, which were prayed for to haue bene in purgatory.

vp a wrongful maner of praying in the church. Truely he ỹ hath but meane wisedom, doth soone perceiue that al that is read hereof in the old writers, was done to beare with the common vsage, & the ignorance of the people. They themselues also, I grant, were caried away into error euen as vnadui-sed lightnes of beliefe is wont to rob mens wits of iudgement. But in the meane time the verie reading of them doth shew, how doutingly they cõ-mend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, repor-teth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that she might be remem-bred in celebrating ỹ ministeries at the Altar. An old wiues request, which the sonne neuer examined by the rule of the scripture, but according to his affection of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the dead, containeth so many doutings, that of right it ought with the coldnes therof to quench the heat of a fooliſh zeal: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truely with cold likelihodes it will bring them out of care that were before careful. For this is one piller of it, ỹ this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growẽ in vse, that the dead should be praied for. But though I grant to the old writers of ỹ church, that it is a charitable vse to helpe the dead: yet wee must still hold one rule which cannot deceiue: that it is not lawful for vs in our prayers to vse any thing of our own, but our requests must be made subiect to the word of god: because it is in his wil to appoint what he wil haue to be asked. Now where as the whole law & the Gospel do not so much as in one syllable giue liber-tie to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inuocation of God to attempt more than he commandeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they haue the ancient church companion of their errour: I say there is great difference betweene them & it. They vsed a memorial of the dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithal confesse that they douted of their state. As for purgatorie, they so affirmed nothing that they held it for a thing vncertain. These men require to haue that which they haue dreamed of purgatorie, to be holden without question for an article of faith. They slenderly & onely to passe it lightly ouer, did in the communion of the holy supper commend their dead to God: These do continually call vpon the care of the dead, & with impor-tunate praising it, do make it so be preferred aboue al dutiful works of cha-ritie. Yea, & it were not hard for vs to bring forth some testimonies of ỹ old writers, that do manifestly ouerthrow al those prayers for the dead, which then were vsed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that al men look for the resurrection of the flesh & the eternal glorie, & that euery man then re-ceiueth the rest that followeth after death, if he be worthie when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that al the godly do immediatly after death en-ioy the blessed rest as wel as the Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseech you shall our prayers auaile them? I passe ouer the grosser superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the minds of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstrous, that they can haue no honest colour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthie buyings and sellings that they haue vsed, while the world was in such grosse senselesse ignorance. For both I shoulde neuer make an end, and also the readers shall without any rehearsall of them, haue here sufficient, whereupon they may stablish their consciences.

The vi. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first, by what arguments the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.

An order of framing our liues needeful to be gathered out of Scriptures.

WE haue alreadie sayd, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth is that in the life of the faithful there should appeare an agreement and consent betweene the righteousnesse of GOD and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his lawe conteine in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of GOD is restored in vs, yet because our dulnesse hath neede both of manie prickings forwarde and helpes, therefore it shal be profitable to gather out of diuerse places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that haue a desirous minde of amendment, may not wander out of the way in their endeuour. Now when I take vpon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I enter into a manifold & plenteous argument, & such as may with the greatnesse therof fil a long volume, if I would absolutely entreat of it in al points. For we see into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of old writers, made onely euery one of one seuerall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle habbling. For whatsoeuer vertue a man purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenesse with plentie of matter, that a man cannot seeme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse hee haue spoken much. But my minde is not to stretch so farre the institution of life, which I promise to teache, as peculiarly to goe through euery speciall vertue, and wander abroad into exhortations. Let such thinges bee fetched out of other mens writinges, and specially out of the Homelies of the olde fathers. It shall be enough for me to shew an orderly trade, wherby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, & shortly to appoint out a certaine vniuersal rule, by which he may well trie what be his dueties. There shal peraduenture at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I my selfe am not meete to doe. I do naturally loue shortnesse, and peraduenture if I would speake more at large, it would not frame well with mee. And if a longer maner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue minde to put it in proofe. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Philosophers haue their certaine ends of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the company of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this mater: but holdeth a most goodly well ordered disposition, and much more certaine than all the Philosophers oders. This onely is the difference, that they (as they were vainglorious men) haue diligently endeuoured to attain an exquisite plainenes of order, to shewe foorth the ready aptnesse of their witte. But the Spirite of God, because he taught without curious affection, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime vseth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

The first entrãce vnto newnesse of life is the loue of holinesse, wherewith to enflame vs we are taught that God is holie.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, wherof we now speake, standeth chiefly vpõ two partes. The first, that there be powred & brought into our mindes a loue of righteousnes, to which otherwise wee are of nature nothing enclined. The second, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousnes. In commendation of righteousnes it hath both verie many & verie good reasons: of which we haue here before in diuerse places spoken of some, and other some we shal in this place briefely touch. At what foundation may it better beginne, than when it putteth vs in mind that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abroad like straying sheepe, and dispersed abroad in the maze of the world, he gathereth vs together again, to ioyne vs in one flocke with himselfe. When wee heare mention made of our ioyning with God, let vs remember that holynesse must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (whereas rather we must first cleaue vnto him, that being endued with his holinesse, we may follow whither he calleth) but because it greatly perteineth to his glorie, that he haue no fellowship with wickednesse and vncleannesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the end of our calling, which we ought alway to haue respect vnto, if we wil answere God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawen out of the wickednesse and filthinesse of the world, if wee giue our selues leaue all our life long to wallow in them stil? Moreouer it also admonisheth vs that to the end we may be reckned among the people of God, we must dwel in the holy citie Hierusalem. Which as he hath hallowed to himself, so is it vnlawfull that it be vnholily prophaned by the vncleannesse of the inhabitants. From hence came these sayings, that they shal haue a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to follow righteousnes, &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, shoulde be like a stable full of filthinesse.

Psal. 35.8.
Psal. 15.2. & 23.

Another motiue vnto holines is Christ his holines which God hath set to be our paterne.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioyned vs to himselfe in Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would haue vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Philosophers, that thinke that the philosophie concerning maners, is in them only orderly framed. They when they will excellently wel exhort vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should liue agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true welspring, when it not only teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the author of it, to whome it is bond: but also when she hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true original and state of our creation, she immediatly addeth, that Christ by whome wee came againe into fauour with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectuall than this one thing? Yea, what may a man require more than this onely thing? For if the Lorde hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life shoulde resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if wee doe not giue and auowe our selues to righteousnes, we doe not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creator, but also we forsweare him to be our sauiour. Then the scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of God, which she rehearseth vnto vs, and all the parres of our saluation. And sheweth that sith God hath shewed himselfe a father vnto vs, we are worthie to be condemned of extreeme vnthankefulnesse, if we doe not likewise in our behalfe shew our selues children vnto him. Sith Christ hath cleansed vs with the washing of his blood, and hath made vs partakers of this cleansing by baptisme, it is not seemely that we shoulde be spotted with new filthinesse. Sith he hath grafted vs into his bodie, we must carefully take heede that we sprinckle not any spot or blot vpon vs that are his members. Sith he himselfe that is our heade, is ascended into heauen, it behooueth vs that laying away earthly affection, we doe with all our heart aspire to heauenwarde: Sith the holy Ghost hath dedicated vs temples to God, we must indeuour that Gods glorie maie be honourablie set out by vs, and must not doe anie thing whereby we maie be prophaned with filthines of sinne: Sith both our soule and our bodie are ordained to heauenly incorruption and an vnperishing crowne, wee must diligently trauel, that the same may be kept pure and vncorrupted vnto the day of the Lord. These (I saie) be the best laide foundations to builde a mans life, and such as the like are not to be found among the Philosophers, which in commendation of vertue doe neuer climbe aboue the natural dignitie of man.

Mala.1.6. Eph.5.1. 2.Iohn.3.1. Ephe.15. Heb.10. 1.Cor.6. 1.Cor.6. 1.Pet.1.15. John.15.3. Ephe.5. Col.3. 2.Cor.6. 1.Thes.5.15.

It is the imitation of Christe which declareth a true Christian.

4 And here is a fit place to speake vnto them, that hauing nothing but the title and badge of Christ, yet woulde bee named Christians. But with what face doe they boast of his holie name: sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue receiued a true knowledge of him out of the worde of the Gospel? But the Apostle saith, that al they haue not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the old man which is corrupted according to the desire of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is prooued that they falsely, yea and wrongfully pretende the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundly talke of the Gospell. For it is not a doctrine of tongue, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learninges be, with onelie vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onelie receiued when it possesseth the whole soule, and findeth a seate & place to hold it in the most inward affection of the heart. Therefore either let them cease, to the slaunder of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shewe themselues not vnworthie scholers for Christ their maister. Wee haue giuen the first place to the doctrine wherein our religion is conteined, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must bee powred into our heart, and passe into our manners, yea and transforme vs vnto it, that it be not vnfruitfull vnto vs. If the Philosophers doe iustly chafe against them, and doe with shamefull reproch driue them from their companie, that professing an arte that ought to be schoolemaisters of life, doe turne it into a Sophistical babling: with how much better reason shall wee detest these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell vppon the toppe of their tongues, the effectual working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affectiõs of the heart.

to reſtin the ſoule, and to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the cold exhortations of Philoſophers?

Though Chriſtians be farre from attaining vnto, yet they ought to be earneſt in followving after the perfect righteouſnes vvhich is ſet before them in the Goſpell.

5 Yet do I not require that the manners of a Chriſtian man ſauour of nothing but the abſolute Goſpell: which neuertheleſſe both were to be wiſhed & we muſt indeuour vs toward it. But I do not ſo ſeuerely require a goſpellike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a Chriſtian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For ſo ſhould all men be excluded from the church, ſith there is no man found that is not by a great ſpace diſtant from it, & manie haue hitherto but a litle waye proceeded towarde it, who yet ſhould be vniuſtly caſt away. What then? let that be ſet for the mark before our eyes, to which alone al our endeuour may be directed. Let that be appointed the gole for vs to run & trauel vnto. For it is not lawfull for thee ſo to make partition with God, to take vpon thee part of theſe things that are cõmanded thee in his word, & to leaue part at thine own choiſe. For firſt of all he eueriwhere commendeth integritie as the cheefe part of worſhipping him: by which worde he meaneth a pure ſimplicitie of minde that is without all deceitfull colour & fayning: againſt which a double heart is ſet as contrarie: as if it ſhould be ſaid, that the beginning of liuing vprightly is ſpiritual, when the inward affection of the mind is without fayning dedicate to God to obſerue holineſſe & righteouſneſſe. But becauſe no man in this earthly priſon of the bodie hath ſo great ſtrength to haſt with ſuch freſhnes of running, as he perfectly ought to do, & the greater number are ſo feeble, that with ſtaggering and halting, yea and creeping vpon the ground, they auaunce but ſlowly forward. Let vs euerie one goe according to the meaſure of his litle power, and proceede on our iourney begon. No man ſhall go ſo vntowardly, but he ſhal euerie day get ſome ground, though it be but litle. Therfore let vs not ceaſe to trauel ſo, that wee may continually proceede ſomewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not deſpeire vpon the ſlendernes of our going forward, for howſoener the ſucceſſe anſwer not our deſire, yet we haue not loſt our labour when this day paſſeth yeſterday: ſo that with pure ſimplicitie we looke vnto our marke, & long toward the end of our courſe, not ſoothingly flattering our ſelues, nor tenderly bearing with our own euils, but with continuall endeuour trauelling to this, that we may ſtil become better than our ſelues, til we attaine to goodnes it ſelfe: which in deede we ſeeke for & follow all our life long: but we ſhal then only attaine it, when being vnclothed of the weaknes of the fleſh, we ſhal be receiued into the ful fellowſhip thereof.

The vij. Chapter.

The ſumme of a Chriſtian life: vvherein is intreated of the forſaking of our ſelues.

The firſt beginning of a newe life, is the reſigning ouer of our ſelues from our ſelues vnto God. Rom. 12. 1.

ALbeit that the law of the Lorde haue a moſt aptly wel diſpoſed order to frame a mans life, yet it ſeemed good to the heauenly ſcholemaſter to inſtruct men yet with a more exact trade to the ſame rule ỳ he had ſet forth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the duetie of the faithful to yeld there bodies to God a liuing, holy & acceptable ſacrifice vnto him: & that therein ſtandeth the true worſhipping of him. Here-

vpon is gathered occasion to exhort men, that they do not apply themselues to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewing of their mind, that they may proue what the wil of God is. Now this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that wee should from thence foorth thinke, speake, imagine, or do nothing but to his glorie. For the thing that is consecrate, cannot be applyed to vnholy vses, without great wrong done vnto him. If we be not our own, but the Lords, it appeareth what errour is to be auoided, and whervnto al the doings of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counsels and doings. We are not our own: therefore let vs not make this the end for vs to tend vnto, to seeke that which may be expedient for vs according to the flesh. We are not our own: therfore so much as we may, let vs forget our selues and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs liue and die to him. Wee are Gods: therefore let his wisedome and will gouerne all our doings. Wee are Gods: therefore let all the partes of our life tend toward him as their only lawfull end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken from himselfe the rule and gouernment of himself to giue it to God? For as this is the moste strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey themselues: so it is the onely hauen of safetie, neither to know nor will any thing by himselfe, but onely to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first step, that man depart from himselfe, that he may apply all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lord. Obeying I call not only that which standeth in obedience of the worde, but that whereby the minde of man, void from his own sensualitie of flesh, bendeth it self wholy to the wil of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paul calleth renewing of the mind) whereas it is the first entrie into life, all the Philosophers were ignorant. For they make only Reason the gouernesse of man: they think she only ought to be heard: finally to her only they giue & assigne the rule of maners. But the Christian Philosophie biddeth her to giue place, and to yelde and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man nowe may not liue himselfe, but beare Christ liuing and reigning in him.

Rom.14.8.

Ephe.4.23.

Gala.1.20.

2 Hereupon followeth also this other point, that wee seeke not the things that be our owne, but those things that be according to the will of the Lord, and that make to the aduauncement of his glorie. This is also a profe of great profiting, that in a maner forgetting our selues, & altogether leauing the regard of our selues, we trauel to employ our studie to God & his commandements. For when the scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuie regard of our selues, it doth not only race out of our minds ỹ couetousnes of hauing the greedie seeking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition & al desire of worldly glorie, and other more secrete pestilences. Truly a Christian man must bee so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this sort, as hee shall examine all his doinges by Gods will and iudgement: so he shall reuerently direct vnto him al the earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to looke vppon God in all thinges that hee hath to doe, is therewithall turned away from all vaine thoughtes. This is that forsaking of our

The next degree of righteousneſſe to seek those things that are of God sincerely for them selues not in any side respect of our owne.

ſelues, which Chriſt euen frō their firſt beginning of inſtruction ſo earneſtly gaue in charge to his diſciples: which when it once hath gotten poſſeſſion in y heart leaueth no place at all, firſt neither for pride, nor diſdainfulneſſe, nor vaine glorious boaſting, then neither for couetiſe, nor filthie luſt, nor rioutouſneſſe, nor deintineſſe, nor for other euils that are engendred of the loue of our ſelues. Contrariwiſe, whereſoeuer it reigneth not, there either moſt filthie vices do rage without ſhame, or if there bee any ſpice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerſe deſire of glorie. For ſhew me a man, if thou canſt, that vnleſſe he haue forſaken himſelfe according to the commaundement of the Lord, will of his owne free will vſe goodneſſe among men. For al they that haue not beene poſſeſſed with this feeling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at the leaſt for praiſes ſake. And all the Philoſophers that euer moſt of all affirmed that vertue was to be deſired for it ſelfes ſake, were puffed vp with ſo great pride, that it appeared that they deſired vertue for no other thing, but that they might haue matter to be proud vpon. But God is ſo nothing at all delited, neither with thoſe gapers for the peoples breath, not with theſe ſwelling beaſts, that hee pronounceth that they haue alreadie receiued their reward in the worlde, and maketh harlots and publicanes neerer to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not throughly declared with how many and how great ſtoppes man is hindred from that which is right, ſo long as he hath not forſaken himſelfe. For it was truely ſaid in times paſt, that there is a worlde of vices hidden in the ſoule of man. And thou canſt finde no other remedies, but denying thy ſelfe, and leauing regard of thy ſelfe, to bende thy minde to ſeeke thoſe thinges that the Lorde requireth of thee, and to ſeeke them therefore only becauſe they pleaſe him.

The partes of a vvel ordered life, ſet dovvne by Saint Paul. Tit. 2. 12.

3 In another place the ſame Paul doth more plainly, although ſhortly, goe through all the partes of a well ordered life, ſaying: The grace of God that bringeth ſaluation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that wee ſhoulde denie all vngodlineſſe, and worldly luſtes, and that wee ſhoulde liue ſober minded, righteouſly and godly in this preſent worlde, looking for the bleſſed hope and glorious appearing of the mightie God, and of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, which gaue himſelfe for vs to redeeme vs from all vnrighteouſneſſe, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto himſelfe feruently giuen vnto good workes. For after that he hath ſet foorth the grace of God to encourage them, to make readie the way for vs to worſhip God, hee taketh away two ſtoppes that doe moſt hinder vs, that is to ſay, vngodlineſſe, whereunto wee are naturally too much inclined, & Worldly deſires, which extende further. And vnder the name of vngodlineſſe, hee not only meaneth ſuperſtitions, but alſo comprehendeth all that diſagreeth with the earneſt feare of God. And worldly luſtes are in effect as much as the affections of the fleſh. Therefore hee commaundeth vs in reſpect of both the tables of the lawe, to put off our owne wit, and to forſake all that our owne reaſon and will informeth vs. And all the doings of our life he bringeth into three partes, ſobrietie, righteouſnes, & godlineſſe: of the which ſobrietie without doubt ſignifieth as wel chaſtitie and temperance, as a pure & meaſurable ſparing vſe of temporall things, and a patient ſufferance of pouertie.

Righ-

Righteousnesse conteineth all the duties of equitie, to giue euery man his owne. The third is Godlinesse, that seuereth vs from the defilinges of the worlde, and with true holinesse ioyneth vs to God. These thinges, when they be knitte together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfection. But forasmuch as nothing is more harde, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduing and renouncing her desires, to giue our selues to God and our brethren, and to studie for an Angelike life in the filthie state of this earth: therefore Paul, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth vs backe to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to striue in vaine: because as Christ hath once appeared the redeemer, so at his last cõming, hee shall shewe the fruite of the saluation that he hath purchased. And thus he driueth away the entisements that blinde vs, and make vs not to aspire as we ought to the heauenly glorie: yea and he teacheth that wee must trauaile as men being from home in this worlde, that the heauenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

The denial of our selues hath relation partly to men but chiefly to God. Rom.12.20. Phil.2.3.

4 Now in these words we perceiue, that the forsaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefely to God. For whereas the scripture biddeth vs so to behaue our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that wee faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it geeueth such cõmandements as our mind is not able to receiue, but first being made void of naturall sense. For (with such blindnesse wee runne all into loue of our selues) euery man thinketh himselfe to haue a iust cause to aduance himselfe, and to despise all other in comparison of himselfe. If God haue giuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold thereof, we lift vp our courage, and not onely swell, but in a manner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound, we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good gifts, which wee praise in our selues, or better do appeare in other, least we should be compelled to giue place to them, we do with our enuiousnesse deface them and find fault with them. If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented seuerely and sharpely to marke it, but wee also odiously amplifie it. Hereupon groweth that insolencie, that euery one of vs, as though he were priuileged from the common estate, would be higher than the rest, and carelesly and proudly set light by euerie man, or despise them as inferiours. The poore yeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, seruãts to their masters, vnlearned to be learned: but there is no man that doeth not nourish within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So euery man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his brest. For presumptuously taking vppon them somewhat whereby to please themselues, they iudge vpon the wittes and manners of other men. But if they come to contention, there bursteth out their poyson. For many doe make a shewe of great meekenesse, so long as they finde all things gentle and louely: but howe many a one is there that keepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is pricked & stirred to anger? And there is no remedie hereof, but that the most hurtful pestilence of loue, of soueraignetie & selfeloue be rooted out of the bottome of their heartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are ſo taught, that wee muſt remember that the good giftes that God hath giuen vs, are not our owne good thinges, but the free giftes of God, whereof if any be proud, they bewray their owne vnthankefulneſſe. Who maketh thee to excell? Paul ſaith, if thou haſt receiued all thinges, why doeſt thou boaſt as if they were not giuen thee? Then, that wee muſt with continuall reknowledging of our faults, call our ſelues backe to humilitie. So ſhall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there ſhalbe much matter to abaſe our ſelues. Againe, wee are commanded, whatſoeuer giftes of God we ſee in other men, ſo to reuerence and eſteeme thoſe giftes, that we alſo honour thoſe men in whom they be. For it were a great leaudnes for vs, to take from them that honor, that God hath vouchſafed to giue them. As for their faultes, wee are taught to winke at them, not to cheriſh them with flattering, but that we ſhould not by reaſon of thoſe faultes triumph againſt them, to whom we ought to beare good will and honour. So ſhall it come to paſſe, that with what man ſo euer wee haue to doe, we ſhall behaue our ſelues not onely temperately and modeſtly, but alſo gently and friendly. As a man ſhal neuer come any other way to true meekneſſe, but if he haue a heart endued with abacing of himſelfe, and reuerencing of other.

1. Cor. 4. 7.

It is not poſſible we ſhould do our duetie to others except we haue firſt denied our ſelues: And our duetie is to profite other men with whatſoeuer God hath benefited vs.

1. Cor. 13. 4.

5 Now how hard is it, for thee to doe thy dutie in ſeeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou ſhalt herein labour in vaine, vnleſſe thou depart from regard of thy ſelfe, and in a maner put off thy ſelfe. For how canſt thou performe theſe thinges that Paul teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnleſſe thou forſake thy ſelfe, to giue thy ſelfe wholly to other? Charitie (ſaith he) is patient and gentle, not proud, not diſdainfull, enuyeth not, ſwelleth not, ſeeketh not her owne, is not angrie, &c. If this one thing be required, that we ſeeke not the things that are our owne, we ſhall doe no ſmall violence to nature, which ſo bendeth vs to the onely loue of our ſelues, that it doeth not eaſily ſuffer vs negligently to paſſe ouer our ſelues and our owne thinges, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to reſigne it to an other. But the Scripture, to leade vs thither as it were by the hande, warneth vs that whatſoeuer gratious giftes we obtaine of the Lord, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they ſhould be beſtowed to the common benefit of the Church: & that therefore the true vſe of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortation could be deuiſed for the keeping of the ſame, than when we be taught that all the good giftes that wee haue, are thinges of God deliuered, committed to our truſt vpon this condition, that they ſhoulde be diſpoſed to the benefite of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans bodie are endued. No member hath his power for him ſelf, nor applyeth it to his priuate vſe: but poureth it abroade into the other members of the ſame body, and taketh no profit thereof, but ſuch as proceedeth from the common commoditie of the whole bodie. So whatſoeuer a godly man is able to doe, hee ought to be able to do it for his brethren, in prouiding none otherwiſe priuately for himſelfe, but ſo that his mind be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindneſſe & doing good: that whatſoeuer God hath beſtowed vpon vs, whereby wee may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailifes thereof, and bounde to render account of the diſpoſing of it. And that the only right diſpoſing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So ſhal it come to paſſe, that wee ſhal alway not onely ioyne the trauel for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but alſo ſet it before the care of our owne. And that wee ſhould not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of diſpoſing all the giftes that we receiue of God, he hath in the old time ſet the ſame lawe euen in the ſmalleſt giftes of his liberalitie. For he commaunded the firſt fruites of corne to be offered vnto him, by which the people might teſtifie that it was vnlawfull for them to take any fruite of the goods that were not firſt conſecrate to him. If the giftes of God be ſo only then ſanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our own hand dedicated them to the author thereof, it is euident that it is an vntrue abuſe thereof that doth not ſauour of ſuch dedication. But it ſhall bee vaine for thee to go about to enrich the Lorde with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore ſith thy liberalitie cannot extende vnto him, as the Prophet ſayth, thou muſt vſe it toward his ſaints that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may nowe be correſpondent to theſe of the law.

Pſa. 16.3. Heb. 13.16.

6 But that we ſhould not be wearie with doing good (which otherwiſe muſt needs come quickly to paſſe) that other thing muſt be adioyned which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of, that charitie is patient and not mooued to anger. The Lord commaundeth to doe good to all vniuerſally, of whome a great part are moſt vnworthie, if they be conſidered by their own deſeruing. But here the ſcripture helpeth with a verie good meane, when it teacheth that we muſt not haue reſpect what men deſerue of thémſelues, but that the image of God is to be conſidered in all men, to which wee owe all honor and loue. But the ſame is moſt diligently to be marked in them of the houſholde of faith, in ſo much as it is in them renewed & reſtored by the ſpirit of Chriſt. Therefore whatſoeuer man thou light vpon, that needeth thy help, thou haſt no cauſe to withdrawe thy ſelfe from doing him good. If thou ſay that hee is a ſtranger: but the Lorde hath giuen him a marke, that ought to bee familiar vnto thee, by the reaſon that he forbiddeth thee to deſpiſe thine owne fleſh. If thou ſay that hee is baſe and naught worth: but the Lorde ſheweth him to bee ſuch a one, to whome hee hath vouchſafed to giue the beautie of his image. If thou ſay that thou oweſt him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath ſet him as it were in his place in reſpect of whome, thou knoweſt ſo many and ſo great benefites wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou ſay that hee is vnworthie that thou ſhouldeſt labour any thing at all for his ſake: but the image of God whereby he is commended to thee, to worthie that thou ſhouldeſt giue thy ſelfe and all that thou haſt vnto it But if he haue not onely deſerued no good at thy hand, but alſo prouoked thee with wrongs and euill doings: euen this is no iuſt cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt ceaſe both to loue him and to doe for him the duetifull workes of loue. Thou wilt ſay, he hath farre otherwiſe deſerued of me. But what hath the Lorde deſerued? Which when hee commaundeth thee to forgiue all wherein hee hath offended thee, truely hee willeth the same to be imputed to himselfe. Truely this is that only way to come to that which is vtterly against the nature of man, much more is it harde for man. I meane, to loue them that hate vs, to recompence euil with doing good, to render blessinges for reproches: if wee remember that wee must not consider the malice of men, but looke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faults, doth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to imbrace it.

Luk. 17. 3.
Mat. 5. 44.

To do the works of Charitie it is nothing, except they be done charitable.

7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when wee performe the dueties of charitie. But it is not hee that performeth them, that only doth al the duetifull workes of charitie, although hee leaue none of them vndone, but he that doth them of a syncere affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe to al men all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outward dueties: and yet he may bee farre from the true performing of it. For you may see some that woulde seeme verie liberall, which yet doe giue nothing but either with pride of looke, or with churlishnesse of wordes they vpbraide it. And wee bee come to such wretchednesse in this vnhappie worlde, that almost no almes are giuen of anie men, or at least of the most part of men, without reproching. Which peruersnesse shoulde not haue bene tollerable among the verie heathen. For of Christians is somwhat more required than to shewe a cherefulnes in countenance, and make their doings louely with gentleneſſe of wordes. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whome they see to neede their helpe, and then so pitie their case, as if themselues did feele and suffer it: so that they may be carried with feeling of mercie & gentleneſſe euen as they would be to help themselues. He that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, wil not only not defile his doings with any arrogancie or vpbraiding, but also neither will despise his brother to whome he doeth good as one needing his help, nor tread him vnder foote as one bound vnto him: no more than we vse to reproch a sick member, for easing whereof the whole bodie laboureth, or to thinke it specially bound to the other members, because it hath drawen more help vnto it than it hath recompensed. For it is thought that the common interpartning of dueties betweene members of one bodie, hath no free kinde of giste, but rather that it is a payment of that which being due by the lawe of nature it were monstrous to deny. And by this reason it shall followe, that hee may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of duetie, as it is commonly vsed, that when a rich man hath giuen any thing of his owne, hee leaueth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euerie man shall thinke thus with himselfe, that he is altogether debter to his neighbours, and that hee must determine none other ende of vsing his liberalitie, but when abilitie fayleth, which howe large soeuer it be, must bee measured by the rule of charitie.

The principall part of denying our selues is vvholie to depend vpon the fauour and blessing of God, vvithout any reckoning or account making of vvorldlie thinges.

8 Nowe let vs more fully declare the principall parte of forsaking our selues, which wee saide to haue respect to God. Wee haue saide much of it alreadie, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shall bee sufficient to entreate of it so farre as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and sufferance rance First therefore in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our things to the Lords wil, we should yeld vnto him the affections of our heart to bee tamed and subdued. To couet wealth & honors, to compasse authoritie, to heap vp riches, to gather together all such follies as serue for royaltie and pompe, our lust is outragious, & our greedinesse infinite. On the other side of pouertie, ignobilitie, & base estate, we haue a marueilous feare & marueilous hatred, that moue vs to trauaile by all meanes to eschue them. Hereby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they haue, howe many shiftes they attempt, with what studies they weatie their life, that frame their life after their owne deuise: to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or couetousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape pouertie and basenesse. Therefore the godly must keepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First, let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lord: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselues vpon it. For howsoeuer the flesh thinke it selfe sufficient of her selfe, when shee either trauaileth by her owne diligence, or endeuoureth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the fauour of men, to the attaining of honour & wealth: yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, & that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauaile, but in so much as the Lord shal prosper both. But on the other side his only blessing findeth a way through all stops, to make all thinges proceede with vs to a ioyfull and luckie end. Then howsoeuer wee may most of all obteine any glory or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heaps of great honors & richesse) yet for as much as they vpon whom resteth the curse, do feele no parcel of felicitie, wee can obteine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to euil. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

He which knoweth him self and his estate to depend wholle vpon the blessing of God, will neither seeke to aduaunce him selfe by euil meanes nor immoderatelie desire to be aduaunced, nor impatiētly murmur at anie thing which happeth.

9 Therefore if we beleeue that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the only blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamitie must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that we do not greedily endeuour to wealth and honors standing vpon our owne fineneſse of wit or diligence, not leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that wee alway looke vnto the Lord, to be led by his guiding to whatsoeuer lot he hath prouided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and inuading of honours, by wrong, by guile and euill craftie meanes, or extortion with doing iniurie to our neighbours, but shal onely follow those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocencie. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other suttle meanes of wickednesse? For as Gods blessing followeth no man but him that thinketh purely, and doeth rightly, so it calleth backe all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt doinges. Then wee shalbe bridled that wee burne not with vnmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obtaine those things that hee desireth against his worde? For God forbid that God shoulde giue the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succeede not according to our wish & hope, yet we shalbe restrained from impatience, and from cursing our estate whatsoeuer it be: because wee knowe that that is to murmure against God, at whose will richesse and pouertie, baseneſſe and honours are disposed. Briefely, he that resteth himselfe in such sort as is aforesaid vpon the blessing of God, neither will by euill subtleties hunt for those things that men are wont outragiously to couet, by which craftie meanes he thinketh that he shal nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence, endeuour or to fortune, but wil assigne it to God the author. But if while other mens estates do florish, he go but slenderly forward, yea or slide backwarde, yet hee wil beare his ill fortune with greater quietnesse and moderation of minde, than a prophane man wil beare a meanly good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired: because hee hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than vpon the highest top of wealth and authoritie: because he accounteth that his things are ordered by God as is auailable for his saluation. So wee see that Dauid was minded, and yeldeth himselfe to bee ruled by God, hee declareth himselfe to bee like to a weined childe, and that hee walketh not in high thinges or marueilous aboue himselfe.

The quiet contentment of minde which groweth vnto men in the manifolde casual miseries of this life, if they be once assured not that fortune doeth blindly tosse, but God prouidently dispose their whole estate.

10 And the godly mindes ought to haue that quietnesse and sufferance not onely consisting in this behalfe: but also it must extende to al chaunces whereunto our present life is subiect. Therfore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath so resigned himself vp wholy to the Lorde, that he suffereth all the partes of his life to bee gouerned by his will. He that is so framed in minde, whatsoeuer happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enuiousnesse against God complaine of his fortune. Howe necessarie this affection is, shal hereby appeare, if you consider to howe many chances we be subiect. Diuerse kindes of diseases do trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime wee are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or hayle deuouring the hope of the yeare, bringeth barrennesse, that driueth vs to dearth: sometime our wife, parents, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fire: these be the things at chancing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue heauen & light in execration, murmure against god, & (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vniustice & cruelties But a faithfull man must euen in these chances beholde the merciful kindnesse and fatherly tenderneſſe of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore ceasse to praise god, but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lorde that dwelleth in my house will not leaue it desolate. Or if when his corne is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten downe with haile, hee see famine at hande, yet hee will not despaire, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, Wee are yet in the Lordes protection, and sheepe brought vp in his pastures: hee therefore wil finde vs foode euen in extremest barrennesse. Or if hee be troubled with sickenesse, euen then hee will not bee discouraged with bitternesse of sorrowe

to

to burst out into impatience and quarel thus with God: but considering the righteousnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he wil call himselfe backe to patience. Finally whatsoeuer shall happen, because he knoweth it ordained by the hand of God, he wil take it with a wel pleased and thankfull minde, least he should stubbornly resist his authoritie, into whose power he hath yelded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolishe and most miserable comfort of the heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strégthen their mindes against aduersities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they counted it foolish to be angry, because she was blinde and vnaduised, that blindly wounded both the deseruing and vndeseruing. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the only hand of God is the iudge and gouernesse of both fortunes, & that it runneth not forward with vnaduised sodaine rage, but with most orderly iustice dealeth among vs both good thinges and euil.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the bearing of the crosse, which is a part of the forsaking of our selues.

BVt a godly mind must yet climbe vp higher, euē to that whereunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lorde hath chosen and vouchsafed to receiue into his companie, must prepare themselues to a harde, trauailesome and vnquiet life, and full of many and diuerse kindes of incommodities. So it is the will of the heauenly father, to exercise them in such sort, that he may haue a true proofe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloued sonne aboue the rest, and in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see how he was not tenderly and daintily handeled: so that it may be truely saide, that he was not onely exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing els but a kinde of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoued that he should learne obedience by those thinges that he suffred. Why thē should we priuiledge our selues from that estate, whereunto it behoued Christ our head to be subiect, specially sith he became subiect thereunto for our cause, to shew vs an example of patience in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle sayeth that this is the appointed end of all the children of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard & sharp chaunces, which are reckoned aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the suffrings of Christ: that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we maye by diuerse tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so saith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicating of his afflictions, we do also conceiue the power of his resurrection: and when we are fashioned like vnto death, we are so prepared to the fellowshippe of his glorious rising againe. Howe much may this auaile to asswage all the painefulnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our felowshippe with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our sufferinges are not onely made blessed vnto vs, but also do much helpe vs to the furtherance of our saluation.

He which forsaketh himselfe must arme himselfe to endure a trauailsome estate of life, wherein there is notwithstāding this comfort, we go no other waye then Christ himselfe hath troden before vs.

Affliction necessarie for vs not onelie as for Christ to testifie our obedience vnto God, but further also to bring vs to a sensible feeling of our owne imbecilitie and weaknesse.

2 Beside that, our Lord had no need to take vpon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie & proue his obedience to his father: but we for diuerse causes haue neede to lead our life vnder a continuall crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to attribute al things to our flesh) vnlesse our weaknes be shewed vs as it were before our eies, we doe easily esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure, & doubt not that whatsoeuer happé, it will continue vnbroken & vnouercome against al harde assaultes. Whereby we are caried into a foolish and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, we stubbornely waxe proude against God himselfe, as though our owne powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate down, than whé he proueth vnto vs by experience, not onely how feeble, but also how fraile we be. Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouerty, or losse of children, or sicknes, or other calamities, which we being vnable to beare in respect of our selues, do by and by sinke downe vnder them. Being so humbled we learne to call vpon his strength, which only maketh vs to stand vpright vnder the heauy burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, how well soeuer they know that they stand by the grace of God and not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength and constancy, vnlesse by the trial of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselues. The slouthfulnes crept into Dauid: I saide in my rest, I shall neuer be moued, Lorde, thou hadst stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hill, thou hiddest away thy face, I was striken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperity his senses were dulled, that not regarding the grace of God, vpon which he shoulde haue hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetual continuance. If this chaunced to so great a Prophet: which of vs ought not to be feareful, that we may be heedefull? Therefore whereas in prosperitie they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancy and patience, when they are once humbled with aduersity, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie. The faithfull (I say) being admonished by such examples of their diseases, do therby profit to humility, ý being vnclothed of the wrongful confidence of the flesh, they may resort to the grace of god. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presẽce of Gods strength, wherein is aboundantly sufficient succour for them.

Psal. 30. 8.

Affliction by teaching vs howe feeble vvee are of our selues, causeth to rest onlie vpon God. This breedeth patience, vvhereby experience grovveth of Gods vpholding them that relie vpon him, vvhich triall of his goodnesse in thinges past stablisheth the credit of his trueth for thinges to come, and encreaseth hope. Rom. 5, 3.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience proofe For whereas God hath promised the faithful that he wil be present with them in troubles, they feele the same to be true, whé they stand patiently being vpholden by his hãd, which by their own strẽgth they were not able to do. Patience therfore bringeth a proofe by experience to the holy ones, that God when need requireth, wil indeede performe the helpe that he hath promised. And therby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankefulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same truth of God that they had already by experiẽce proued to be constant and sure. We see now how many good thinges do come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse. For, ouerthrowing the opinion that we falsly presume of our owne strength, & disclosing our hypocrisie ỳ delighteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God only, by which it cõmeth to passe, that wee neither be oppressed nor fal down. And after victory soloweth hope, insomuch as the Lord in performing ỳ which he hath promised, stablisheth the credit of his trueth for time to come. Truelie, although there were no moe reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of the crosse is necessary for vs. For it is a matter of no smal importance, to haue the blinde loue of thy selfe wiped away, that thou maist wel knowe thine owne weakenes. To feele thine owne weakenesse, that thou maist learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou maist remoue thy confidence from thy selfe vnto God. to rest with confidence of heart vpon God, that being vpholden by his helpe, thou maist continue vnouercome to the last ende: to stand fast by his grace, that thou maist vnderstande that hee is true in his promises: to knowe by proofe the trueth of his promises, that thy hope maie bee strengthened thereby,

By affliction God bringeth foorth the vertues of his Saints, vvhich before lay hid, into open shevv, and also traineth them in true obedience.

4 The Lord hath also an other end of afflicting his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obedience toward him, other than the same that hee giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approued by witnesses, and to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hid within them. And therfore in bringing forth into open shew the strẽgth of sufferance & constancie, wherewith he hath furnished his seruaunts, it is saide that he trieth their patience. And from hence came these sayinges: that God tempted Abraham, & had proofe of his godlinesse, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his owne & onlie sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proued in troubles, as gold is tried in a fornace. And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of patience, which a faithful mã hath receiued of his God, shuld be brought forth into vse, that it may be made certainly knowen & manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthie. Now if God himself doth rightfully when he ministreth matter to stir vp the vertues that hee hath giuen to his faithful, that they should not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable & perish: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their pacience should be nothing. I say also ỳ by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne wish, but after the wil of God. Truely if all thinges should flow vnto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an olde Prouerb, when they exhorted any man to suffer aduersities, Follow God. By which they declared, that then only mã truely entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yeelded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Nowe if it bee most righteous, that wee shuld shewe our selues in all things obedient to the heauenly father, then we ought not to refuse, that he shoulde by all meanes accustome vs to yeelde obedience vnto him.

1.Pet.1.7.

De vita beata cap.15.

The flesh stubborne, rebellious & vvanton vvithout taming.

5 But yet we perceiue not how necessarie this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we doe also consider, how wanton our flesh is to shake off the yoke of God,

God,ſo ſoone as it hath been but a litle while deintily and tenderly handeled. The ſame happeneth vnto it,that chaunceth to ſtubborn horſes, which if they bee a fewe daies pampred idlely,they cannot afterwarde for fearceneſſe bee tamed, neither do knowe the rider, to whoſe gouernement they ſomewat before obeied. And this is continuall in vs that God complaineth to haue bene in the people of Iſrael, that beeing well fed and couered with fatneſſe,we kicke againſt him that fed & nouriſhed vs The liberality of god ſhould indeede haue allured vs to conſider and loue his goodneſſe, but forasmuch as our euil nature is ſuch,that we are alway corrupted with his tender vſage, it is more than neceſſarie for vs,to be reſtrained by ſome diſcipline, that we run not outragiouſly into ſuch a ſtubborne wantonneſſe. So that we ſhould not grow fierce with vnmeaſurable abundãce of riches,that we ſhould not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors,that wee ſhould not become inſolent,being puffed vp with other good gifts,either of the ſoule, bodie,or fortune,the Lord himſelfe,as he forſeeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it,& with the remedy of the croſſe ſubdueth & bridleth the fearceneſſe of our fleſh,& that diuers waies,ſo much as is healthful for euery mã. For all are not alike ſicke of all one diſeaſes, or do alike neede of hardhealing. And therupon is to be ſeene how ſome are exerciſed with one kinde of croſſe,and ſome with another. But whereas the heauenly Phiſition handeleth ſome more gently,and purgeth ſome with ſharper remedies, when he meaneth to prouide for the health of al: yet hẽ leaueth none free or vntouched,becauſe he knoweth all without exception to be diſeaſed.

Affliction needeful for vs in reſpect of our offences paſt.

6 Moreouer,the moſt merciful father needeth not only to preuent our weaknes,but many times to correct our paſſed offences. Therefore ſo oft as we be afflicted,the remembrance of our forepaſſed life ought by and by to enter into our mind: ſo without dout we ſhal finde that we haue done ſomewhat worthy of chaſticement. Yet we ought not chiefly to ground our exhortation to pacience vpon the acknowledging of ſinne. For the Scripture miniſtreth vs a far better conſideration,when it ſaith,that the Lord correcteth vs with aduerſities,that wee ſhould not be damned with this worlde. Therfore we ought euẽ in the very ſharpnes of tribulatiõs to acknolwedge the kindnes & goodnes of our father toward vs,forasmuch as euen then he ceaſſeth not to further our ſaluatiõ. For he doth afflict,not to deſtroy or kill vs,but rather to deliuer vs from the damnatiõ of the world. That thought ſhal lead vs to that,which the Scripture teacheth in another place: My ſon, refuſe not the Lords correction,nor be weary when thou ſhalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loueth,he correcteth,& embraceth him as a father doth his child. Whẽ we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duetie rather to ſhewe our ſelues obedient children and willing to learne,than with obſtinacie to doe like deſperate men, that are hardned with euill doings? The Lorde leeſeth vs, vnleſſe hee call vs backe by correction when wee are fallen away from him: ſo that the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrewes rightly ſaith that we are baſtardes,and not children if wee bee out of correction. Therefore wee are moſt frowarde, if wee cannot ſuffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that hee hath for our ſaluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betweene

the vnbeleeuers and the faithfull, that the vnbeleeuers as the bondslaues of a rooted & hardened wickednes, are made the worse & more obstinate with whipping: the faithfull, like children hauing an honest freedome of nature, do therby profit to repentance. Now must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in an other place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so wil make an ende.

7 Moreouer it is a singular comfort, when we suffer persecution for righteousnes. For then we ought to think, how great an honor God vouchsafeth to grant vs, that he so garnisheth vs with the peculiar mark of his souldiers. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousnesse, not only that suffer for defense of the Gospel, but also that are troubled for any defence of righteousnesse. Whether therefore in maintaining the trueth of God against the lies of Sathan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocentes against the wrongs of the wicked, we be driuen to runne into the displeasure and hatred of the worlde, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in daunger: let it not be grieuous or loathsome vnto vs to employ our selues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in those thinges in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Pouerty indeede, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: likewise banishmēt, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: Finally, death is the vttermost of all calamities. But when the fauour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicity. Therfore let vs rather be content with the testimony of Christe, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall reioyce as the Apostles did, when God shal account vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, and knowing our selues cleere in our consciences, are by the naughty dealing of wicked men spoyled of our goods: we are in dede brought to pouerty thereby among men, but so riches doe truely grow vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the household of God. If we be vexed & despised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If we be noted with reproches & shame, we are in somuch the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If wee be slaine, so is the entrie made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs bee ashamed to esteeme lesse these thinges, vpon which the Lorde hath set so great a price, than shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

When the cause of our suffering is righteousnesse it is not a crosse but a gaine to suffer.

Mat. 5. 15

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these & like admonitions giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defence of righteousnes, we are too much vnthankful if we do not gladly & cheerefully receiue them at the Lords hād, specially sith this is the kind of crosse, most properly belonging to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more grieuous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deathes: therefore Paul expresly admonisheth that we shal not onely suffer persecutions, but also reproches because we trust in the liuing God. As in another place hee teacheth vs after his example to walke through sclaunder and good report. Yet there is not required of vs such a cheerefulnesse as may take away all feeling of bitternes and sorrowe, Patience doth not extinguish the feeling of that bitternesse which is in trouble but vāquish the troublesome vexation which is felt.

2. Cor. 6. 8.

or elſe the patience of the holie ones in the croſſe were no patience, vnleſſe they ſhould be both tormented with ſorrow and vexed with griefe. If there were no hardnes in pouerty, no pain in ſicknes, no griefe in ſhame, no horrour in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to beare thē indifferently? But when euery one of theſe doth with the natural bitternes therof bite the hearts of vs all, herein doth the valiantnes of a faithful man ſhewe it ſelfe, if being aſſaied with the feeling of ſuch bitternes, how grieuouſly ſoeuer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly reſiſting he ouercommeth it, his patience vttereth it ſelfe herein, if being ſharply prouoked, he is yet ſo bridled with the feare of God, that he burſteth not out into any diſtemper. His cherefulnes appeareth herein, if being wounded with ſadnes & ſorrow, he reſteth vpon the ſpiritual comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithful do ſuſtaine againſt the natural feeling of ſorrow, while they ſtudy for patience & temperance, Paul hath verie wel deſcribed in theſe words. We are put to diſtreſſe in al things, but we are not made ſorowful: we labour, but we are not left deſtitute: we ſuffer perſecutiō, but we are not forſaken in it: we are throwen downe, but we periſh not. You ſee how to beare the croſſe patiently, is not to be altogether aſtoniſhed, & without all feeling of ſorrowe: as the Stoikes in olde time did fooliſhly deſcribe a valiant harted mā, to be ſuch a one, as putting of al nature of mā, was alike moued in proſperity and in aduerſitie, in ſorowfull and ioyfull ſtate, yea ſuch a one as like a ſtone was moued with nothing: and what haue they profited with this high wiſedom? Forſooth they haue painted out ſuch an image of wiſedom as neuer was found, & neuer can hereafter be among men: But rather while they coueted to haue too exact & preciſe a patience, they haue taken away all the vſe of patience out of mans life. And at this day alſo among chriſtiās there are new Stoiks, that reckon it a fault not only to grone and weepe, but alſo to be ſad & carefull. But theſe ſtrange concluſions do commonly proceed from idle men, which buſiyng themſelues rather in ſpeculation than doing, cā do nothing but breed vs ſuch new foūd doctrines. But we haue nothing to do with that ſtony Philoſophie, which our maiſter and Lord hath condemned not only by his word but alſo by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mēs aduerſities. The world (ſaith he) ſhal reioyce, but you ſhal mourne & weepe. And becauſe no man ſhould finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them bleſſed that mourne. And no maruell. For if al weeping be blamed, what ſhall we iudge of the Lorde himſelfe, out of whoſe body dropped bloudy teares? If euery feare be noted of infidelity, what ſhal we iudge of that quaking feare, wherwith we read that he was not ſléderly ſtriken. If all ſadnes be miſliked, how ſhall we like this, that hee confeſſeth his ſoule to be ſad euen to the death.

Iohn. 17. 20.

Luke. 22. 44.

The contrarie affections which are in godly afflicted mindes.

10 This I though good to ſpeake to this end, to cal godly minds from deſpaire, that they ſhould not therfore altogether forſake the ſtudy of patiēce, becauſe they can not put off the naturall affection of ſorrowe, which muſt needes happen to them, that make of patience a ſenſeleſſe dulnes, and of a valiant & conſtant man, a ſtock. For the Scripture giueth to the holy ones the praiſe of patiēce, whē they are ſo troubled with hardnes of aduerſities, that that yet they be not ouercome nor throwen down with it: when they be so pricked with bitternes, that they be also delighted with spirituall ioye: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe being cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancie abideth still in their heartes, that naturall sense eschueth and dreedeth those thinges that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godlinesse trauaileth euen through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods will. This repugnancie the Lorde expressed when he saide thus to Peter: When thou wast yong thou didst gird thy selfe and didst walk whither thou wouldest: But when thou art old, an other shall girde thee and leade thee whither thou shalt not be willing. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawen vnwillingly and resisting vnto it. Else his martyrdome shoulde haue but small praise. But howsoeuer he did with great cheerefulnes of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put off the nature of man, he was doubly strained with two sorts of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloudy death that he should suffer, being striken with horror therof, he would gladly haue escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that hee was called vnto it by the commandement of God, then conquering & treding downe feare, he gladly, yea and cheerefully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must indeuour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our minds be inwardly filled with so great a reuerence and obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinaunce all contrarie affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoeuer kinde of crosse we be vexed, euen in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly keepe patience. For aduersities shal haue their sharpenes, wherewith wee shalbe bitten: so when we are afflicted with sicknes, we shal both grone and be disquieted & desire health: so being pressed with pouerty, wee shalbe pricked with the stinges of carefulnesse and sorrowe: so shal we be striken with griefe of shame, contempt and iniury: so shal we yelde due teares to nature at the burial of our friendes: but this alway shalbe the conclusion. But the Lord willed so. Therfore let vs follow his wil. Yea euen in the middest of the prickings of sorrow, in the middest of mourning and teares this thought must needs come betweene, to encline our heart to take cheerefully the very same thinges, by reason whereof it is so moued. John. 21. 18.

11 But forasmuch as we haue taken the chief cause of bearing the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in fewe wordes define what difference is betweene Philosophicall and Christian patience. Truely very few of the Philosophers climbed to so high a reason, to vnderstād that the hand of God doth exercise vs by afflictions, & to thinke ỳ God is in this behalf to be obeyed. But they bring no other reasō, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yelde vnto God, because thou shalt trauaile in vaine to wrastle against him? For if wee obey God, only because we so must of necessity, thē if we might escape, we would cease to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first iustice and equity, then the care of our saluation. These therefore bee the Christian exhortations to patience, whether The difference betweene Christian and Philosophicall patience.

whether pouerty, or baniſhment, or priſonment, or ſhame, or ſickeneſſe, or loſſe of parentes, or children, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we muſt thinke that none of theſe thinges doeth happen, but by the will and prouidence of God, and that he doth nothing but by moſt iuſt order: For why? do not our innumerable & daily offẽces deſerue to be chaſtiſed more ſharplie: and with more grieuous correction, than ſuch as the mercifull kindneſſe of God laieth vpon vs? Is it not moſt great equitie, that our fleſh be tamed, and as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that ſhe doe not wantonly growe wilde according to her nature? Is not the righteouſneſſe and truth of God worthy, that wee ſhoulde take paine for it? But if there appeare an vndoubted righteouſnes in our afflictions, we cannot without vnrighteouſnes either murmure or wreſtle againſt it. Wee heare not now that colde ſonge: We muſt giue place, becauſe we ſo muſt of neceſſitie, but we heare a liuely leſſon & ful of effectualnes, We muſt obey, becauſe it is vnlawful to reſiſt: we muſt ſuffer patiently, becauſe impatience is a ſtubbornnes againſt the righteouſnes of God. But now, becauſe that thing onely is worthy to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our ſafety & benefite, the good father doth this waie alſo comfort vs, whẽ he affirmeth that euen in this that he afflicteth vs with the croſſe, he prouideth for our ſafety. But if it be certain that troubles are healthful for vs, why ſhould wee not receiue them with a thankfull and well pleaſed minde? Therefore in patiently ſuffering them, we do not forceably yelde to neceſſity, but quietly agree to our own benefite. Theſe thoughts (I ſay) do make that how much our minds are grieued in the croſſe with natural feeling of bitterneſſe, ſo much they bee cheared with ſpirituall gladnes. Wherupon alſo followeth thankeſgiuing, which cannot be without ioye. But if the praiſe of the Lorde and thankeſgiuing proceedeth of nothing but of a chereful and ioyful heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the ſame praiſing of God and thankeſgiuing in vs: hereby appeareth how neceſſary it is that the bitterneſſe of the croſſe be tempered with ſpirituall ioye.

The ix. Chapter.

The miſeries of this life muſt teach vs not to ſeeke our felicitie here.

BVt with whatſoeuer kinde of trouble we bee diſtreſſed, wee muſt alwaie looke to this ende, to vſe our ſelues to the contempt of this preſent life, and thereby bee ſtirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, becauſe GOD knoweth well howe muche we bee by nature enclined to the beaſtly loue of this worlde, he vſeth a moſt fitte meane to drawe vs backe, and to ſhake off our ſluggiſhneſſe, that we ſhoulde not ſticke too faſt in that loue. There is none of vs that deſireth not to ſeeme to aſpire and endeuour all their life long to heauenlie immortalitie. For we are aſhamed to excell bruite beaſtes in nothing: whoſe ſtate ſhould bee nothing inferiour to ours, vnleſſe there remaine to vs a hope of eternitie after death. But if you examine the deuiſes, ſtudies and doinges of euerie man, you ſhall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that ſenſeleſneſſe, that our minde beeyng daſeled with vayne gliſtering of riches, power and honors, is so dulled that it cannot see farre. Our heart also being possessed with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weighed down, that it cānot rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with intricements of the flesh seeketh her felicitie in earth. The Lorde to remedie this euill, doeth with continual examples of miseries teach this of the vanitie of this present life. Therfore that they should not promise themselues in this life a sound & quiet peace, hee suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vprores, or robberies, or other iniuries. That they shoulde not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitorie riches, or rest in the riches that they alreadie possesse, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to pouertie, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefits of Mariage, he either maketh thē to be vexed with the frowardnes of their wiues, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these thinges he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glorie, or immeasurably reioyce with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases & daungers set before their eies, howe vnstable, and vanishing be all the goods that are subiect to mortalitie. Then only therfore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublesom and innumerable waies miserable, and in no point fully blessed: and that all those that are reckoned the good things thereof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with many euils mixed with them. And hereupon we doe determine, that here is nothing to be sought or hoped for but strife: and that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleeue. That our minde is neuer truely raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnles it haue first conceiued a contempt of this present life.

2 For betweene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile in our sight, or holde vs bounde with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternitie, we must diligently indeuour to loose our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shew of pleasauntnesse, grace and sweetnesse, wherewith to delight vs: it is much behouefull for vs to be nowe and then called away, that we bee not bewitched with such allurementes. For what, I pray you, would be done if we did here enioy a continuall concourse of good thinges and felicitie, sith we cannot with continuall spurres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the miserie thereof? Not only the learned doe know, but also the common people haue no Prouerbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thing verie profitable to be knowne, they haue set it out with manie notable sentences. But there is nothing that we doe either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we goe about all thinges, as though we would frame to our selues an immortalitie in earth. If there be a corpes caried to buriall, or if wee walke among graues, then, because there is an image of death before our eies, I graunt we do maruel-lously wel discourse like Philosophers vpon the vanitie of this life. Albeit we do not ỹ continually, for many times al these things do nothing moue vs. But whē it happeneth our Philosophy lasteth but a while, which so soone as we turne our backs, vanisheth away, and leaueth no steppe at all of remembrance behind it: finally, it passeth away as clapping of handes vpon a stage at any pleasant sight. And we forgetting not only death, but also ỹ we be subiect to death, as though we had neuer heard any report therof, fal to a careless assurednes of earthly immortalitie. If anie man in the meane time tell vs of the Prouerbe, that man is a creature of a daies continuance, we graunt it indeede: but so heedlesly, that still the thought of euerlasting continuance resteth in our mind. Who therefore can denie, that it is a great profite to vs all, not onely to be admonished in wordes, but by al the examples of experience that may be, to be conuinced of the miserable estate of earthly life? forasmuch as euen when we are conuinced, we scarcely cease to stand amased with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it cōteined the vttermost end of good things. But if it be necessary that God instruct vs, it is our duetie likewise on our behalfe to harken to him when he calleth & awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the world we may with al our hearts endeuour to the meditation of the life to come.

We may not so despise the life which wee enioy in the vvorlde that the estimation of those good thinges which God doth bestovve vpon vs bee vnthankfully diminished.

3 But let the faithfull accustome themselues to such a despising of present life, as may neither engender a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulnes toward God. For this life, howsoeuer it is full of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckoned among the not slender blessinges of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefite of God in it, we are guiltie of no small vnthankfulnes toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithful a testimonie of Gods good wil, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their saluation. For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternal glory, his wil is to shew himself a Father vnto vs by smaller exāples: & these be the benefits ỹ are daily bestowed vpō vs. Sith therfore this life serueth vs to vnderstand the goodnes of God, shall we disdain it as though it had not a crum of goodnes in it? We must therefore put on this feling & affectiō, to reckō it among the gifts of goodnes ỹ are not to be refused. For though there wāted testimonies of scripture, of which there are both many most euidēt, very nature it self doth exhort vs to giue thāks to the Lord, fos ỹ he hath brought vs into the light of it, ỹ he grāteth vs the vse of it, ỹ he giueth vs all necessarie succours for the preseruation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we cōsider that we are in it after a certaine manner prepared to the glorie of the heauenly kingdome. For so the Lorde hath ordained that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heauen, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they shoulde not triumph, till they had ouercome the hard aduentures of the battell, and obteined the victorie. Then an other reason is, that wee doe by diuerse benefites beginne therein to taste the sweetenesse of Gods liberalitie, that our hope & desire shoulde be whetted too long for the receiuing thereof. When this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemencie, that wee liue this earthly life, for which as we be bounde vnto him, so we ought to be mindfull and thankefull: then we shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate thereof, to this end that we may be deliuered from too much greedinesse of it, wherevnto as I haue before saide, we are of our selues naturally enclined.

4 Nowe whatsoeuer is taken from the wrongful desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt indeed that they thought truely, that thought it best not to bee borne, and the next, to die quickly. For what coulde they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vnhappie and miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friendes, and solemnly reioyced at their burials, but they did it without profite, because being without the right doctrine of faith, they did not see how that may turne to good to the godlie, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their iudgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithfull in iudging of mortall life, that when they vnderstande it to be of it selfe nothing but miserie, they may resort wholly the more freshlie and readilie to the eternall life to come. When wee come to this comparison, then this present life may not onlie be safely neglected, but also vtterly despised and lothed in comparison of the other. For if heauen be our countrie, what is the earth els but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an entring into life, what is the worlde but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to bee drowned in death? If to be deliuered from the body is to be set in perfect libertie, what is the bodie else but a prison? If to enioy the presence of God is the highest sum of felicity, is it not miserable to lack it? But til we be escaped out of the worlde, we wãder abrode frõ the Lord. Therfore if the earthly life be cõpared with the heauenly life, doubtles it ought to be despised & troden vnder foot. But it is neuer to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subiection to sin, & yet that hatred is not properly to be laid vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must be so moued either with wearines or hatred of it, that desiring the ende of it, wee maie be also readie at the will of the Lord to abide in it, so that our weariesse may be farre from all grudging and impatience. For it is like a place in battell array, wherein the Lord hath placed vs, which we ought to keepe till he call vs away. Paul indeed lamenteth his state that he is holden bound in the bonds of the bodie longer than he wished, & sigheth with feruent desire of his redemption: neuertheless to obey the commaundement of the Lorde, he professed himselfe readie to both, because he acknowledgeth himselfe to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, eyther by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expedient for his glorie. Therefore if we must liue and die to the Lorde, let vs leaue to his will the time of our life and death, but so that wee bee still feruent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation therof, and despise this life in comparison of the immortalitie to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lorde because of the bondage of sinne.

This life is not simple to be lothed but in comparison of the life to come.

2.Cor.5.6.

Rom.7.29.

Phil.1.23.

5 But this is monstrous, that in steede of that desire of death, manie that boast themselues to bee Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at euerie mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckily and vnhappy.

Truely it is no maruell, if naturall ſenſe in vs doe quake for feare when we heare of the diſſoluing of vs. But this is in no wiſe tollerable, that there be not in a Chriſtian mans breſt the light of godlineſſe, that ſhould with greater comfort ouercome and ſuppreſſe that feare, howe great ſoeuer it bee. For if we conſider that this vnſtedfaſt, faultie, corruptible, fraile, withering and rotten tabernacle of our bodie, is therefore diſſolued, that it may afterward be reſtored againe into a ſtedfaſt, perfect, vncorruptible and heauenlie glorie: ſhal not faith compel vs feruently to deſire that which nature feareth. If we conſider that by death we are called home out of baniſhmẽt, to inhabite our countrie, as a heauenly countrie, ſhall we obtaine no comfort thereby? But there is nothing that deſireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that wee ought to looke vnto the immortality to come, where wee maie attaine a ſtedfaſt ſtate that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth verie wel teach, that the faithfull ought to goe cherefully to death: not becauſe they would be vnclothed, but becauſe they deſire to be newlie clothed. Shall bruite beaſts, yea and liueleſſe creatures, euen ſtocks and ſtones, knowing their preſent vanity, bee earneſtly bent to looking for the laſt day of the reſurrection, that they may with the childrẽ of God be deliuered from vanitie, and ſhall wee that are endued with the light of wit, and aboue wit enlightened with the ſpirit of God, when it ſtandeth vpon our being, not lift vp our minds beyond this rottennes of earth? But it pertaineth not to my preſent purpoſe, nor to this place, to ſpeake againſt this peruerſneſſe. And in the beginning I haue already profeſſed, that I woulde not here take vpon me the large handeling of common places. I would counſell ſuch fearefull mindes to read Cyprians booke of mortalitie, vnleſſe they were meet to be ſent to the Philoſophers, that they may begin to be aſhamed when they ſee the cõtempt of death that thoſe do ſhew. But this let vs holde for certainely determined, that no man hath well profited in Chriſt his ſchoole, but hee that doth ioyfully looke for the day both of death and of the laſt reſurrection. For both Paul deſcribeth all the faithfull by this marke, and alſo it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it wil ſet forth a ground of perfect gladnes. Reioyce (ſaith the Lorde) and lift vp your heades, for your redemption commeth neere at hand. Is it reaſonable I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of ſo great force to raiſe vp ioy and cheerefulneſſe in vs, ſhould breede nothing but ſorrow & diſcouragement? If it be ſo, why doe wee ſtill boaſt of him as of our ſchoolemaiſter? Let vs therefore get a ſounder minde, and howeſoeuer the blinde and ſenſeleſſe deſire of the fleſh do ſtriue againſt it, let vs not doubt to wiſh for the comming of the Lord, not onlie with wiſhing, but alſo with groning & ſighing, as a thing moſt happie of al other. For he ſhal come a redeemer to vs, to draw vs out of the infinite gulfe of euils and miſeries, & to leade vs into that bleſſed inheritance of his life and glorie.

2.Cor.5.1. Rom.8.19.

VVe cannot but be troubled in minde till vve turne our eyes from beholding the preſent face of thinges that are, vnto the conſideration of that which is to come. Rom.8.36. 1.Cor.15.19.

6 This is certainely true: all the nation of the faithful, ſo long as they dwel in earth, muſt be as ſheep appointed to ſlaughter, that they may be faſhioned like Chriſt their heade. Therefore they were in moſte lamentable caſe, vnles they had their mind raiſed vp into heauen, & ſurmounted aly is in the world, & paſſed ouer the preſent face of things. Contrariwiſe whẽ they haue once lifted their heads aboue al earthly things, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see them enioying quiet peace, if they see thē proud in gorgiousnes & sumptuousnes of all things, if they see them to flow in plentiful store of all delightes, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednes, if they sustaine reprochfull dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their couetousnesse, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they wil easilie vphold thēselues in such aduersities. For that day shalbe before their eies, whē the Lord shal receiue his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdome, when he shal wipe al teares from their eies, when he shal cloth them with the robe of glorie and gladnes, when he shall feed them with ỹ vnspeakeable sweetnes of his deinties, when he shall aduance them to the fellowship of his high estate: finally when he shal vouchsafe to interparten his felicitie with them. But these wicked ones that haue flourished in the earth, he shall throw into extreme shame, he shal change their delightes into tormentes, their laughing and mirth into weeping & gnashing of teeth, he shal disquiet their peace with terrible torment of cōscience, he shall punish their deintinesse with vnquenchable fire, & shal put their heads in subiection to those godlie men, whose patience they haue abused. For this is righteousnes (as Paul testifieth) to giue release to the miserable & to them that are vniustly afflicted, and to render affliction to the wicked that do afflict the godlie, when the Lord Iesus shal be reuealed frō heauen. This trulie is our onlie comfort, which if it be takē awaie, we must of necessitie either despaire, or flatteringly delight our selues with the vain comforts of the world to our own destruction. For euen the Prophet cōfesseth that his feet staggered, when he taried too long vpon considering the present prosperitie of the wicked: & that he could not otherwise stand stedfast, but when he entred into the sanctuarie of God, & bended his eies to the last end of the godlie & ỹ wicked. To conclude in one word then onlie the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the hearts of the faithful vpon the Diuel, flesh, sinne, and the wicked, when our eies are turned to the power of the resurrection.

The x. Chapter.

How we ought to vse this present life, and the helpes thereof.

BY such introductions the Scripture doth also wel informe vs what is the right vse of earthly benefites: which is a thing not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if wee must liue wee must also vse the necessarie helpes of life: neither can we eschew euen those thinges that seeme rather to serue for delight than for necessitie. Therefore we must keepe a measure ỹ we may vse thē with a pure cōscience, either for necessitie or for delight. That measure the Lord appointeth by his word, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certain iorney through a strange countrey, by which they traull toward the kingdome of heauen. If wee must but passe through the earth, doubtlesse we ought so farre to vse the good thinges of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doth not vnprofitably counsell vs so to vse this world, as though wee vsed it not: and to buy possessions with such a minde as they vse to bee shulde. But because this place is slipperie, and so slope on both sides, that it quickly maketh vs to fal, let vs labour to fasten our foot there, where we may stand safelie. For there haue beene some, that otherwise were good and holie men, which when they sawe intemperance and ryot continualhe to range with vnbridled lust, vnlesse it be sharply restrained, & were desirous to correct so great a mischiefe, they could find none other way, but suffered man to vse the benefites of the earth, so farre as necessitie required. This was indeed a godly counsell, but they were too seuere. For (which is a verie perillous thing) they did put streiter bonds vpon consciences, than those wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they expound necessitie, to abstaine from all things which a man may be without. And so by their opinion, a man might scarcely take any more food than bread and water. And some be yet more seuere: as it is read of Crates the Thebane, that did throwe his goodes into the sea, because if they were not destroied, hee thought that he should be destroied by thē. Many at this day, while they seek a pretence wherby the intemperance of the flesh in vse of outward thinges may be excused, and while they go about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnesse, doe take that as a thing confessed, which I doe not graunt them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitatiō of measure, but that it is to be left to euery mans conscience to vse as much as he seeth to be lawfull for him. Truelie I confesse that consciences neyther ought nor can in this point bee bounde by certaine and precise formes of lawes. But forasmuch as the Scripture teacheth general rules of lawfull vse, we must surely measure the vse according to these rules.

The vse of thinges which serue for this present life is neither so strict as some, nor so loose as others haue imagined.

God hauing made thinges not onelie for necessity but also for delight, there is no cause vvhy men for vvhome they are made, may not vse them as vvell to the one as the other.

2 Let this bee a principle: that the vse of Gods giftes swarueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the author himselfe hath created and appointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can keepe a righter way than he that shall diligentlie looke vnto this ende. Nowe if wee consider to what ende hee hath created meates, we shall find that he meant to make prouision not onelie for necessitie, but also for delight and pleasure. So in apparrell, beside necessitie hee appoynted an other end, which is comelinesse and honestie. In hearbes, trees, and fruites, beside diuerse profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and sweetnesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet woulde not reckon among the benefites of God that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that oyle maketh his face to shine, the Scripture would not echewhere, to set foorth his liberalitie, rehearse that hee hath giuen all such thinges to men. And the verie naturall qualities of thinges doe sufficiently shewe, to what ende and howe farre we maie vse them. Shall the Lorde haue set in floures so greate a beautie, as presenteth it selfe to our eies: shall he haue giuen so great a sweetnesse of sauour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it be vnlawfull either for our eyes to take the vse of that beautie, or for our smelling to feele that sweetnes of sauour? What? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more acceptable than other? What? Hath he not giuen to golde and siluer, to iuorie and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalles or stones? Finally, hath he not made many things commendable.

Our acknowledging with thankfulnesse that all good things are receiued at the handes of God, bridleth the excessiue abuse of meates, apparel, furniture, and all thinges needefull vnto life.

3 Therfore away with that vnnatural Philosophie, which in graunting vs of the creatures no vse but of necessity, not only doth niggardly bereaue vs of the lawful vse of Gods liberalitie, but also can not take place, vnlesse it first haue spoyled man of al his senses & made him a block. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence prouide a stay for the lust of the flesh, which if it be not brought into order, ourfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I haue said) defenders of it, which vnder pretence of allowed libertie do graunt vnto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all thinges are created for vs to this end, that we should knowe the author of them, and giue him thankes for his tender kindnesse towarde vs. Where is thy thankes giuing, if thou so gluttonously fill thy selfe with deintie meates or with wine, that thou eyther bee made senseles, or vnfit to doe the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by too great aboundance boyling in filthie lust, doth with her vncleannes infect thy mind, that thou canst not see any thing that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulnesse to God, if with costly gorgeousnesse thereof we both fall in admiration of our selues and disdaine other? If with the trimnesse and cleanlines of it, we prepare our selues to vnchastitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gainesse of our apparel? For many so giue all their senses to bodily delights, that the minde lieth ouerwhelmed. Many are so delighted with marble, gold & paintings, that they become as it were men made of marble, that they be as it were turned into metalles, & be like vnto painted images. The smel of the kitchen, or sweetnesse of saour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seene in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licentiousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, & that rule of Paul confirmed, that we be not too carefull of the flesh, for the lusts therof, to which if we grant too much, they boile out aboue measure and temper. Rom. 13. 14.

The light estimation of this present life, and the earnest meditation of immortality cutteth of the ouer great care which men haue of outward things.

4 But there is no surer nor readier waie than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heauenly immortalitie. For therupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vse this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that mary wiues, as though they did not mary: they that buy as though they did not buy, as Paul teacheth. The other, that they should learne as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderately. Hee that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not only the intemperance of gluttony in meat & drinke, & too much deintinesse, sumptuousnesse, pride, hautinesse, and niceneſse, in fare, building, & apparel, but also al care and affection that may either withdrawe thee or hinder thee from thinking of the heauenly life, or from studie to garnishe thy soule. But this was long agoe truely said of Cato: that there is great carefulnesse of trimming our body, and great careleſneſſe of vertue. And it is an olde proverb, that they which are much busied in care of their body are commonly careleſſe of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certaine forme, yet truely it must be 1. Cor. 7. 3.

subiect to this law, to beare verie litle with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon themselues with continuallie bent minde, to cut off all shewe of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine riotous excesse, & to take diligent heed, that they do not of helpes make to them selues hinderances.

A mind contented to vvant, and perſvvaded that it ſtandeth accomptable to God for things receiued, vvil euſilie moderate it ſelfe in the vſe of earthlie things.

5 The other rule shalbe, that they that haue but small and slender riches, maie learne to lack patiently, that they be not carefully moued with immeasurable desire of them: which patience they that keepe, haue not a litle profited in the Lords scholeas he that hath not at least somwhat profited in this behalfe, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to proue himself the scholer of Christ For beside this that the most part of other vices do accompanie ỹ desire of the earthly things, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doeth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which wil be ashamed of a poore coat, wilbe proud of a costly coate: he that wil not be content with a hungrie supper, will be disquieted with desire of a deintier, & woulde also intemperately abuse those deinties if he had them: he that hardly & vnquietly beareth a priuate and base estate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honours. Therefore let all them that haue an vnfained zeale of godlinesse, endeuour to learn by the Apostles example, to be ful and hungrie, to haue store, and suffer want.

Philip. 4. 12.

The Scripture hath also a third rule, wherby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the precepts of charity. For the scripture decreeth that al earthly things are so giuen vs by the bountifulnesse of God, & appointed for our commodity, that they may be as thinges deliuered vs to keepe, whereof wee must one daie yelde an account We must therefore so dispose them, that this saying maie continually sound in our eares, yelde an account of thy bailiwike. Therewithal let this also come in our mind. Who it is that asketh such an accoũt, euen he that hath so much cõmended abstinence, sobriety, honest sparing, & modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnes, pride, ostentation, & vanity, which alloweth no other disposing of goods, but such as is ioined with charitie: which hath already with his owne mouth condemned al those delightful things that do withdraw a mans mind from chastity & cleanesse, or do dul his wit with darknesse.

The conſideration of that vvherevnto God hath called vs, is the laſt rule and the beſt direction for the guidance of all actions vvhich are incident into this life.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth euery one of vs in all the doings of his life, to haue an eie to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is caried hither and thither, howe greedie his ambition is to holde diuerse things at once. Therefore that all thinges shoulde not be confounded with our folly and rashnesse, he hath appointed to euerie man his duties in seuerall kindes of life And that no man rashly runne beyond his bonds, he hath named all such kindes of life, vocations. Therfore euerie mans seueral kind of life is vnto him as it were his standing appointed him by GOD, that they should not all their life vncertainely wander about. And this diuision is so necessarie, that al our doings are measured therby in his sight, and oftentimes contrarie to the iudgement of mans reason & Philosophie. There is no deede accounted more noble, euen among the Philosophers, than

for a man to deliuer his countrey from tyrannie: but by the voice of Gods iudgement the priuate man is openly condemned that layeth hand vpon a tyrant. But I will not tarrie vpon rehearsing of examples. It is sufficient if we knowe that the calling of the Lord is in euery thing the beginning & foundation of well doing: to which he that doeth not direct himselfe, shall neuer keepe a right way in his doings. He may peraduenture sometime doe somewhat seeming worthie of praise: but whatsoeuer that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shalbe reiected: moreouer there shalbe no conuenient agreement in the partes of his life. Therefore our life shal then bee best framed, when it shalbe directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne rashnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawfull to passe beyond his bounds. He that shalbe a man of base estate, shal contentedly liue a priuate life, lest he should forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Again this shalbe no smal relieſe to cares, labours, greefes and other burdens, when a man shal knowe that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate wil execute his office: the housholder wil binde himselfe to his dutie: euery man in his kinde of life will beare and passe through the discommodities, cares, tediousnesse, and anguishes thereof: when they are perswaded that euery mans burden is laide vpon him by God. Hereupon also shall grow singular comfort, for as much as there shalbe no worke so filthie and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth and is most precious in the sight of God.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the iustification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I Thinke I haue alreadie sufficiently declared before, how there remaineth for men being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recouer saluation againe, what Faith is, and what benefites of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what fruites it bringeth foorth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is giuen vs by the goodnesse of God, and conceiued and possessed of vs by faith, by partaking of whom wee receiue principally two graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, wee may nowe in steede of a iudge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the seconde, that being sanctified by his Spirite, wee may giue our selues to innocencie and pureneſſe of life. As for regeneration, which is the seconde grace, wee haue alreadie spoken of it as much as seemed to bee sufficient. The maner of iustification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to vnderstande both howe the Faith by which alone wee receiue freely giuen righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good works: and also what be the good workes of the holy ones, whereupon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are first to bee throughly discussed, and so discussed that we must remember that this is the chief stay of vpholding religion, that we may be the more carefull and heedfull about it. For vnlesse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his iudgement is of thee: as thou haſt no ground to ſtabliſh thy ſaluation, ſo haſt thou alſo none to raiſe thy reuerent feare toward God. But ỹ neceſſitie of this knowledge ſhall better appeare by knowledge it ſelfe.

VVhat it is to be iuſtified before God, vvhat by vvorks, vvhat by faith, and that iuſtification conſiſteth of tvvo parts forgiueneſſe of ſinnes and imputation of Chriſtes righteouſneſſe.

2 But that we ſtumble not at the firſt entrie, (which we ſhould doe if we ſhould enter diſputation of a thing vnknowen) let vs firſt declare what is meant by theſe ſpeeches, Man to be iuſtified before God, To be iuſtified by faith or by workes. He is ſaid to be iuſtified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iuſt and accepted for his owne righteouſnes ſake. For as wickedneſſe is abhominable before God, ſo a ſinner cannot finde fauour in his eyes, in reſpect that he is a ſinner, or ſo long as he is accounted ſuch a one. Therefore whereſoeuer ſinne is, there alſo appeareth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iuſtified that is not accounted in place of a ſinner but of a iuſt man, & by reaſon thereof he ſtandeth faſt before the iudgement ſeate of God when all ſinners fall. As if an innocent be brought to be arrained before ỹ ſeat of a righteous iudge, when iudgement is giuen according to his innocencie, hee is ſaide to bee iuſtified before the iudge: ſo he is iuſtified before God that being exempt out of the number of ſinners hath God a witneſſe and affirmer of his righteouſneſſe. Therefore after the ſame manner a man ſhalbe ſaid to be iuſtified by workes, in whoſe life there is found ſuch cleaneſſe and holineſſe, as may deſerue the teſtimonie of righteouſnes before the throne of God: or he that with the vprightneſſe of his workes is able to anſwere and ſatisfie Gods iudgement. Contrariwiſe he ſhalbe ſaide to be iuſtified by faith that being excluded from the righteouſnes of works, doth by faith take hold of the righteouſnes of Chriſt: wherwith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the ſight of God, not as a ſinner, but as righteous. So wee ſimply expound iuſtification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we ſay that the ſame conſiſteth in forgiueneſſe of ſinnes, and imputation of the righteouſneſſe of Chriſt.

Proofe that iuſtification is take for Gods acquiting men from ſinne, and his imputing vnto the the righteouſneſſe vvhich is in Chriſt

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident teſtimonies of Scripture. Firſt it cannot be denied, that this is the proper & moſt vſed ſignification of the worde. But becauſe it is too long to gather all the places & compare them together, it ſhalbe enough to put the readers in minde of them, for they may of themſelues eaſily marke them. But I wil bring foorth ſome, where this iuſtification that wee ſpeake of is expreſſely entreated of by name. Firſt, where Luke ſaieth that ỹ people when they had heard Chriſt did iuſtifie God. And where Chriſt pronounceth that wiſedome is iuſtified by her children: hee doeth not meane there, that they doe giue righteouſneſſe, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world goe about to take it away from him: nor in this place alſo to make the doctrine of ſaluation righteous, which hath euer that of it ſelfe. But both theſe ſpeeches are as much in effect, as to giue to God & his doctrine the praiſe that they deſerue. Againe when Chriſt reprocheth the Phariſees, that they iuſtifie themſelues, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteouſnes by wel doing, but doe vainglorioufly ſeeke for the fame of righteouſneſſe, whereof in deede they bee voyde. They that are skilfull of the Hebrue tongue doe better vnderſtande the ſenſe of this phraſe: in which tongue they are not only called wicked doers, that are guiltie in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in danger of iudgement of condemnation. For when Bersabe saith that she and Solomon shall bee wicked doers, shee doth not therein acknowledge any offence, but complaineth that shee and her sonne shall be put to shame, to bee numbred among the reprobate and condemned. But by the processe of the text it easily appeareth, that the same word in Latine also, cannot otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signify any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that wee are now in hande with: where Paul saith, that the scripture did foresee, that God iustifieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man vnderstand thereby, but that God doeth impute righteousnesse by faith? Againe, when hee saith that God iustifieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefite of faith to deliuer them from the damnation which their wickednesse deserued? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when hee cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustifieth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and now maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he shoulde say, Who shall accuse them whome God acquiteth? who shall condemne them whose patrone Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing else, than to acquite him that was accused, from guiltinesse as allowing his innocencie. Sith therefore God doth iustify vs by the intercession of Christ, hee doth acquite vs, not by allowaunce of our owne innocencie, but by imputation of righteousnesse, that wee may be counted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selues. So in the 13. Chapter of the Actes, in Paules sermon: by him is forgiuenesse of sinnes preached vnto you, and euerie one that beleeueth in him is iustified from al those thinges, from which you could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. You see that after forgiuenesse of sinnes, iustification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for absolution, you see that it is taken away from the workes of the lawe, you see that it is the meere beneficiall gift of Christ, you see that it is receiued by faith. Finally, you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where hee saith that wee are iustified from sinnes by Christ So when it is said that the Publicane came iustified out of the Temple, we cannot say that he obtained righteousnesse by any deseruing of works. This therefore is said, that after pardon of his sinnes obteined, he was counted for righteous before God Hee was therefore righteous, not by approouing of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose saieth very well, that calleth the confession of sinnes a lawfull iustification.

4 But to leaue striuing about the worde: If we looke vppon the thing it selfe, as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truely Paul doeth expresse iustification by the name of acceptation, when he saith (Ephes.1.5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christe, according to the good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious sauour, whereby he hath accounted vs acceptable or in fauour. For the same is meant by it that is said in another place, that God doth freely iustify. In the 4. Chapter to the Romanes, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousnesse, and sticketh not not to say that it consisteth in forgiuenesse of sinnes. That man (said he) is called of Dauid a blessed man, to whome God accounteth or imputeth righteousnesse without workes, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen, &c. Truely he there doeth entreat not of one part of iustification, but of all iustification wholly. And he testifieth that Dauid in ỳ place maketh a definition of iustification, when hee pronounceth that they are blessed to whome is giuen free forgiuenesse of sinnes. Whereby appeareth ỳ this righteousnes whereof hee speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrarie to guiltines. But for this purpose, that is the best place where he teacheth that this is the summe of the message of the Gospel, that wee should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receiue vs into fauour through Christ, in not imputing sinnes vnto vs. Let the readers diligently wey al the whole processe of the text. For by and by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to expresse the manner of reconciliation, doutlesse he meaneth nothing els by the word reconciling but iustifying. And that which hee saieth in an other place, that wee are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, vnlesse we be accounted righteous before God, in him, and without our selues.

Osianders opinion concerning iustification

5 But where as Osiander hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiall righteousnesse, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousnesse, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkneth godly mindes, and bereaueth them of the earnest feeling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other things, it is woorth the labour to confute this doting errour. First this speculation is but of mere & hungrie curiositie. Hee doeth in deede heap together many testimonies of Scripture, to proue ỳ Christ is one with vs, & we one with him, which needeth no proofe: but because he keepeth not this bond of vnitie, he snareth himself. But wee which hold ỳ wee are made all one with Christ by the power of his Spirite, may easily vndoe all his knots. He had conceiued a certain thing very neare to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to conuey the substance of God into men. Hereupon riseth an other inuention of his that Adam was fashioned after the image of God, because euen before the fall Christ was ordained ỳ paterne of the nature of man. But because I would be short, I wil tarry vpon the matter ỳ I haue presently in hand. He saith that we are one with Christ. We grant. But wee denie that the substance of Christ is mingled with ours. Moreouer we say that this principle, that Christ is righteousnesse to vs, because he is an eternal God, the fountaine of righteousnes and the very selfe righteousnes of God, is wrongfully drawen to defend his deceits. The readers shal pardon mee, if I do now but touch these thinges that the order of teaching requireth to be differred into another place. But although hee excuse himselfe from meaning nothing els by the name of essential righteousnesse, but to resist this opinion that we are accounted righteous for Christes sake: yet hee plainly expresseth that hee is not contented with that righteousnes ỳ is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but faineth that we are substantially righteous in God, as wel by substance as by qualitie poured into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that not onely Christ,but also the Father & the holy Ghost doe dwell in vs, Which although I grant to be true,yet I say that hee wrongfully wresteth it. For he should haue considered the manner of dwelling, that is,that the father & the holy Ghost are in Christ,& as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him,so do we possesse whole God in him.Therefore all that hee saith seuerally of the father & the holy Ghost, tendeth to no other ende but to draw the simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances,whereby God powring himselfe into vs, doth make vs as it were a parte of himself. For he reckeneth it almost a matter of nothing,that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost,that we growe into one with Christ,& ý hee is our head & we his members, vnlesse his verie substance be mingled with vs.But in the father & the holy ghost(as I haue said) he doeth more openly bewray what he thinketh,euen this, that wee bee iustified not by the onely grace of the Mediator,& that righteousnes is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his person,but that we are made partakers of the righteousnes of God, when God is essentially made one with vs.

that

Osianders first errour, that iustifying righteonsnes is not a free imputation of holinesse, but an holinesse vvhich the substance of God remaining in vs doth vvorke.

6 If he did say no more,but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentiall conioyning made ours:and that not only he is our head, in that he is man, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is poured into vs: He should with lesse hurt feede himself deintily,& peraduenture so great a contention should not haue beene raised for this doting error. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke bloud hideth her many tailes,we must needes earnestly resist vnlesse we will wittingly & willingly suffer that righteousnes to be taken from vs,which onely bringeth vs confidence to glorie of saluation For in all this discourse, the name of righteousnesse, and this worde iustifying,extend to two partes: that to be iustified is not only to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to bee made righteous,that righteousnesse is not a free imputation but a holinesse and vprightnesse,which the substance of God remaining in vs doeth breath into vs. Then hee stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteousnesse in respect that being a priest hee did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appease his father towarde vs, but in respect that hee is eternall God and life. To proue that first point,that God doeth iustifie not onely by forgiuing but also by regenerating,he asketh whether God doeth leaue them whome hee doth iustifie such as they were by nature,changing nothing of their vices. The answere hereof is verie easie:that as Christ cannot bee torne in partes, so these two things which we together and ioyntly receiue in him,that is to say righteousnesse and sanctification,are inseparable. Therefore,whomesoeuer God receiueth into fauour, hee doeth also therewithall giue them the spirite of adoption,by the power whereof hee newly fashioneth them after his image.But if the brightnesse of the sunne cannot be seuered from the heate thereof, shall wee therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light,and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose,than this similitude, The sunne with his heate giueth life & fruitfulnesse to the earth,with his beames he giueth light and brightnesse. Here is a mutuall and vnseparable conioyning: yet reason forbiddeth to conuey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this con-confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osiander thrusteth in. For because God doth in deede renew them to the obseruing of righteousnesse whome he freely accounteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be all one & the selfesame thing. But the Scripture ioyning them both together, yet doth distinctly recken them, that the manifold grace of God may the better appeare vnto vs. For that saying of Paul is not superfluous, that

1. Cor. 1. 30. Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousnes and sanctification. And whensoeuer he reasoneth to proue by the saluation purchased for vs by the fatherly loue of God, and by the grace of Christ, that we are called to holinesse & cleannesse, he plainly declareth, that it is one thing to be iustified, and another to be made newe creatures. But when Osiander commeth to the Scripture, hee corrupteth as many places as he alleageth. Where Paul saith that faith is accounted for righteousnes to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iustifieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With
Rom. 4. 5. like rashnesse, he depraueth all the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, & sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euen nowe alleged, Who shall accuse the elects of God? it is God that iustifieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of guiltinesse and acquiting, and the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of contraries. Therefore Osiander is found too fond a babbler, as well in that reason as in alledging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doeth he speake of the name of righteousnesse, in saying that faith was accounted to Abraham for righteousnesse, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteousnesse of God and God himselfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appeareth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteousnes that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he receiued by faith the grace offered in the promise. Whereupon followeth, that in iustification there is no place for workes, as Paul verie well affirmeth.

Iustification graunted by Osiander to be through beleeuing, so that beleefe be taken for Christe vvich is beleeued.

7 As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that the power of iustifying is not in faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receiueth Christ, I willingly graunt it. For if faith did iustifie of it selfe, or by inwarde force, as they call it, and as it is alway feeble and vnperfect, it could not worke iustification but in part, so should the iustification be maimed, that should giue vs but a piece of saluation. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking do say that God onely iustifieth: and then we giue the same to Christ, because hee was giuen vs vnto righteousnesse: and faith we compare as it were to a vessel. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our soule to craue the grace of Christ, we cannot be able to receiue Christ. Whereupon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of iustifying, when wee teache that he is first receiued by faith, before that his righteousnesse bee receiued. But yet I doe not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister, when hee sayeth that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because gold is hidden in it. For the reason is not vnlike, but that faith although it be by it selfe of no worthinesse or price, may iustifie vs in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man ritch. Therefore I say that faith, which is only the instrument to receiue righteousnesse, is vnfitly mingled with Christ which is the materiall cause and both author and minister of so great a benefit. Now is this doubt also dissolued. How this word faith ought to be vnderstanded when we entreat of iustification.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goeth further: for he sayeth, that the inwarde worde is receiued by the ministration of the outward word, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthoode of Christ and the person of the Mediatour to his outwarde Godheade. As for vs, wee diuide not Christ, but wee say that he is the same eternall worde of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousnesse: and we confesse that otherwise hee could not haue fulfilled the office of Mediatour, and purchased vs righteousnesse, vnlesse he had beene eternall God. But this is Osianders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that hee was made righteousnesse to vs, in respect of his nature of Godheade, and not of manhoode. But if this properly belong to the Godheade, then it shall not bee peculiar to Christ, but common with the Father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousnesse of the one, and another of the other. Moreouer, that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conueniently sayde to bee made to vs. But although we grant this, that God was made righteousnesse for vs: how shall it agree that that which is set betweene, is made of GOD? Truly that properly belongeth to the person of the Mediator: which though he containe in himselfe the nature of Godhead, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is seuerally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But hee foolishly triumpheth in that one worde of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lorde Iehoua shal bee our righteousnesse, but out of that hee shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnesse, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In an other place wee haue rehearsed out of Pauls sermon, that GOD purchased to himself the Church with his bloud, if any man gather thereupon, that the bloud wherewith sinnes were purged was diuine, and of the nature of godhead, who can abide so foule an error? But Osiander thinketh that with this so childishe a cauillation he hath gotten all thinges, he swelleth, hee leaperh for ioy, and stuffeth many leaues full with his bigge words: when yet there is a plain and readie solution for it in saying that the worde Iehoua in deede when he is made the issue of Dauid shall be the righteousnesse of the godly: But Esaie teacheth in what sense, saying: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Let vs note that the father speaketh: that he giueth to the sonne the office of iustifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setteth the manner or meane as they call it in the doctrine wherby Christe is knowen. For it is a more commodious exposition to take this worde Daah knowledge passiuely. Hereupon I gather first that Christ was made righteousnesse when hee did put on the forme of a seruant: secondly, that hee did iustifie vs in respect that hee shewed himselfe obedient to his father: and that therefore hee doeth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhead, but according to the office of dispensation committed vnto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousnes, and we be made righteous by no other meanes but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappie disagreement estranged from his righteousnes we must needes come downe to this lower remedie, that Christ may iustifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

How Christ doth iustify as man, & how as God.

9 If he obiect that this is a worke of such excellencie, that it is aboue the nature of man, and therefore cannot be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I graunt: but in the seconde I saye that hee is vnwisely deceiued. For although Christ coulde neither cleanse our soules with his bloud, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs from guiltinesse, nor do the office of a priest, vnlesse hee had beene true God, because the strength of the flesh had beene too weake for so great a burden: yet it is certayne that hee perfourmed all these things according to his nature of manhood. For if it bee demaunded how wee be iustified, Paul aunswereth, by the obedience of Christ. But did hee any otherwise obey than by taking vpon him the shape of a seruaunt? whereupon wee gather that righteousnesse was giuen vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other wordes (which I maruaile that Osiander is not ashamed to alledge so often) he appointeth the fountaine of
Rom. 5. 19. righteousnes no where else but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knewe no sinne hee made sinne for vs, that wee might be the righteousnesse of God in him. Osiander with full mouth aduaunceth the righteousnesse of GOD, and triumpheth as though hee had proued that it is his imaginatiue ghost of essentiall righteousnesse: when the wordes sounde farre otherwise, that wee bee righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very young beginners should not haue beene ignorant that the righteousnesse of God is taken for the righteousnesse that God alloweth, as in Iohn, where the glorie of God is compared with the glorie of men. I knowe that sometime it is called the righteousnesse of God, whereof GOD is the author and which John. 10. God giueth vs: but though I say nothing, the readers that haue their sound wit do perceiue that nothing els is meant in this place but that wee stande vpright before the iudgement seat of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christs death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Osiander do agree with vs in this point that we are iustified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propiciatorie sacrifice for vs, which can not agree with his nature of Godhead. After which sorte, when Christe meaneth to seale the righteousnesse and saluation that he hath brought vs, hee setteth before vs an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. Hee doeth in deede call himselfe the liuely bread, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verilie meate, and his bloud is verily drinke. Which maner of teaching is seene in the sacraments, which although they directe our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they doe therewithall teach that the matter of righteousnes and saluation remaineth in his flesh. Not in that that hee is onely man, hee either iustifieth or quickeneth of himselfe, but because it pleased GOD to shewe openly in the mediatour that which was hidden and incomprehensible in himselfe. Whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set open for vs, out of which we may drawe that which otherise shoulde without fruite lie hidden in that close and deepe spring ỳ riseth vp vnto vs in the person of the mediatour. In this manner and meaning, I do not denie that Christ as he is God and man doth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the Father and the holye Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousnesse whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, is the eternal righteousnes of the eternall God, so that he yeld to the sure and plaine reasons that I haue alleaged.

10 Nowe that he should not with his cauillations deceiue the vnskilfull. I graunt that we want this incomparable benefite, till Christ bee made ours. Therefore we set that conioyning of the head and the members, the dwelling of Christ in our hearts, and that mysticall vnion, in the highest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the gifts wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not beholde him a farre off out of our selues, that righteousnesse may be imputed vnto vs, but because wee haue put on him, & are graffed into his body: finally because he hath vouchsaued to make vs one with him, therefore we glorie that we haue a fellowship of righteousnesse with him. So is Osianders slanderous cauillation confuted, where hee saith that we count faith righteousnesse, as though wee spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith empty to him, to giue roume to his grace, that he only may fill vs. But Osiander refusing this spiritual conioyning, enforceth a grosse mingling with the faithfull, and therefore hee odiously calleth all them Zwinglians that subscribe not to his fantasticall errour, concerning essentiall righteousnesse: because they doe not thinke that Christ is substantially eaten in the Lordes supper. As for me, I count it a great glorie to be so reproched of a proud man and giuen to his owne errours. Albeit he touched not me only, but also other writers well knowē to the world, whom he ought to haue modestly reuerenced. It mooueth mee nothing, which meddle not with mine owne priuate cause: and so much the more syncerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Where as therefore he so importunatly requireth essentiall righteousnesse, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this ende: First that God shoulde with a grosse mixture poure himselfe into vs, as he faineth a fleshly eating of Christ in the supper: secondly that God should breath his righteousnesse into vs, whereby wee may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteousnesse is as wel God himselfe, as the goodnesse or holinesse, or pureness of God. I will not spend much labour in wiping away the testimonies that hee bringeth, which hee wrongfully wresteth from the heauenly life to this present state. Through Christ (saith Peter) are giuen vs the precious and most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we were nowe such as the Gospel promised that we shal be at the last comming of Christ: yea Iohn telleth vs, that wee shall then see God as he is, because we shalbe like vnto him. Onely I thought good to giue a small tast to the readers, that I do of purpose passe ouer these trifles: not for that it is hard to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous work.

. Although vve be not iustified vnlesse Christ doe dvvell in our hearts, yet it is not the essentiall possessing of Christ as God vvhich doth iustify.

1. Pet. 1. 4.
1. John. 3. 1.

The earnest assurance of saluation enfeebled by Osiander taking the iustification vvhich is by righteousnesse imputed.

11 But in the second point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth ỳ we are righteous together with God. I think I haue already sufficiently proued, that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and fruitlesse, and of it selfe so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthily to be vnsauourie to sounde and godly Readers. But this is an vntollerable wickednesse, vnder pretense of double righteousnesse, to enfeeble the earnest assurance of saluation, and to carie vs aboue the cloudes, that wee shoulde not embrace by faith the grace of propitiation, & call vpon God with quiet mindes. Osiander scorneth them, that teach that this worde Iustifying is a lawe terme: because, wee must be righteous indeede And he abhorreth nothing more than to say, that wee be iustified by free imputation. But, if God do not iustifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paul, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himselfe, not imputing to men their sinnes? For, him that had done no sinne, hee made sinne for vs, that he might be the righteousnesse of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they bee iudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The maner how is declared, for that God iustifieth by forgiuing as in another place iustification is set as contrarie to accusation, which comparing of them as contraries, doeth clearely shewe that it is a phrase borrowed from the vse of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanly practised in the Hebrewe tongue, if hee haue a sober braine, that is ignorant that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Nowe where Paul saith that Dauid described the righteousnesse without workes, in these wordes, Blessed are those whose sinnes are forgiuen: Let Osiander answere mee whether this be a full definition or but half a one. Truely Paul bringeth not in the Prophet for a witnesse, as though hee taught that forgiuenesse of sinnes is but a parte of righteousnesse, or a thing that ioyneth with other to the iustifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousnesse in free forgiuenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whome God hath forgiuen iniquities, and to whome hee imputeth no transgressions. He doth measure and iudge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous indeede, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and saith, that this should be slaunderous to God, & contrarie to his nature, if hee shoulde iustifie them that in deede remaine still wicked. But wee must remember, as I haue alreadie saide, that the grace of iustifying is not seuered frō regeneration although they be seuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowen by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remnants of sinne, it must needes bee that they be farre otherwise iustifyed than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this latter point of reformation, God so beginneth in his elect, and throughout the whole course of their life, by litle and litle, & sometime slowly proceedeth in it, that they be alway before his seate in danger of the iudgement of death. But he iustifieth thē not by partmeale, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the pureneesse of Christ, appeare in heauen. For no portion of righteousnesse could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because wee be righteous in his sight without exception. Whereupon followeth, that the doctrine of iustification is misturned, yea, ouerturned from the verie foundation, when doubting is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken, whē the the free and dreadlesse inuocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall ioy is not stablished. Whereupon Paul gathereth an argument by contraries, to proue, that the inheritance is not by the lawe. For by this meane faith should be made voyde, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrowen, because none of the moste holy shall therein finde whereupon to trust. This difference of iustifying and regenerating (which two things Osiander counfounding together, calleth two sortes of righteousnesse) is verie well expressed by Paul: for speaking of his reall righteousnes in deede, or of the vprightnesse wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousnesse) hee lamentably cryeth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliuer mee from the body of this death? But flying to the righteousnes which is grounded vpon the onely mercie of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the electes of God whome he iustifieth? For I am surely persuaded, that nothing shall seuer vs from his loue in Christ. Hee plainly publisheth, that he hath the righteousnes which alone fully sufficeth to saluation before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did a litle before bewaile his estate, may not minish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glorie. This diuersitie is sufficiently knowen, & so familiar to all the holy ones, that grone vnder the burden of iniquities, & yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue al feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagreeth with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although hee clotheth the holy ones with a double righteousnes as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse ỹ without forgiuenesse of sinnes they neuer pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous in deede, are accounted righteous according to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But howe farre shall a sinner extende this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousnes? shal he measure it by the pound or by ỹ ounce? Truly he shal hang doutfull and wauering to this side and that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousnes as shalbe necessarie to stablish confidence. It is happie that he that would binde God to a lawe, is not iudge of this cause. But this shall stand stedfast, that thou maiest be iustified in thy sayinges and ouercome when thou art iudged. But howe great presumption is it to condemne the chiefe iudge when he freely acquiteth, that this aunswere may not bee in force, I will haue mercie vpon whome I will haue mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this ende that he should spare none, but that hee should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guiltie of offence. And wee do say that they which were lost haue their sinnes buried and so are iustified before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he can loue none but them whom he iustifieth. But this is a marvellous maner of iustifying, that they being couered with the righteousnes of Christ stand not in feare of the iudgement which they haue deserued, & when they worthily condemne themselues are accounted righteous without themselues.

The fond obiections which Osiander gathereth against them that hold a man iustified not by the righteousnesse which Christ worketh in vs as he is God, but which we haue in his death and resurrection as he is man.

mysterie which he braggeth that he wil not hide from them. For after that he hath long and largely trauailed to proue that we doe not obtaine fauour with God by the onely imputation of the righteousneſſe of Chriſt, becauſe this ſhould bee impoſſible for him to count them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vſe his own words) at length hee concludeth that Chriſt was giuen vs vnto righteouſneſſe, not in reſpect of his nature of manhoode but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteouſneſſe cannot be founde but in the perſon of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteouſneſſe not of man but of God, he doeth now binde vp his rope made of two righteouſneſſes, but he plainly taketh away the office of iuſtifying from Chriſtes nature of manhood. But it is good to ſee howe he diſagreeth. It is ſaide in the ſame place, that Chriſt was made vnto vs wiſedome, which belongeth to none but to the eternal worde. Therefore Chriſt in that hee is man is not wiſedome. I anſwere that the onely begotten ſonne of God was in deede his
Col. 2. 3. eternal wiſedome, but in Paules writings that name is giuen him in diuerſe wiſe, becauſe all the treaſures of wiſedome & knowledge are laide vp in him. That therefore which hee had with his father, he diſcloſed vnto vs: and ſo that which Paul ſaieth is not referred vnto the eſſence of the ſonne of God, but to our vſe, and is rightly applied to Chriſtes nature of manhood: becauſe although hee ſhined a light in darkeneſſe, before that hee did put on fleſh, Iohn. 8. 12. yet it was a hidden light till the ſame Chriſt came forth in ỹ nature of man, the ſhining ſunne of righteouſneſſe, which therefore calleth himſelfe the light of the worlde. Alſo it is fooliſhly obiected of him, that the power of iuſtifying is farre aboue both Angels and men: foraſmuch as this hangeth not vpon the worthineſſe of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to ſatisfie God, they can nothing preuaile, be-
Gal. 3. 13. cauſe they are not appointed thereunto. But this ſingularly belonged to Chriſt being man, which was made ſubiect to the law, to redeeme vs frõ the curſe of the lawe. Alſo he doeth ſlanderouſly cauil, that they which denie that Chriſt is our righteouſneſſe according to his nature of Godhead, doe leaue but one part of Chriſt, & (which is worſe) doe make two gods, becauſe although they confeſſe, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they ſay againe that we are not righteous by the righteouſnes of God. For although wee call Chriſt the author of life, in reſpect that he ſuffered death to deſtroy him that had
Heb. 2. 14. the power of death, we do not by & by take away ỹ honour frõ whole Chriſt as he was openly ſhewed God in the fleſh, but we only make a diſtinctiõ how the righteouſnes of God is conueied vnto vs, that we may enioy it. In which point Oſiander hath too fowly erred. Neither do we denye that that which is openly giuen vs in Chriſt, proceedeth from the ſecret grace & power of god: and we ſtriue not againſt this, that the righteouſnes which Chriſt giueth vs is the righteouſneſſe of God that proceedeth from God: but we holde this ſtedfaſtly, that we haue righteouſneſſe & life in the death & reſurrection of Chriſt. I ouerpaſſe that heaping together of places wherof he may well be aſhamed, wherewith he hath tediouſly combred the readers without choiſe & without common reaſon, to proue that whereſoeuer is made mention of righteouſnes, there ought to be vnderſtanded this eſſentiall righteouſneſſe. As where Dauid calleth vpon the righteouſnes of God to helpe him: whereas he doth in summe aboue an hūdred times, Osiander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other obiection, that that is properly and rightly called righteousnesse, whereby wee bee moued to doe rightly, but that God onely worketh in vs both to wil and to perform e. For we do also not denie, but that God reformeth vs with his spirite vnto holi- Philip. 2. 13.

nesse of life and righteousnesse: but we must first see whether he doe this by himselfe & immediatly, or by the hand of his sonne, with whom he hath left al the fulnesse of his holy spirit, that with his abundāt store he should supply the neede of his members. Moreouer, although righteousnesse come vnto vs out of the secrete fountaine of the godhead, yet it followeth not ỳ Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousnesse vnto vs according to his nature of godhead. No lesse fond is that which he saith, Ioan. 17. 19.
that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousnesse of God. Because vnlesse the will of his father had moued him, he could not himselfe haue satisfied the office committed vnto him. For though we haue in another place saide, that all the deseruings of Christ himselfe do proceede from the mere good will of God, yet that maketh nothing to that fantasticall thing, wherewith Osiander bewitcheth both his owne & simple mens eyes. For who would suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountaine & beginning of our righteousnes, therefore we be essentially righteous, & the essence of Gods righteousnes dwelleth in vs? In redeeming the church (saith Esay. 59. 17.
Esay) God did put on his righteousnesse as a harnesse: but did he so to spoyle Christ of his armor which he had giuen him, to make him to bee no perfecte redeemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeeme vs. Which thing Paul briefely expressed in other words, saying, that hee gaue vs salua Rom. 5. 23.
tion to the shewing of his righteousnes. But this doeth not ouerthrow that which he teacheth in another place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whosoeuer wrappeth vp a double righteousnes, that poore soules may not rest in the meere onely mercie of God, hee doeth in a Rom. 5. 19.
mockerie crowne Christ with thornes.

13 But forasmuch as a great parte of men, imagineth righteousnesse to be made of faith and workes, let vs first shew this also, that the righteousnes of faith and workes doe so differ, that when the one in stablished, the other must needes be ouerthrowen. The Apostle saith that he esteemed al things as dong, that he might winne Christ and finde in him the righteousnes that is of God by faith, counting not his righteousnes that which is by the lawe, but that which is by the faith of Iesus Christ. You see that here is also a cōparison of contraries and that here is declared that hee which will obtaine the righteousnesse of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousnesse. Therefore in another place he saith, that this was the cause of fall to the Iewes Rom. 10. 3.
that going about to establish their owne righteousnesse, they were not subiect to the righteousnesse of God. If in stablishing our owne righteousnesse we shake away the righteousnes of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousnes our own must be vtterly abolished. And he sheweth the same thing, when he saith, that our glorying is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Rom. 3. 27.
Whereupon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousnesse of workes, how little soeuer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glorie vpon. Nowe if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousnesse of workes can no wise be coupled with the righteousnesse of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the fourth Chapter to the Romanes, that hee leaueth no roume for cauillations or shiftes: If (saieth he) Abraham was iustified by workes, he hath glorie. And immediatly he addeth: but hee hath no glorie in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that hee was not iustified by workes. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when rewarde is rendered to workes, that is done of debt and not of grace. Therefore it is not of the deseruings of workes. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousnesse made of faith and workes mingled together.

Rom. 4. 2.

Not only the workes of men vnregenerate but also faithful mens deedes are excluded in the matter of iustification.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they haue a suttle shifte, that make to themselues sport & pastime with wresting of Scripture & with vaine cauillations. For they expound works in that place to be those which men not yet regenerate do only literally & by the endeuour of free wil without the grace of Christ: and do say that it belongeth not to spirituall workes. So by their opinion a man is iustified both by faith & by workes. So that the workes be not his owne, but the giftes of Christ & fruites of regeneration. For they say that Paul spake so for none other cause, but to conuince the Iewes, trusting vpon their own workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousnesse to themselues, sith the onely spirite of Christ doeth giue it vs, and not any indeuour by our own motion of nature. But they doe not marke that in the comparison of the righteousnesse of the law and the righteousnes of the Gospel, which Paul bringeth in in another place, all workes are excluded with what title soeuer they be adorned. For hee teacheth that this is the righteousnes of the law, that he should obtaine saluation that hath performed that which the law commandeth: and that this is the righteousnes of faith, if wee beleeue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreouer wee shall hereafter shewe in place fit for it, that sanctification and righteousnesse are seuerall benefites of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the verie spirituall workes come not into the account, when the power of iustifying is ascribed to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen nowe alledged) that Abraham had any thing whereupon to glorie before God, because hee was not made righteous by workes: this ought not to be restrained to the literall & outwarde kinde of vertues, or to the endeuour of free will. But although the life of the patriarch Abraham were spirituall and in maner Angellike, yet he had not sufficient deseruings of workes to purchase him righteousnesse before God.

Gal. 3. 11.

The schoolemens errour about the spirite and grace whereby man is iustified.

15 The Schoolemen teach a little more grosly that mingle their preparations: but these do lesse infect the simple and vnskilfull with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretence of Spirite and grace hiding the mercie of GOD which only is able to appease trembling consciences. But wee confesse with Paul that the doers of the law are iustified before God: but because wee are all farre from the keeping of the law, hereupon wee gather, that the workes which should most of all haue auailed to righteousnesse, doe nothing helpe vs because we lacke them. As for the common Papistes or Scholemen, they are in this point doubly deceiued: both because they call faith an assurednes of conscience in looking for reward at the hand of God for deseruings, and also because they expound the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousnesse, but the holy ghost helping to the endeuour of holinesse. Heb. 11. 6. They read in the Apostle that he which commeth to God, must first beleeue that there is a God, and then that hee is a renderer of reward to them that seeke him. But they marke not, what is the maner of seeking. And that they are deceiued in the name of grace, is plainly proued by their owne writings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iustification by Christ is giuen vs two wayes, Sent. li. 3. dist. 16. ca. 2. First (saith he) the death of Christ doth iustifie vs, when by it charitie is stirred vp in our hearts, by which we are made righteous. Secondly, that by the same death sinne is destroyed, wherby Satan held vs captiue, so that now he hath not whereby to condemne vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in iustification, to bee so farre as wee are directed to good workes by the grace of the holy Ghost. He would forsooth haue followed the opinion of Augustine: but he followeth him a farre off, & goeth farre out of the way from rightly following him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it, if there bee any thing in Augustine not verie vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Schoolemen haue still strayed from worse to worse, till with headlong fall at length they be rolled downe into a Pelagian errour. And the verie sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speaking is not altogether to be receiued. For though he singularly well taketh from man all praise of righteousnesse, & assigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, whereby wee are renewed into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

16 But the Scripture, when it speaketh of the righteousnes of faith, leadeth vs to a farre other ende, that is to say, that turning away from the looking vpon our owne workes, we should only looke vnto the mercie of God & perfection of Christ. For it teacheth this order of iustification, ỹ first God vouchsaueth to embrace man being a sinner with his meere and free goodnes, considering nothing in him but miserie whereby he may be moued to mercie, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked & voide of good works, fetching from himself the cause to do him good: then, that hee moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which dispairing vpon his owne workes casteth al the summe of his saluation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feeling of faith, by which feeling the sinner commeth into possession of his saluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospell that he is reconciled to God: that obtaining forgiuenes of sinnes by meanes of ỹ righteousnes of Christ, he is iustified: & although he be regenerate by the spirite of God, he thinketh vpon continual righteousnes layd vp for him not in the good workes to which he applyeth himselfe, but in the only righteousnes of Christ. When these things shalbe euery one particularly weyed, they shall giue a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in another order than they are set forth. But it maketh litle matter, so that they hang together in such sort that wee may haue the whole matter truely declared and surely proued.

The righteousnesse of faith spoken of in scripture turneth mens eies from their owne workes to the free goodnes of God, which pardoneth sinne, and causeth sinners to feele the mercie whereby they are pardoned and in Christ made righteous.

The difference which S. Paule to the Romans putteth betweene the righteousnesse of the Gospell and of the lawe, excludeth workes from that iustification which is through faith.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that wee haue before saide to be betweene faith & the Gospel: becauſe it is ſaid for this cauſe that faith iuſtifieth, for that it receiueth & embraceth the righteouſnes offered in the Goſpel. And whereas it is ſaid to be offered by the Goſpel, thereby all conſideration of workes is excluded. Which thing Paul declareth many times elſe where, but moſt plainly in two places. For, to the Romanes, comparing the law and the goſpel together he ſaith: the righteouſnes that is by the law is thus, the man that doth theſe things ſhal liue in them. But the righteouſnes that is of faith offereth ſaluation, if thou beleeue in thy heart & confeſſe with thy mouth the Lord Ieſus, and that the father hath raiſed him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the Goſpel, that the law giueth righteouſnes to workes, and the goſpel giueth free righteouſnes without help of workes? it is a notable place, & that may deliuer vs out of many hard doubtes, if wee vnderſtand that the ſame righteouſneſſe that is giuen vs by the goſpel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reaſon, why he doeth more than once with great ſeeming of contrarietie ſet the promiſe by way of oppoſition againſt the lawe, as if the inheritance be of the law, then is it not of the promiſe: and all the reſt in the ſame chapter to the ſame effect. Truely the law it ſelfe hath alſo her promiſes. Therfore there muſt needes be in the promiſes of the goſpell, ſomething different & diuerſe from the promiſes of the law, vnleſſe wee will confeſſe that the compariſon is very fond. But what diuerſitie ſhal this be, vnleſſe it be that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the onely mercie of God, whereas the promiſes of the law hang vpon the condition of workes? Neither let any man here carpe againſt me, and ſaye, that in this place the righteouſnes is reiected which men of their own force and free will woulde compell God to receiue? foraſmuch as Paul without exception teacheth that the law in commaunding profiteth nothing: becauſe there is none not onely of the common multitude, but alſo of the perfecteſt, that fulfilleth it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the lawe: when the Spirite of God frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cauſe of righteouſneſſe, but for that euen in the holy ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it ſelfe deſerueth no rewarde.

Rom. 10. 5.

Gal. 3. 18.

Rom. 8. 2.

The ſame difference to the ſame effect taught in the epiſtle to the Galathians, Gal. 3. 2.

18 The ſecond place is this. It is manifeſt that no man is iuſtified by the law before God: Becauſe the righteous man ſhal liue by faith. But the lawe is not of faith: but the man that doth theſe things ſhal liue in them. How coulde this argument otherwiſe ſtande together, vnleſſe we agree vpon this point, that workes come not into the account of faith, but are vtterly to bee ſeuered from it? The law (ſaith he) differeth from faith. Why ſo? becauſe works are required to the righteouſnes therof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteouſnes of faith. By this relation it appeareth that they which are iuſtified by faith are iuſtified beſide the deſeruing of workes, yea without the deſeruing of workes, becauſe faith receiueth that righteouſnes which the Goſpel giueth. And the Goſpell differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteouſnes to workes, but ſetteth it in the only mercy of god. Like hereunto is that which he affirmeth to the Romanes, that Abraham had nothing to glorie vpon, becauſe faith was imputed to him vnto righteouſnes, & he addeth a confirmation, becauſe

then there is place for the righteousnes of faith, when there are no workes to which a reward is due. Where be workes (saith he) due rewarde is rendered vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the verie meaning of the words that he vseth in that place serue to proue the same. Wheras he adioyneth within a litle after, that therfore we obtain the inheritance by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is receiued by faith: & howe commeth ỳ, but because faith without any help of works leaneth wholly vpō the mercie of God? And in the same meaning, without doubt he teacheth in another place, that the righteousnes of God was openly shewed without the law, although it haue witnesse borne of it by the law & the prophets: because excluding the law, he saith that it is not holpen by works, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come emptie that we may receiue it. Rom. 3. 21.

19 By this time the reader perceiueth with what equitie the Sophisters do at this day cauil at our doctrine, when wee saie, that man is iustified by faith only. They dare not deny that man is iustified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Onelie, is neuer expressed, they cannot abide to haue such an additiō made. Is it so? But what wil they answere to these words of Paul, where he affirmeth that righteousnes is not of faith except it be freely giuen? How can free gift agree with workes? And with what cauillations will they mocke out, that which hee saith in another place, that the righteousnes of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospel? If righteousnesse be manifestly shewed in the Gospel, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousnesse, but full and perfect. Therefore the lawe hath no place therein. And they stande vpon not onelie a false but also a foolish shift about this exclusiue word, Onlie. Doeth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onelie faith, that taketh all thinges from woorkes? What, I pray you meane these sayinges: that righteousnesse was manifestly shewed without the law: that man is iustified freelie & without the workes of the law? Here they haue a wittie shift to escape withall, which although they deuised it not themselues, but borrowed it of Origen & certaine of the olde writers, yet is verie foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall woorkes of the lawe, not the morall, are excluded. They profit so with continuall brawling, that they knowe not the verie first rules of Logike. Doe they thinke that the Apostle doted whē he alleadged these places to proue his saying? The man that shall do these thinges shall liue in them: and, Cursed is euery one that fulfilleth not all thinges that are written in the volume of the law. Vnlesse they be madde, they wil not saie that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatened onelie to the breakers of them. If these places be to be vnderstanded of the morall law, it is no doubt that the morall workes also are excluded from the power of iustifying. To the same purpose serue these arguments ỳ he vseth: because the knowledge of sinne was by the lawe, therefore righteousnesse is not by the law. Because the law worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousnesse. Because the lawe cannot make conscience assured, therefore also it cannot giue righteousnesse. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, therefore righteousnesse is not a rewarde of worke, but is giuen being not due. Rom. 3. 22. & 24. Gal. 3. 10. Rom. 3. 20. & 4. 15.

The doctrine carped at vvithout cause vvhich teacheth iustification by faith onlie excluding thereby vvorkes not onlie ceremoniall but morall also. Rom. 4. 2. Rom. 1. 17.

Gal. 3. 21. Because we are iustified by faith, therefore glorying is cut off. If there had beene a law giuen that might giue life, then righteousnes were truly by the law: but God hath shut vp all vnder sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleuers. Let them now fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of manners: but verie children woulde hisse out so great shamelesnesse. Therefore let vs hold this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of iustifying is taken awaie from the law.

Neither can vvorkes iustifie though they bee highlie esteemed because the value of them dependeth onlie vpon Gods allowance, neither doth loue giue vnto faith the force vvhereby it is able to iustify.

20 But if any man maruaile why the Apostle vsed such an addition, not being content with onely naming works: the reason is readie to be shewed for it. For, although workes be so highly esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousnes of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime anie reward as due vnto thē, but such as he hath promised? They haue therfore this of the bountifulnes of God, that they are counted worthie both of the name & reward of righteousnes: & they bee of value only for this cause, whē the purpose of him that doeth them is by thē to shew his obedience to God. Wherefore the Apostle in another place, to proue that Abraham could not be iustified by works, alleadgeth that the law was giuē, almost foure hundred & thirtie yeres after the couenāt made. Vnlearned men would laugh at such an argumēt, because there might be righteous workes before the publishing of the lawe. But because he knewe that there was no such value in works but by the testimonie and vouchsauing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing confessed, that before the lawe they had no power to iustifie. Wee vnderstand why he namelie expresseth the worke of the lawe, when he meaneth to take away iustification from anie workes because controuersie may be moued of those & none other. Albeit sometime he excepteth all works without any addition, as when he saieth

Gal. 3. 7.

Rom. 4. 6. that by the testimonie of Dauid blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousnes without works. Therfore they can with no cauillations bring to passe, but that we shal get this general exclusiue onely. And they do in vain seek that trifling suttletie, that we are iustified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousnes must stand vpō loue.

Gal. 5. 6. We graunt in deed with Paul, that no other faith iustifieth, but that which is effectually working with charitie: but that faith taketh not her power of iustifying from that effectualnes of charitie. Yea it doth by no other meane iustifie, but because it bringeth vs into the cōmunicating of the righteous-

Rom. 4. 4. nes of Christ. Or else al that which the apostle so earnestly presseth, should fall to nought. To him that worketh (saith he) the reward is not reckoned according to grace, but according to det. But to him that worketh not, but beleeueth in him that iustifieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousnes. Could he speake more euidently than in so saying? that there is no righteousnes of faith but where there are no workes to which any reward is due: and that onely then faith is imputed vnto righteousnes, when righteousnes is giuen by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is saide in the definition, that the righteousnes of faith is the reconciliatiō with God, which consisteth sisteth vpon the only forgiuenesse of sinnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth vpon all men, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esay excellently well set out in these wordes: The hand of the Lorde is not shortned, that he is not able to saue: nor his eare dulled that he cannot heare: but your iniquities haue made disagreement betwene you and your God, & your sinnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you not. We heare that sinne is the diuision betweene man & God, & the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing from his righteousnes to haue anie fellowship with sin. Wherfore the Apostle teacheth that mā is enimie to God til he be restored into fauour by Christ Whō therfore the Lorde receiueth into ioyning with him, him he is saide to iustifie: becausse he can neither receiue him into fauour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiuenes of sinnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himself be iudged by their works, they shalbe found stil sinners indeede, who yet must be free & cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous, but becausse they are cleāsed by hauing the spots of their sins wiped away by forgiuenes, that such a righteousnes maie in one word be called the forgiuenes of sinnes.

man and God: so that except it bee pardoned vs, wvee cannot be ioined vnto him.

Esa. 59.7.

Rom. 5.8.

22 Both these are most clearly to be seene by these words of Paul, which I haue alreadie alleaged: God was in Christ reconciling the worlde to himself, not imputing their sinnes to man, and he hath left with vs the word of reconciliation. And then he addeth the sum of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be made the rigthteousnes of God in him. Here he nameth righteousnes and reconciliation without difference, that wee may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousnes to be when our sinnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore doubt thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou heareſt that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing sinnes. So to the Romanes hee prooueth by the testimonie of Dauid, that righteousnes is imputed to man without works, becausse Dauid pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiuen, whose sinnes are couered, to whō the Lord hath not imputed his offences. Without dout by blessednes he there meaneth righteousnesse. As sith he affirmeth the same to stand in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of Iohn the Baptist singeth that the knowledge of saluatiō cōsisteth in the forgiuenes of sinnes. Which rule Paul following in his Sermō which he made to the Antiochians concerning the summe of saluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this manner: by him forgiuenesse of sinnes is preached vnto you, & euery one that beleeueth in him is iustified from all these thinges, from which ye coulde not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. The Apostle so knitteth the forgiuenesse of sinnes with righteousnes, that he sheweth that they be both all one. Whereupon he rightfully reasoneth that the righteousnes is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnes of God. Neither ought it to seeme a strange vnused speech, that the faithful are:

are righteous before God, nor by workes, but by free acceptation: sith both it is so oft found in the Scripture, and the old authors also doe sometime so speake. For Augustine sai h thus in one place: The righteousnes of the saints in this worlde standeth rather in forgiuenesse of sinnes, than in perfection of vertues. Wherwith agreeth the notable sentences of Bernard: Not to sin is the righteousnes of God: but the righteousnes of man, is the merciful kindnes of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to vs righteousnes in absolution, and therefore that they only are righteous that haue obteyned pardon by mercie.

Serm. 23. in cant. Ser. 22.

23 Hereupon also followeth this, that by the onelie meane of Christes righteousnes, we obtaine to be iustified before God. Which is asmuch in effect as if it were said, that man is not righteous in himselfe, but because the righteousnes of Christ is by imputation enterpartened with him, which thing is worthie to be heedefully marked. For that trifling error vanisheth away, to say that man is therfore iustified by faith, because faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so contrary to the doctrine aboue taught, that they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is no doubt ỳ he is void of his own righteousnes, that is taught to seek righteousnes without himself. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly whē he writeth ỳ he which knew no sinne was made for vs a propitiatorie sacrifice to cleanse away sin, ỳ we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. You see ỳ our righteousnes is not in vs but in Christ, & that it belongeth to vs only by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because wee possesse al his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the cōtrary that in another place he teacheth, that sin was condēned of sin in the flesh of Christ, that the righteousnes of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfilling, but ỳ which we obtane by imputatiō. For the Lord Christ doth in such sort communicate his righteousnes with vs, that after a certain marueilous maner, he poureth the force thereof into vs, so much as pertaineth to the iudgemēt of God. It appeareth that he did no otherwise mean, by the other sentence which he had spoken a litle before. As by the disobedience of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man we are iustified. What is it elſe to set our righteousnes in the obedience of Christ, but to affirm ỳ hereby only we are accounted righteous, because the obedience of Christ is imputed vnto vs as if it were our own? Therefore me thinks that Ambrose hath excellently wel shewed howe there is an example of this righteousnes in the blessing of Iacob. For as Iacob hauing not of himselfe deserued the preeminence of the first begotten son, hid himself in the apparel of his brother, & being clothed with his brothers cote ỳ sauored of a most sweet smel, he crept into ỳ fauor of his father, & receiued ỳ blessing to his own cōmodity vnder the person of another: so we do lie hidden vnder the precious purenes of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimony of righteousnesse in the sight of God. The wordes of Ambrose are these: Whereas Isaac smelt the sauour of the garments, peraduenture this is meant thereby, that we are not iustified by workes but by faith: because fleshly weakenesse hindereth workes, but the brightnes of faith which merciteth forgiuenesse of sinnes, ouershadoweth the errour of deedes. And truely truely ſo it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto ſaluation, it is neceſſary for vs to ſmell ſweetly with his odour, and to haue our faultes couered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That, to the end vve may be fully perſuaded of the free iuſtification, vve muſt lift vp our minds to the iudgement ſeat of God.

The cauſe of mens preſuming ſo much vpon the righteouſneſſe of their ovvn vvorkes is their not conſidering hovv exact purity it muſt be that ſhall anſvvere the lavv vvhen it commeth to bee ſtrictlie examined before the iudgement ſeat of God.

ALthough it appeareth by moſt euident teſtimonies, that all theſe things are true, yet we ſhall not clearely perceiue howe neceſſarie they be, vntill we haue ſet before our eyes thoſe things that ought to be the grounde of all this diſputation. Firſt therefore let vs remember this, that wee purpoſe not to ſpeake of the righteouſnes of a worldly iudicial court, but of the heauenly iudgement ſeate: that we ſhould not meaſure by our owne ſmal portion, by what vprightnes of workes Gods iudgement may bee ſatisfied. But it is marueilous to ſee with what raſhnes & boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea and it is to be ſeene howe none doe more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the ſaying is) prate of the righteouſneſſe of workes, than they that are either monſtrouſly ſicke of open outward diſeaſes, or bee ready to burſt with inward vices. That cõmeth to paſſe becauſe they think not vpon the righteouſnes of God, whereof if they had neuer ſo litle feeling, they would neuer make ſo great a mockery of it. And truelie it is out of meaſure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be ſuch & ſo perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but euery way whole & abſolute, & defiled with no vncleannes: ſuch as neuer was & neuer ſhal be able to be found in man. It is in deede eaſie and ready for euery man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthineſſe of works to iuſtifie men. But when they come into the light of God, ſuch dalliance muſt auoide, becauſe there is earneſt doing vſed, & no trifling ſtrife about words. To this, to this I ſaie, we muſt apply our mind, if we wil profitably enquire of true righteouſneſſe, how we may anſwere the heauenlie iudge whẽ he calleth vs to accõut. Let vs think him to be a iudge, not ſuch a one as our owne vnderſtandings doe of themſelues imagine: but ſuch a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whoſe brightnes the ſtarres ſhalbe darkened, by whoſe ſtrength the hils do melt awaie, by whoſe wrath the earth is ſhaken, by whoſe wiſdom the wiſe are take in their ſuttletie, by whoſe pureneſſe all thinges are proued vnpure, whoſe righteouſnes the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocẽt, whoſe vengeance when it is once kindled pearceth to the bottom of hel. If he (I ſaie) ſit to examine mens doings, who ſhall appeare aſſured before his throne? who ſhal dwel with a deuouring fire? ſaith the Prophet. Who ſhall abide with cõtinual burnings? he that walketh in righteouſneſſes and ſpeaketh truth, &c. But let ſuch a one come forth, whatſoeuer he be. But that anſweare maketh, that none commeth forth. For this terrible ſaying ſoundeth to the contrarie: Lord if thou mark iniquities, Lord, who ſhal abide it? truelie al muſt needs immediatlie periſh, as it is written in an other place: Shall man be iuſtified if he be compared with God, or ſhall hee be purer than his maker? Beholde they that ſerue him are not faithful, and he hath foūd peruersnes in his Angels. How much more shal they that dwel in houses of clay and that haue an earthly foundation, be consumed with mothes? they shalbe cut downe from the morning to the euening. Beholde among his Saintes there is none faithfull, & the heauēs are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abhominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquitie as water? I graunt indeed that in the booke of Iob, is mention made of a righteousnes that is higher than the keping of the law. And it is good to vnderstand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stand to the trial of that righteousnesse that passeth all senses. Therefore although Iob be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amased, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angellike holines can not appease God, if he exactly weigh their works. But I therefore wil at this time ouerpasse that righteousnes which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but onely this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the written law, we are more than senseleese if so many curses wherwith the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, aud among other this generall curse, Cursed is euery one that doeth not abide in all the things that are written in the booke. Finally all this discourse shalbe but vnsauory and cold, vnlesse euery man yelde himselfe giltie before the heauenly iudge, and willingly throw downe and abase himselfe, being careful how he may be acquited.

Iob. 15. 15

Howsoeuer we bee in comparison of other men, this in the sight of God is not able to make vs blameless.

2 To this, to this I say, we should haue lifted vp our eies, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainely to reioyce. It is in deede easie, so long as the comparison extēdeth no further than men, for euery man to think himselfe to haue somwhat which other ought not to despise. But whē we rise vp to haue respect vnto God then sodainly that cōfidence falleth to the groūd & cōmeth to naught. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heauen. For the sight of the eye, so long as it continueth in viewing thinges that lie neere vnto it, doth shew of what pearcing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then being daseled & dulled with the too great brightnes therof, it feeleth no lesse feeblenes of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, than it perceiued strength in beholding inferior things. Therfore let vs not deceiue our selues with vain confidence, although we count our selues either equal or superior to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose wil this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildnes can not be tamed with these admonitiōs, he wil answere to vs as he said to the Pharisees: you be they that iustifie your selues before men: but that which is high to mē is abhominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boast of thy righteousnes among men, while God from heauē abhorreth it. But what saie the seruantes of God that are truely instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, because euery liuing man shal not be iustified in thy sight. Another saith, although in somwhat diuerse meaning: Man can not be righteous with God: if he will contend with him, he shall not be able to answeare one for a thousand. Here we now plainly heare what is the righteousnesse of God, euen such as can bee satisfied with no workes of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thousande offences, we can not purge our selues of one. Such a righteousnesse had

fessed that he knew himselfe guiltie in nothing, but that he was not thereby iustified.

3 And not only such exãples are in the holy Scriptures, but also al godly writers doe shew that they were alwaie of this minde. So Augustine saieth, S Augustine and S. Barnard how far from looking to be iustified by their owne workes.
All the godlie that grone vnder this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weakenesse of life haue this onelie hope that wee haue one mediatour Iesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our sinnes. What saith he? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it onely, he leaueth none other. And Bernard saith. And indeede where is safe and stedfast rest and assurednesse for the weake, but in the woundes of our Sautour? and so much the surer I dwell therein as hee is mightier to saue. The worlde rageth, the body burdeneth, the diuel lieth in waite: I fall not, because I am builded vpon the sure rocke, I haue sinned a grieuous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shal not be ouertroubled, because I shall remember the woundes of the Lorde. And hereupon afterwarde he concludeth, Therefore my merite is the Lordes taking of mercie, I am not vtterly without merite, so long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also haue as many merites. Shall I sing mine owne righteousnesse? Lorde I will remember only thy righteousnes. For that is also my righteousnesse, for hee is made vnto me righteousnes of God. Againe in an other place, This is the whole merite of man, if hee put his whole hope in him that saueth whole man. Likewise where reteining peace to himselfe hee leaueth the glorie to God, To thee (saith hee) let glorie remaine vnminished: it shall bee well with mee, if I haue peace, I forswere glorie altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I loose also that which is offred me. And more plainely in an other place he saith: Why should the Church be catefull of merites, which hath a surer and safer way to glorie vpõ the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites we hope for good thinges, specially when thou hearest in the Prophet, I will doe it, not for your sakes, but for mine owne sake, saith the Lorde. It sufficeth for merite, to know what merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merite not to presume of merites, so to be without merits sufficeth to iudgement. Whereas hee freely vseth this worde Merites for good workes, wee must therein beare with the custome. But in the end his purpose was to make hypocrites afraide, that wildly range with licentiousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expounderh himselfe, saying. Happie is the church that neither wanteth merites without presumtion, nor presumptiõ without merites. It hath whereuppon to presume, but not merites. It hath merits, but to deserue, not to presume. Is not the verie not presuming a deseruing? Therfore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, hauing large matter to glorie vppon, euen the manie mercies of the Lorde.

4 This is the trueth. The exercised consciences perceiue this to bee the onely sanctuarie of saferie, wherein they may safely rest themselues when they haue to doe with the iudgement of God. For if the Starres that seemed seemed most bright in the night season, do loose their brightnes, with sight of the sunne: what thinke we shalbe come euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shal be compared with the pureneſſe of God? For that shalbe a most seuere examination, that shal pearce into the most hidde thoughtes of the heart, and (as Paul saith) shall reueale the secretes of darknes, and disclose the hidden thinges of the heart, which shall compel the lurking & vnwilling conscience to vtter all things that now are fallen out of remembrance. The diuell our accuser will presse vs, which is priuie to all the wicked deedes that he hath moued vs to doe. There the outward pompous shewes of good workes which now onelie are esteemed, shal nothing profit vs. Onely the pureneſſe of will shal be required. Wherefore the hypocrisie, not only wherby euerie man knowing himselfe guiltie before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherwith euery man deceiueth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shal fal downe confounded, howsoeuer it now be proude, with more than dronken boldnes. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may indeed for a short time sweetlie and pleasantly frame a righteousnes to themselues, but it is such a righteousneſſe as shall be by and by shaken away from them at the iudgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame doe vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shal earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnes, shal certainlie finde that all the works of men, if they be iudged by their owne worthines, are nothing but defilings and filthines: that that which among the common people is accompted righteousnes, is before God mere wickednes: that that which is iudged puritie, is vncleannes: that that which is reckoned glorie, is but shame.

1. Cor 4. 5.

That partiall and blinde affection which, because we beare vnto our selues when we are our owne iudges, maketh vs fondly to imagine that such we shall seeme also when God iudgeth vs, must be shake off. Pro. 21. 2. & 16. 2.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not grieue vs to descend to looke vpon our selues without flatterie or blind affectiō of loue, For it is no maruel if we be al so blinde in this behalfe, forasmuch as none of vs doth beware of the pestilent tenderneſſe toward himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs al. To euerie m̄ (saith Salomon) his owne waie is right in his owne eies. Againe. All the wayes of man seeme cleane in his owne eies. But what? Is he acquited by this blindnes? No, But (as he further saith in the same place) the Lord weigheth the heartes, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outwarde visor or righteousnes that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lorde with his ballance examineth the hidden vncleannes of the heart. Therfore sith we so nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our selues to our owne destruction. But that wee maie trie out selues rightly, we must necessarily cal back our conscience to the iudgemēt seat of God. For we do altogether needie his light to disclose the secret foldings of our peruerſneſſe, which otherwise lie too deeply hidden. For then and neuer til then, we shal clerely perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottennesse and a worme, abhominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednes as water is far from being iustified before God. For who shoulde make that cleane that is conceiued of vncleane seede? not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Iob saide of himselfe? If I will goe about to shewe my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: if I will shewe my selfe righteous: it will proue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onelie, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israel, that all went astray like sheepe, that euery one turned aside to his own way. For he there comprehendeth al thé, to whō the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnes of this examinatiō ought to proceede so far, til it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwne downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For he is deceiued that thinketh himselfe able to receiue the enioying of this grace, vntill hee haue first throwne downe all hawtinesse of minde. This is a knowen saying: that God confoundeth the proude, and giueth grace to the humble. Esai. 53. 6. 1. Pet. 5. 5.

6 But what waie is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needie and emptie, shoulde giue place to the mercie of God? For I doe not call it humblenesse, if we thinke that we haue any thing remianing with vs. And hitherto they haue taught a very hurtfull hypocrisie that haue ioyned these two thinges together, that we must thinke humblie of our selues before God, and that we must make some account of our owne righteousnes. For if we confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we doe wickedly lie vnto him: but we can not thinke as we ought, but that by & by al that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou heareſt in the Prophet, that there is prepared saluatiō for the humble people, and abacement for the eies of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no entrie open to saluation, vntil thou haue laid away al pride & taken to thee perfect humblenes: then, that the same humblenes is not a certaine modestie whereby thou giueſt ouer to the Lord a haire bredth of thine own right, as they are called humble before mé that do neither presumptuously aduaunce themselues, nor reprochfully triumph ouer other, although they stand vpō some estimation of their owne excellencie: but an vnfained submission of a mind throwen downe with feeling of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so echwhere described in the word of God. When the Lord saith thus in Zephanias: I will take away out of thee him that outragiously reioyceth, & I wil leaue in the middes of thee the afflicted man & the poore man, and they shall trust in the Lord: doeth he not there plainly shew who be humble? eueu they that lie afflicted with knowledge of their own pouertie. On the other side hee calleth the proude, outragious reioycers, because men ioying in prosperitie are wont to reioyce without measure. But to the humble whom hee purposeth to saue, he leaueth nothing but to trust in the Lorde. And likewise it is saide in Esaie: Whom shall I looke vnto, but to the poore and contrite in spirit, & him that feareth my words? Again: The high and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on high, & in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirit, to quicken the spirite of the humble and the heart of the contrite. When thou so oft heareſt the name of contrition, vnderstand thereby the wound of the heart, that suffereth not a man throwen downe on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of GOD bee aduaunced with the humble: If that be not done, thou shalt be brought low with the mighty hād of God to thy shame and disgracement.

The Publican a patern of true humilitie. Luk.18.3.

7 And our best Schoolemaster thinking it not enough to shewe it out in wordes, hath also set out vnto vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publicane that standing a farre off, not daring to lift vp his eies to heauen, with much knocking his breast, praieth in this wise: Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner. Let vs not thinke these to be tokens of fained modestie, that hee dare not looke vp to heauen, nor to come nerer, that with knocking his breast he confesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs knowe that they bee testimonies of inwarde affection. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee which thanketh God that he is not of the common sort of men, either an oppresser, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, because he fasted twise on the Sabboth, & gaue tithes of all that hee possessed. He doth with open confession acknowledge that the righteousnes which he hath is the gift of God: but because he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfauored and in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his owne wickednes is iustified. Hereby we maie see, how great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the heart cannot be open to receiue his mercie, vnlesse it bee first voide of all opinion of his own worthines. When this opinion hath possessed the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercie to enter. And that no man should doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidinges to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach libertie to the captiue, & deliuerance to them that were shut vp in prison, and to comfort them that mourne: to giue them glorie for ashes, oile for mourning, the robe of praise for the spirit of sorrow. According to this commissiō, hee calleth none but them that labour and are loden to take part of his liberalitie. And in an other place he saith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

Mat.9.13.

Both pride and carelesnes must be auoided.

8 Therefore if we wil giue place to the calling of Christ, let all arrogancie & carelesnes depart far away frō vs. Arrogācie groweth of a foolish persuasiō of our owne righteousnes, when a man thinketh himself to haue somewhat, by the deseruing whereof he maie be commended before God, carelesnesse maie be euen without any persuasion of workes. For many sinners, because being dronke with sweetnesse of vices they thinke not vpon the iudgement of God, lie as it were senselesly amased with a disease of drousines, that they aspire not to the mercie offered them. But we must no lesse shake off suche dull sluggishnesse, than we must cast away al vaine confidence of our selues, that we may without encombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empte and hungrie maie be filled with his good thinges. For we shall neuer sufficiently haue trust in him, vnlesse we vtterly distrust of our selues, we shal neuer sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first thrown downe in our selues. We shall neuer sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse we be first desolate in our selues. Therfore we be then meet to take holde of and obteine the fauour of God, casting away al trust of our selues, but trusting vpon the onely assuredneesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine saith) forgetting our owne deseruinges, we imbrace the gifts of Christ.

Be-

Because if he sought deseruinges in vs, wee shoulde not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very wel accordeth, comparing proud men to vnfaithfull seruantes, that arrogantly claime anie thing be it neuer so litle to their owne deseruings: because they do wrongfully kepe to themselues the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall wold say that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receiueth through a window. But, not to tarie longer hereupon, let vs take a short but a generall & sure rule, that he is prepared to take part of the fruits of Gods mercy, that hath vtterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of righteousnes, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteousnes. Because euery man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberalitie of God as he resteth in himselfe.

Ser. 15. in Can.

The xiii. Chapter.

That there are two thinges to be marked in free iustification.

AND here are alway two things to be principally loked vnto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lord his glory vnminished, & as it were wholly and perfectly maintained, and to our consciences an vntroubled quietnes & calme tranquillitie before his iudgement. We see how oft & how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to giue onely to God a confession of praise, when we entreate of righteousnesse. And the Apostle testifieth, that this was the Lords principal purpose of giuing vs righteousnes in Christ, ỹ he might shew his own righteousnes. And what a shewing ỹ shuld be, he declareth immediatly after: that is, if he alone be knowen to be righteous, & ỹ iustified him that is of the faith of Iesus Christ. Thou seest ỹ the righteousnes of God is not sufficiẽtly set out, vnles he alone be accoũted righteous, & do communicate the grace of righteousnes to them that deserue it not. By this meane he will haue euery mouth to be stopped, & the whole world to be made subiect to him. For while man hath anie thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somwhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth how much wee glorifie his name by reknowledging of our own wickednesse. You shall remember (saith he) the waies and all the wicked doings wherewith ye haue beene defiled. And ye shal be displeased with your selues in your own sight, in al the euils that ye haue committed. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall doe good to you for mine own names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these thinges be contained in the true knowledge of God, that wee being broosed with knowledge of our own iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs whereas we be vnworthy thereof: why then doe we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lorde any parcel be it neuer so smal of the praise of his free goodnes? Likewise Ieremie, when hee crieth out, Let not the wise man glorie in his wisedom, or the rich man in his riches, or the strong man in his strẽgth, but let him that glorieth, glorie in the Lord: doth he not there declare ỹ somwhat is diminished from Gods glory, if mã glory in himselfe? To this purpose truely doth Paul apply those wordes, when he teacheth that all the partes of our saluation are reposed in Christ, that wee shoulde not glorie but in the Lorde. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darkeneth his glorie, whosoeuer thinketh that he hath any thing be it neuer ſo little of his owne.

VVhat it is not to glorie in our ſelues.
Rom. 2. 19.
Eſay. 45. 25.

2 This is the truth, we neuer truly glory in him, vnleſſe we be vtterly put from our owne glorie. On the other ſide, this is to be holden for a catholike principle, that al they glorie againſt God that glorie in thẽſelues. For Paul iudgeth that onely by this meane the world is made ſubiect to God, whẽ al matter to glorie vpon is vtterly taken from men. Therefore Eſay, when hee declareth that Iſraell ſhall haue their iuſtification in God, ſaith alſo that they ſhall there alſo haue their praiſe: as though hee ſhould ſay, that the Lorde to this end iuſtifieth the elect that they ſhould glorie in him and in nothing elſe. But how we ought to be praiſed in the Lorde, hee had taught in the verſe next before: that is, that we ſhould ſwear that our righteouſneſſes and ſtrength are in the Lord. Note that there is not required a bare confeſſion, but confirmed with an oth, that a man ſhoulde not thinke that hee ſhall be diſcharged with I wote not what fained humilitie. And let no man here alleage for excuſe that he doth not glory when without arrogance he reknowledgeth his owne righteouſneſſe: for there can be no ſuch eſtimatiõ but it engendreth confidence, nor cõfidence but it breedeth glorie. Therfore let vs remember that in all the diſputation of righteouſneſſe wee muſt haue regarde to this end, that the praiſe thereof remaine with the Lorde whole and perfect. Foraſmuch as for declaration of his righteouſnes (as the Apoſtle teſtifieth) he hath poured out his grace vpon vs, that he might bee iuſt and iuſtifying him that is of the faith of Chriſt. Wherefore in another place, whẽ he had taught that the Lord gaue vs ſaluatiõ, to ſet out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeting the ſame thing he addeth: yee are ſaued by grace and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none ſhoulde glory. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of ſaluatiõ that wee ſhould declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darknes into his maruelous light, without doubt his meaning is ſo to make the only praiſes of God to ſound in the eares of the faithfull, that they ſhoulde with deep ſilence oppreſſe all arrogancie of the fleſhe. In a ſumme, man can not without robbery of God chalenge to himſelf any one crum of righteouſnes: becauſe euẽ ſo much is plucked & taken away from the glory of Gods righteouſneſſe.

Rom. 3. 26.
Ephe. 1. 2.
Ephe. 1. 8.

The opinion of righteouſneſſe by our owne vvorks troubleth the conſcience and bereaueth vs of all trãquilitie of minde.
Pro. 20. 9.

3 Now if we ask by what mean the cõſcience may be quieted before God, we ſhall finde no other meane but if free righteouſneſſe bee giuen vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway thinke vpon this ſaying of Salomon, Who ſhall ſay: I haue cleanſed my heart, I am made cleane from my ſinne? Truely there is no man that ſhall not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthineſſe. Therefore let euen the perfecteſt man deſcende into his owne conſcience, and cal his doinges to account: what end ſhall he haue? Shall he ſweetly reſt as though all thinges were in good order betweene him and God? and ſhall hee not rather be vexed with terrible tormentes, when he ſhal feele matter of damnation abiding in himſelfe if he be iudged according to his woorkes? The conſcience if it look vpon God, muſt of neceſſitie either haue aſſured peace with his iudgement, or be beſieged with the terrours of hel. Therefore wee profit nothing in diſputing of righteouſnes vnleſſe we ſtabliſh ſuch a righteouſnes, with the ſtedfaſtneſſe wherof our ſoule may be ſtayed in the iudge-

ment of God. Whē our ſoule ſhall haue wherby it maye both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receiue his iudgement, vnſhaken, then and not till then let vs know that we haue found an vnfained righteouſnes. Therefore not without cauſe the Apoſtle ſtandeth ſo much vpō this point, with whoſe words I had rather expreſſe it than with mine own. If (ſaith he) the promiſe of inheritaunce be of the lawe, faith is made voide, the promiſe is made aboliſhed. Hee firſt inferreth that faith is diſanulled and made void if the promiſe of righteouſnes haue reſpect to the deſeruings of our works, or doe hang vpon the keeping of the law. For ſo could neuer any man aſſuredly reſt in it: becauſe it coulde neuer come to paſſe that anye man might aſſuredly determine with him ſelfe that he had ſatisfied the law, as indeede neuer anie man doeth by woorkes fullie ſatisfie it. Whereof, that we ſhould not neede to ſecke far for teſtimonies to proue it, euerie man maie be a witneſſe to himſelfe that will with a right eie behold himſelfe And hereby appeareth, in how deepe and darke corners hypocriſie buried the mindes of men, while they ſo careleſly beare with themſelues, that they ſticke not to ſet their owne flatteries againſt the iudgemēt of God, as though they wold bind to a ſtay his iudiciall proceeding. But the faithful that do ſyncerely examine themſelues, are grieued and tormented with a farre other maner of carefulnes. Therefore there ſhoulde ſo enter into all mindes a doubting, and at length a verie deſpaire where ech man for himſelfe ſhould make account, with how great a burden of debt he is ſtill ouerpreſſed, & how far he is from the condition wherwith he is charged. Lo, how faith is by this mean alreadie expreſſed & extinguiſhed. For to wauer, to varie, to be carried vp & down, to ſtick faſt in doubting, to be holden in ſuſpēſe, to ſtagger, & at lēgth to deſpaire, is not to truſt: but to ſtrengthē thy mind with cōſtant certainty and perfect aſſurednes, & to haue whereupon to reſt and faſten thy foote. Rom. 4. 14.

4 He adioyneth alſo an other thing, that is, that the promiſe ſhall thereby be made of no effect and voide. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang vpon our deſeruing, when ſhal we come thus far as to deſerue the bountifulnes of God? Alſo this ſecond point hangeth vpon the former: For the promiſe ſhall not be fulfilled but to them that beleeue it. Therefore if faith bee fallen, there ſhall remaine no force of the promiſe. Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to ſtabiſhe the promiſe. For it is aboundantly wel ſtabliſhed when it reſteth vpon the onlie mercie of God: becauſe his mercie & truth are with a perpetual knot ioyned together, that is to ſay, whatſoeuer God mercifully promiſeth, he alſo faithfully performeth. So Dauid before that he required ſaluation by the word of God firſt determineth the cauſe therof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (ſaith he) come vnto me, thy ſaluation according to thy word. And rightfully: becauſe God is by no other meane perſwaded to make the promiſe but of his owne meere mercie. Therfore we muſt herein ſtay, and deeply faſten al our hope and not to looke to our owne woorkes, to ſeeke anye helpe of them. And that you ſhoulde not thinke that I heerein ſpeake anie new thing: Auguſtine doth alſo teache that wee ought ſo to doe. Chriſt (ſaith hee) ſhall reigne for euer in his ſeruauntes, GOD hath promiſed it. God hath ſaide it and if that bee not enough, GOD hath ſworne it.

To reſt vpon the vvorthineſſe of our ovvne vvorkes, is to make the promiſes of God vneffectuall.

Pſal. 119. 76.

In Pſal. 88. tractatu priore.

Therefore forasmuche as the promise is stablished, not according to our deseruings, but according to his mercy, no man ought to speake fearfully of ỹ of which he can not dout. Bernard also saith: The disciples of Christ say, Who cā be saued? But he answered, this is impossible with men, but it is not impossible with God. This is al our cōfidēce, this is our only cōfort, this is ỹ whole ground of our hope, but being assured of the possibility, what saie we of his wil? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of loue or hatred: Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath beene his counseller? Here nowe faith must of necessitie helpe vs, here must his truth succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be reueiled by the Spirite, and his Spirite testifying it may perswade our heartes that wee are the sonnes of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and iustifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternal predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefely let vs thus conclude The Scripture declareth that the promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of conscience: and whersoeuer there is any doubting or vncertaintie it pronounceth that they be voide. Againe it pronounceth that they doe nothing but stagger and wauer, if they rest vpon our owne workes. Therefore wee must needes either loose righteousnesse, or we must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift vp her eares & shut her eyes, that is to say, to bee heedefully bent to the promise onely, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse or deseruing. So is that notable prophecie of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednes of the land shal be done away, a man shal call his friend vnder his vine and vnder his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that the faithfull do no otherwise enioy true peace but after obteining of the forgiuenes of sinnes. For this cauillation is to be remembred in the Prophets, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outward blessinges of God as figures of the spiritual things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace & our peace, because he appeaseth al the troublesome motions of conscience. If we seek by what meane he doth it, we must needs come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For he shal neuer ceasse to tremble for feare that shal not determine that God is appeased by the only satisfactory cleāsing wherein Christ hath sustained his wrath. Finally peace is no where els to be sought for but in the terrors of Christ our redeemer.

Upon these two promises that we ought to ascribe all glorie vnto God, and seek the assurance of our owne harts, which we cannot do as long as we seeke righteousnesse in our owne workes, it followeth that to be iustified by faith, is not as some imagine to be iust by liuing according to that spirit which the faithfull haue receiued.

5 But why doe I vse so darke a testimonie? Paul euery where denieth that there is peace or quiet ioy left to consciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be iustified by faith. And he therewithal declareth whence that assuredneſse commeth, namely when the loue of God is powred into our heartes by the holie Ghost: as if he had saide, that our consciences cannot otherwise be quieted, vnles we be certainly perswaded that we please God. Whereupon also in another place he crieth out in the person of al the godlie, Who shal seuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because wee shal tremble euen at euerie litle breath, til we be arriued into the hauen: but we shall be without care euen in the darkenesse of death, so long as the Lorde shall shewe himselfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoeuer prate that we are iustified by faith, because being regenerate we are iust by liuing spiritually: they neuer tasted the sweetnesse of grace, to consider that God wil be mercifull vnto them. Whereupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turkes and whatsoeuer other prophane Nations. For (as Paul witnesseth) it is no true faith vnlesse it teach & put vs in mind of that most sweet name of Father, yea vnlesse it open our mouth freely to cry out Abba father. Which in another place he more plainly expresseth, where he saith that in Christ we haue boldnes and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truely this commeth not to passe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it conteineth in it self manifold matter of doubting. Wherfore we must of necessitie come to this remedie, that the faithful should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritance of the heauenly kingdome, but because being graffed into the body of Christ they are freely accoûted righteous. For as touching iustification, faith is a thing meerely passiue, bringing nothing of our owne to the recouering of the fauour of God, but receiuing of Christ that which we want. Psal. 23. 4. Gal. 4. 6.

The xiiij. Chapter.

What is the beginning of iustification, and the continual proceedings thereof.

THat the matter maie be made more plaine, let vs searche, what may be the righteousnes of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make foure degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatrie: or beeing entred into profession by sacramentes, denying God with vncleannesse of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Christes no further than in name: or they bee hypocrites, which couer the wickednesse of their heartes, with vaine deceitfull colours: or being regenerate by the spirite of God, they endeuour thēselues to true holinesse. Specially when they are to be iudged by their naturall gifts, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be found one sparcle of goodnes, vnlesse peraduenture we wil accuse the Scripture of falshood, when it setteth out al the sons of Adam with these titles that they be of froward and stubborne heart, that al the imagination of their heart is euil from their infancie, that their thoughts be vain, that they haue not the feare of God before their eies, that none of them vnderstandeth or seeketh God, briefly that they be flesh, by which worde are vnderstanded all those workes which Paul rehearseth, fornication, vncleannesse, vnchastitie, riotousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witchcraftes, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissentions, sectes, enuies, manslaughters, and whatsoeuer filthinesse and abhomination may be deuised. This forsooth is the worthines, with confidence whereof they must be proud. But if anye among them excell with such honestie of manners as may haue some shewe of holinesse among men: yet because wee knowe that God regardeth not the outward glistering, we must search the verie fountaine of works if we wil haue them to auaile anie thing to righteousnesse. We must (I say) throughly looke into them, from what affection of heart these workes proceede. But although Foure sortes of men whose workes are in this question to be considered of: the first such as are not at all indued with any true knowledge of God.

here lieth open a moſt large field to diſcourſe in, yet becauſe the matter may be declared in verie fewe wordes, I wil follow as much as I may a briefnes in teaching.

The vertues of vnbeleeuers God both vvorketh & revvardeth.

2 Firſt I deny not that whatſoeuer excellent gifts appeare in the vnbeleeuers, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I ſo differ from cõmon iudgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betweene the iuſtice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, & the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betweene the filthie luſtes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continencie of Veſpaſian: and (that we may not tarrie vpon ſome ſpecial vertues or vices) betweene the obſeruing and the deſpiſing of right and lawes For there is ſo great difference of right & wrong, that it appeareth euen in the dead image thereof. For what thing ſhal there remaine wel ordered in the world, if we cõfound theſe together? Therefore ſuch a difference betweene honeſt & vnhoneſt doings, the Lord hath not onely engrauen in the mindes of all men, but alſo doeth oft confirme it with the diſpenſation of his prouidence. For wee ſee how he extendeth many bleſſings of this preſent life to them that among men do follow vertue. Not bicauſe that outward image of vertue deſerueth ſo much as the leaſt benefit of his: but ſo it pleaſeth him to declare by proofe howe much true righteouſnes pleaſeth him, when he ſuffereth euen outward & fained righteouſnes not to be without rewarde. Whereupon followeth that which we euen now confeſſed, that theſe vertues ſuch as they be, or rather images of vertues are the giftes of God, for aſmuch as there is nothing in any wiſe praiſe worthie, which proceedeth not from him.

There is a punishable vvickednesse in the greatest righteousnesse of vnbeleeuers. Lib. 4 cont Julianum.

3 But neuertheles it is true which Auguſtine writeth, that all they that are ſtrangers from the true religion of the one God, howſoeuer they be accounted worthie of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthy of no reward, but rather are worthie of puniſhment, becauſe they doe with defiling of their hart, beſpot the pure good things of God. For though they be the inſtruments of God to preſerue the fellowſhip of men with iuſtice, continencie, temperance of mind, valiantnes, & wiſedome: yet they do very euilly execute theſe good workes of God: becauſe they are reſtrained from euil doing, not by ſyncere loue of goodnes, but either by only ambitiõ, or by loue of themſelues, or by ſome other crooked affection. Whereas therfore they are corrupt by the very vncleannes of heart, as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckoned among vertues, thã thoſe vices which are wont to deceiue by reaſon of neerenes & likeneſſe of vertue Finally when we remember, that the end of that which is right, euer is that God be ſerued: whatſoeuer tendeth to any other end, foorthwith worthily looſeth the name of right. Becauſe therfore they haue not reſpect to the marke which the wiſedome of God appointeth: alchough the thing that they doe, ſeeme good in doing, yet by a wrongful end it is ſinne. He cõcludeth therfore that all the Fabricij, Scipiones, & Catos, in all thoſe excellent actes of theirs: yet ſinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the end to which they ought to haue applied them: and that for that cauſe true righteouſnes was not in them: foraſmuch as duties are not weighed by the doings, but by the endes.

4 Moreouer if it be true which Iohn saith, that there is no life without the sonne of God: who so haue no parte in Christ, what manner of men soeuer they be, whatsoeuer they do or goe about, yet they runne forward with their whole course into destruction & ỹ iudgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that sayde of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the vnrighteous, not by lawe of workes: but by the verie lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good works are turned into sinnes. Wherfore the same Augustine saieth verie well in another place, when he compareth the endeuour of such men to running out of the way. For how much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further hee is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore hee affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally, it is certaine that they are euil trees, forasmuch as without the communicating of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therfore beare faire fruits and beautiful to the eye, yea and sweete in taste, but in no wise good fruites. Hereby we easily perceiue that whatsoeuer mā thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteousnes, but of certaine deseruing to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doutfull thing, sith it is alreadie proued by the witnesse of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any mā may please God without faith?

1. Ioan. 5. 12

Lib. ad Boni. in cap. 5.

Præf. in Psal.

Heb. 11. 6.

5 But there shall yet appeare a plainer proofe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out euery where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby hee may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free goodnes preuenteth him For what can a dead man do to attaine life? But when hee lightneth vs with the knowledge of himself, he is said to raise vs from death, & to make vs a newe creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnesse of God is set foorth vnto vs by this title, God (saieth he) which is rich in mercy, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euen when we were dead by sinnes, hath made vs aliue together in Christ, &c. In another place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithfull, hee saith: it is God that giueth life to the dead, and calleth those things that are not, as though they were. If wee be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore the Lord strongly beateth down this arrogancie, in the historie of Iob, in these wordes: who preuenteth me, & I shal render it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paul expounding applyeth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lorde but meere shame of needinesse & emptinesse. Wherefore in the place aboue cited, to proue that wee are come into the hope of saluation by his grace alone, not by works, he alleageth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good works which he hath prepared that we should walk in them. As if he had said: which of vs may boast that he hath with his righteousnesse prouoked God, sith our first power to doe good proceedeth out of regeneration? For as wee are made by nature, oyle shall sooner be wrong out of a stone, than a good work out of vs. Truely it is wonderfull if man being condemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there

There is in vs no more power to do good, till God in mercie haue renewed vs, than there is in a dead bodie to exercise anie action of life.

remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace: & that the kindnes & loue of God our sauiour toward vs hath appeared, because he hath saued vs, not by the works of righteousnes which we haue done, but according to his own mercie: that being iustified by his grace, wee might be made the heires of eternall life. By this confession we dispoile man of al righteousnes euen to the least litle peece thereof, til he be by only mercie regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousnes of works doe bring any thing toward the iustifying of vs, it is falsly said that wee are iustified by grace. Truely the Apostle had not forgotten himself, when he affirmed iustification to be of free gift, which in another place reasoneth that grace is now not grace if works do any thing auail. And what other thing doth the Lord meane, when he saith, ỳ he came not to call righteous mẽ but sinners? If only sinners are receiued, why seeke we an entrie by fained righteousnes?

1.Tim.1.9.

Tit.3.4.

Rom.11.6.

Mat.9.13.

God vnsought vnto by vs, seeketh vs of meere loue, & doth not onelie propose a redemption vvhich vvee by our ovvne vvorkes may obtaine in Christ, but by effectuall calling ingraffe vs into Christ by vvhose bloud beeing so ingraffed vve are redeemed.

6 Stil this same thought hath now & then recourse to my minde, that it is peril least I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully trauaile in prouing of this thing as though it were doutful or dark. But because our enuiousnes is such, as vnlesse it be most straitly thrust out of place, it neuer yeeldeth to God that which is his, I am compelled to tary somwhat the longer vpon it, Yet forasmuch as the Scripture is cleere enough in this matter, I wil in fighting rather vse the wordes thereof than mine owne. Esay, when he hath described the vniuersal destruction of mankind, doeth immediatly after very fitly adioyn the order of restoring. The Lord hath seene, & it seemed euil in his eies. And he saw ỳ there is no man: & he marueled that there is none that offereth himself: & he hath set saluation in his own arme, & hath strengthened himself with his owne righteousnes. Where are our righteousnesses if it be true which the Prophet sayth: that there is no man ỳ helpeth the Lord in recouering his saluation? So an other Prophet, where he bringeth in the Lord, discoursing of the reconciling of sinners to himself, saith: I will espouse thee to me for euer, in righteousnesse, iudgement, grace, and mercie. I will say to her that hath not obteined mercie, thou hast obtained mercie. If such couenant, which it is certaine to be the first cõioyning that wee haue with God, standeth vpon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousnesse. And I woulde faine learne of those men which faine that man meeteth God with some righteousnes of works, whether they thinke that there is any righteousnes at all, but that which is acceptable to God. If it be madnesse to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can proceede from his enemies, whome he wholely abhorreth with all their doings? That al we, I say, are the deadly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it self testifieth, til being iustified, we are receiued into frindship. If iustification be the beginning of loue, what righteousnesse of works shall go before it? So Iohn, to turne away that pestilent arrogancie, doeth diligently put in minde howe wee did not first loue him. And the selfesame thing the Lorde had long before taught by his Prophet: I will loue them saith hee, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loue is not prouoked by workes if it hath of his owne accord inclined it self vnto vs. But the rude common sort of men thinke it to be nothing else, but that no man hath deserued that Christ shoulde perfourme our redemption: yet that to the entring into the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our owne workes. Yea, but howsoeuer we be redeemed of Christ, yet till wee bee by the calling of the father graffed into the communion of him, we are both heires of darknes and death, and the enemies of God. For Paul teacheth that we are not cleansed and washed from our vncleannesses by the bloud of Christ, vntil the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirite auaileth vnto obedience and the sprinckling of the bloud of Christ If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the bloud of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner is without Christ Let this therefore remaine certaine, that the beginning of our salvation is as it were a certaine resurrection from death to life: Because when for Christes sake it is giuen to vs to beleeue in him, then wee first begin to passe from death into life.

1.Pet.1.2.

7 Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision aboue set bene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleanesse of conscience proueth that both of them are not yet regenerate by the Spirite of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proueth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by faith. What can sinners being estranged from God bring forth, but that which is accursed in his iudgement? With this foolish boldnes in deed, both al wicked men are puffed vp, and specially hypocrits, because howsoeuer they know that their whole heart swarmeth ful of filthines, yet if they do any works ỳ haue a shew of goodnes, they think them worthie ỳ God should not despise thẽ. Hereof groweth that pernitious error, that being proued guiltie of a wicked & mischeuous mind, yet they cãnot be driuen to confesse themselues void of righteousnes: but euen when they acknowledge themselues vnrighteous, because they cannot deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousnes vnto them. This vanitie the lord excellently wel confuteth by the Prophet, Ask (saith he) the priestes, saying: if a man carrie sãctified flesh in the hem of his garmẽt, & putteth to it bread or other meat, shal it be sanctified? The priestes answered: No. And Haggee said. If a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priests answered: it shalbe defiled. Haggee said: So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: & so all the works of their hands: & all things that they offer to me shalbe defiled. I would to God that this saying might either get ful credit with vs, or wel be setled in our remẽbrance. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, that can abide to be perswaded, that which the Lord here plainly pronounceth. The naughtiest man, so soone as hee hath perfourmed one or two doutful deeds of the law, douteth not ỳ it shalbe accounted to him for righteousnes. But ỳ Lord crieth to the cõtrarie, that there is no sanctificatiõ gotten thereby, vnlesse the heart be first wel cleansed. And not contented therwith, he affirmeth that al the works whatsoeuer they be that proceede from sinners, sinners, as are defiled with vncleannes of the heart. Therefore let the matter of righteousnes depart from these works which are by the Lords own mouth condemned of filthines. And with howe fit a similitude doeth hee shewe the same? For it might haue been obiected, that whatsoeuer the Lord had commaunded, was inuiolably holy. But he on the contrarie side setteth against them, that it is no maruel, if those things that are hallowed by the lawe of the Lord, are defiled with the filthinesse of naughtie men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

The second & third sortes of men mentioned Sect.1. hauing not faith, can not haue righteousnes such as doth sanctify them indeede.

The hearts of hypocrites being not purged, their vvorkes in appearance faire, cannot in the sight of God louingly bee accepted. Esai.1.13.

8 The same matter hee excellently well handleth in Esaye, Offer not (saith he) sacrifice in vaine: incense is abhomination to me: my soule hateth your Calendes & solemnities. They are become tedious to mee, and I haue beene wearie with bearing them: when you shall hold vp your handes I will turne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply prayer I will not heare: for your hands are full of bloud. Be washed, be cleane, take away the euil of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so loatheth the obeying of his own law? Yea, but he here refuseth nothing ỳ is of the naturall obseruing of the law, the beginning whereof he euery where teacheth to be the vnfained feare of his name. When that is taken away, whatsoeuer things are offered him are not onely trifles, but stinking and abhominable filthinesse. Now let the hypocrites goe, and keeping peruersnesse wrapped vp in their heart, endeuour to deserue the fauour of God with workes. But by this meane, they shall more and more prouoke him to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of wicked are abhominable, and the onely prayer of vpright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold that out of doubt, which ought to bee most commonly knowen to him, that is euen but meanly exercised in the Scriptures, that euen those workes that glister most gloriously in men not yet truely sanctified, are so farre from righteousnes in the sight of the Lord, that they be iudged sinnes. And therefore they haue said most truely that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by workes: but contrariwise that workes do then please, & neuer til then, when the person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this order is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by the hand. Moses writeth that the Lord had respect to Abel & to his works. Se you not how he declareth that God is fauourable to the men, before that he hath respect to their workes? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must go before, that the works which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God: because this saying of Ieremie is alway in force, that the workes of God haue respect vnto truth. And that it is onely faith by which the hearts of men are clensed, the holy ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and liuely faith.

Gen.4.4.

Act.15.6. Iere.5.3

From the fourth sort of men, such as be truelie iustified through Christ, there proceedeth no one good vvork in all pointes holie and perfect.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnes they haue, whome wee haue set in the fourth degree. We graunt that when God by the meane of the righteousnes of Christ, reconcileth vs to himselfe, and giuing vs free forgiuenesse of sinnes, accounteth vs for righteous, with such mercie is also conioyned this his beneficiall doing, that by his holy spirite hee dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof the lustes of our flesh are daily more & more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lorde vnto true pureneſſe of life, when our hearts are framed to the obedience of the lawe: that this may be our chiefe will, to serue his will, and by all meanes to aduaunce only his glorie. But euen while by the guiding of the holy ghost wee walke in the wayes of the Lord, least yet wee forgetting our selues should waxe proude, there are left certaine remnants of imperfection, which may minister vs matter of humilitie. There is none righteous, (saith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What manner of righteousnesse therefore will they yet get by their works? First, I say, that ỹ best worke that can be brought forth of them, is yet alway sprinkeled & corrupted with some vncleanesse of the flesh, & hath as it were some dregges mingled with it. I say, let a holy seruant of God choose out of all his life the most excellent thing that hee shall thinke that he hath done in the whole course thereof, and let him well consider all the partes of it, without doubt he shal finde somwhere somwhat sauouring of ỹ rottennes of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing wel our chereful quickenesse is neuer such as it ought to be, but in slacking our course our weakenes is much. Although we see that there are euident foule blots wherwith the works of the holy are bespred, yet grant that they be nothing but most little spottes: shall they nothing offend the eies of God, before whome euen the starres are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be iudged in it selfe, deserueth not iust reward of shame. 1. Reg. 8. 6.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible ỹ we should haue some throughly pure and perfect works, yet one sinne is enough to blotte out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousnesse, as the Prophet sayeth. With whome also Iames agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guiltie of all. Now sith this mortal life is neuer pure or void from sinne, what soeuer righteousnes we should purchase, being frō time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed & lost, it shoulde not come into the sight of God, nor be accounted to vs for righteousnes. Finally when the righteousnesse of workes is entreated of, we must not haue respect to the work of the law, but to the commaundement. Therefore if wee seeke righteousnesse by the lawe, we shal in vaine bring forth one or two works: but a perpetual obedience of the law is there necessarie. Wherefore the Lord doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs for righteousnes that same forgiuenesse of sinnes whereof we haue spoken, that hauing once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousnesse in the law, because he should so do nothing else but bring vs into a false hope, and mocke and laugh vs to scorne. For sith no perfection could come to vs so long as we are clothed with this flesh, and sith the lawe threatenth death & iudgement to all them that perform not ful righteousnes in work: it shal alway haue wherof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercie of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquite vs from time to time with continuall forgiuenesse of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we saide at the beginning, ỹ if we be weighed by our own worthinesse, whatsoeuer we purpose or go about, yet wee with all our trauailes and endeuours are worthie of death and destruction.

If vve could doe anie thing perfectly good, yet the euil vvhich vvee do, vvould make it vnauailable vnto righteousnes, God iudging vs according to the rigor of the lavv vvhich doth not require onlie some thing righteous, but forbiddeth euerie vnrighteous thing vnder paine of death and condemnation. Ezec. 18. 24. Iac. 2. 10.

11 Vpon these two points wee must strongly stand fast: that there was

neuer any worke of a godly man, which if it were examined by the seuere iudgement of God, was not damnable. Againe, if there be any such shewed, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted & defiled with the sins, wherewith it is certain that the doer of it is loden, it looseth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation. For about the beginning of iustification there is no strife betweene vs & the sounder sort of scholemen, but that a sinner being freely deliuered from damnation obtaineth righteousnesse, and that by the forgiuenesse of sinnes: sauing that they vnder the worde of iustification comprehende the renuing wherewith wee are newely formed by the spirite of God vnto the obedience of the lawe and they thus
Rom. 4. 13. describe the righteousnes of a man regenerat, that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good workes iudged righteous before God, & by their deseruing is accepted. But the Lorde contrariwise pro-
Heb. 2. 4. nounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteousnesse, not at the time when he yet serued Idols, but when he had alreadie many yeres excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be
Rom. 4. 7. performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousnesse reposed in faith.
Psal. 33. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paul, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is saide in the Prophet: The righteous man shal liue by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophane men, whome the Lorde iustifieth by conuerting them to the faith, but the speach is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paul also taketh away all dout, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of Dauid: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen. But it is certaine, that Dauid speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therfore this blessednes we must not haue once in our life, but hold it throughout al our life.
2. Cor. 5. 18. Last of all he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one or two dayes, but is perpetuall in the church. Therefore the faithfull haue euen to the end of their life no other righteousnesse than that which is there set foorth. For Christ euerlastingly remaineth the Mediatour to reconcile the father to vs, & the effectualnesse of his death is euerlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewithall our iniquities are couered. Neither doeth Paul to the Ephesians say, ỳ we haue the beginning of saluation out of grace, but that we are saued by grace, not of works, that no man should glorie.

The shiftes of schoolemen in maintaining the righteousnesse of good vvorkes.

12 The starting holes which the scholemen do here seeke to escape by, do not deliuer them. They say that good workes are not by inwarde worthines in themselues of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteousnes, but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they be driuen to confesse that the righteousnesse of workes is in this life alway vnperfect, they graunt that wee, so long as wee liue, doe neede forgiuenesse of sinnes, whereby the want of workes may be supplyed but that the defaults which are committed, are recompenced with workes of supererogation. For I aunswere, that the accepting grace as they call it, is none other than is free goodnesse wherewith the father embraceth vs in

Christ

Christ, when he clotheth vs with the innocencie of Christ, and accounteth the same ours, that by the beneficial meane thereof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousnes of Christ (which as it only is perfect, so only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our steede, & be presented at the barre as a suertie. Herewith we being furnished, doe obtaine continuall forgiuenesse of sinnes in faith. With the pureneſſe hereof our filthinesses and vncleanesses of imperfections being couered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the iudgement of God, vntil the houre come, when the olde man being slaine & vtterly destroyed in vs, the goodnes of God shall receiue vs into blessed peace with the newe Adam, where let vs looke for the day of the Lorde in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodies, we shalbe remoued into the glorie of the heauenly kingdome.

The imperfection of our vvorkes is not esther by vvorkes of superrogation or satisfaction supplied.

13 If these things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themselues make vs acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can the works themselues please, but in respect that man being couered with the righteousnesse of Christ, pleaseth God, and obtaineth forgiuenes of his sinnes. For God hath not promised the reward of eternall life to some certaine workes, but onely pronounceth that he which doth these things shal liue: setting the notable curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the deuise of righteousnes in part is largely confuted, sith no other righteousnesse is admitted into heauen, but a whole obseruing of the law. And no whit sounder is that which they are wont to babble of supplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not stil returne to the same place from whence they are alreadie shut out: that he which keepeth ỹ law in part, is by workes so farre righteous? That which no man of sound iudgement will grant them, they do too shamelesly take for confessed. So oft the Lord testifieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousnesse of workes, but in the perfect obseruing of his lawe. What obstinacie is it, that wee when we are destitute of that obseruing, least we should seeme spoiled of al glory, that is, to haue altogether giuen place to God, do boast our selues of I wot not what small peeces of a fewe workes, and go about by satisfactions to redeem that which wanteth. Satisfactions haue alreadie before bin sufficiently ouerthrowen, that we ought not now so much as to dreame of them. Only this I say, that they which so play the fooles, do not wey how detestable a thing sinne is before God: for truely they should vnderstād that the whole righteousnes of men being layde vpon a heap, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sinne. For we see that man was by one offence so cast away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall lost all meane to recouer saluation. Therfore the power of satisfactiō is taken away, wherwith they flatter thēselues, but surely shal neuer satisfie God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable that proceedeth frō his enemies. And his enemies are al they to whome he purposeth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be couered and forgiuen, before that the Lord haue respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiuenesse of sinnes is of free grace which they do wickedly blaspheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therfore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things ỹ are behinde vs, & hasting forwarde forwarde to those things that are before vs, run in our race, endeuouring to the price of the high calling.

VVorkes of supererogation are vvorkes vvhich vve cannot vvorke. Luk. 17. 10.

14 But how doth the boasting of the works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we haue done all things that are commaunded vs, we should say that we are vnprofitable seruantes, and that we haue don no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lorde therefore commanded vs vnfainedly to thinke and consider with our selues, that we do not any free beneficial doings to him, but to render due seruice. And worthily. For we are seruantes endetted in so many seruices, as we are not able to discharge, althugh all our thoughtes and all our members, were turned into dutifull deedes of the lawe. And therefore that which he sayth, When ye haue done all thinges that are commaunded you, &c. is asmuch in effecte, as if the righteousnes of one man were more than al the righteousnes of men. Howe therefore may we (of whome there is none that is not most farre distant frō this marke) be so boulde as to boast that we haue added a heap to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exception & say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeuour may proceed beyond necessary duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessarie. For this we must altogether holde, that we can imagine nothing that auaileth either to the worship or the loue of god, which is not cōprehended vnder the law of God. If it be a parte of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessity.

Vnto God vvee can do no more than vve ovve: if vve doe that vvhich he requireth not, it is such as vve can not looke that euer he vvill revvard. 1. Cor. 6. 1.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paul is out of season alleaged: That among the Corinthians he did of his own will yelde of his right, which otherwise he might haue vsed if he had would, & that hee hath employd vpon them not only so much as hee ought of duetie, but also hath giuen them his free trauaile beyond the boundes of dueties. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offence to the weake. For false and deceitfull workemen did boast themselues with this alluring shew of liberalitie, whereby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines, and raise vp hatred to the Gospel, so that Paul was driuen of necessitie either to bring the doctrin of Christ into danger, or to meete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thing, to run into offence, when he may refraine it, then I graunt that the Apostle did something of supererogation for ỹ Lord. But if this were by right required of a wise distributer of the gospel, then I say that he did that which was his dutie to do. Finally, although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alway true, that all our things are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the lawe to be due to their Lord And Christ hath vttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thanke wee will giue to a bondseruant when hauing beene all the day trauailed with sundrie labors he returneth home to vs in the euening. But it is possible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durst haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done nothing but that which by his state of bondage hee ought, for hee with his whole abilitie is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogations are which these men will will boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as hee neither hath at any time commaunded, nor doth approue them, nor will allowe them when account shal be made before him. In this signification onely we will graunt that they are works of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place also spoken of these things: Wherefore do ye weye your siluer & not in bread? Ye spend your labour and not in being satisfied. It is in deede not verie harde for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadow in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne iudge shal sit in his iudgement seate, such windie decrees shal of necessitie vanish away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defence wee may bring to his iudgement seat, not what we may talke of in schooles and corners.

Psal.1.12.

Psal.55.2.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefely two pestilences to bee driuen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnesse of works, And that we ascribe no part of glorie to them. The scriptures doe euery where thrust vs from al manner of affiance, when they teach that our righteousnesses do stinke in the sight of God, vnlesse they receiue a good sauour from the innocencie of Christ, & that they can do nothing but prouoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be susteined by the tenderneesse of his mercy. Moreouer they so leaue nothing to vs, but that we should craue the mercie of our iudge with that confession of Dauid, that none shalbe iustified before him, if he require account of his seruants. But where Iob saieth: If I haue done wickedly, woe to mee: but if I doe righteously, yet I will not so lift vp my head: though he meane of that most high righteousnesse of God, whereunto the verie Angels answere not: yet hee therewithall sheweth that when they come to the iudgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortall men, but to holde their peace as dumbe. For it tendeth not only to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeelde than daungerously striue with the rigorousnesse of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteousnesse in himselfe, than such as at the first moment shoulde fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen away, al glorying must also necessarily depart. For who can giue the praise of righteousnesse to these workes, the affiance whereof trembleth before the sight of God? Wee must therefore come whither Esay calleth vs, that all the seede of Israel may be praised & glorie in God: because it is most true which he saith in another place, that we are the planting of the glorie of God. Our minde therefore shal then rightly be purged, when it shal neither in any behalfe rest vpon the confidence of workes, nor reioyce in the glorie of them. But this errour incouraged fooolish men to the puffing vp of this false and lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in workes.

We must beware of trusting vnto, and of glorifying in our works

17 But if wee looke to the foure kindes of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of things, we shal finde that none of them doth accord with works in the stablishing of our saluation. For the scripture doth euery where report, that the cause of procuring the eternall life to vs, is the mercie of the heauenly Father and his free loue towarde vs: that materiall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which hee purchased righteousnesse for vs. What also shall wee say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes Iohn comprehendeth together in one sentence, when he saith. God so loued the worlde, that hee gaue his onely begotten sonne, that euery one which beleeueth in him may not perish, but may haue euerlasting life. Nowe the finall cause the Apostle testifieth to be both the shewing of the righteousnesse of God and the praise of his goodnesse: where hee rehearseth also the other three in expresse wordes. For he saith thus to the Romanes: all haue sinned and doe neede the glorie of God: but they are iustified freely by his grace. Here thou hast the head and first fountaine, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercie. Then followeth: by the redemption which is in Christ Iesu. Here thou hast as it were the matter wherof righteousnes is made for vs through faith in his bloud. Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applyed to vs. Last of all he ioyneth the ende, when he saieth, vnto the shewing of his righteousnesse that he may be righteous and the righteousmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousnesse standeth of reconciliation) hee setteth expresly by name, that Christ was giuen to vs for reconciliation. So in the first Chapter also to the Ephesians hee teacheth that wee are receiued of God into fauour by meere mercie: that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: receiued by faith: all to this ende, that the glorie of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When wee see that all the partes of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there that wee shoulde nowe either haue affiance or glorie in workes? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moue any controuersie with vs about the efficient or final cause, vnlesse they will denie the whole Scripture. In the Material and formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our workes haue a halfe place with faith and the righteousnes of Christ. But this also they teach, the Scripture crying out against them, which simply affirmeth both that Christ is to vs for righteousnes & life, and that this benefite of righteousnes is possessed by only faith.

Iohn. 3. 16.

Rom. 3. 23.

Why holie men doe comfort themselues in the conscience of their owne vprightnes.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen and comfort themselues with remembrance of their owne innocencie and vprightnesse, and sometime also forbeare not to report of it with praise, that is done two wayes: either that in comparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked, they conceiue thereby assured trust of victorie, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust and deserued condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison of other, while they record themselues before God, the pureneſſe of their owne conscience bringeth to them both some comfort and affiance. Of the first of these two wayes, we shal see hereafter: nowe let vs briefely declare of the latter, how it agreeth with that which wee haue aboue saide, that in the iudgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of workes, and glorie vppon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stablishing of their saluation, doe without respect of workes bend their eyes to the onely goodnesse of God. And they doe not onely bend themselues to it afore all thinges as to the beginning of blessednesse, but do rest therin as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of workes: namely so farre as they are the witnessings of God dwelling and raigning in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of workes hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first cast the whole affiance of thy mind vpon the mercie of God: it ought not to seeme contrarie to that whereupon it hangeth. Wherefore when wee exclude the affiance of workes, wee meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bowe to the merite of works as to ỳ succour of saluation, but should throughly rest in the free promise of righteousnes. But wee forbid it not to vnderprop & strengthen this faith with the signes of the good wil of God toward it self. For if all the good gifts which God hath bestowed vpon vs, whē they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine manner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we e are enlightened to beholde that soueraigne light of goodnes: much more is the grace of good workes, which sheweth that the Spirite of adoption is giuen vs.

19 When therefore the holy ones do by innocencie of conscience confirme their faith, and gather matter of reioycing, they doe nothing but call to mind by the fruites of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lorde into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lorde is stedfast assuredneſse: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightneſse and simplicitie: haue no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience: but are then onely of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assuredneſse, and the holy ones are priuie in their conscience of such an vprightneſse, wherewith are yet mingled many remnants of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the fruites of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwelling in them, they do thereby not slenderly strengthen themselues to look for the help of God in all their necessities, when they by experience finde him their father in so great a matter. And euen this also they cannot doe, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodneſse of God, sealed with no other assuredness, than of the promise. For if they begin to wey it by good workes, nothing shall be more vncerteine nor more weake: forasmuch as if workes be considered by themselues, they shall no lesse by their imperfection shewe proofe of the wrath of God, than they doe with howsoeuer imperfect pureneſse testifie his good will. Finally they do so set out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is the length, breadth, deapth, and height of them: as if he should say: Whither soeuer the senses of the godly do turne themselues, how high soeuer they climbe, how farre & wide soeuer they extend them, yet they ought not to go out of the loue of Christ, but hold themselues wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth al kinds of measures in it. And therefore he saith that it excelleth and surmounteth aboue all knowledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulneſse of God. As in another place, when he glorieth that all the godly are vanquishers in battel, he by and by addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

Ephe.3.18.

Rom.8.37.

If vve do good it is Gods doing and not ours, and vvith the good vvhich is his, there is much euill of ours mingled.

20 We see nowe that there is not in the holy ones ỹ affiance of workes, which either giueth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard them none otherwise than as the giftes of God, whereby they reknowledge his goodnes none otherwise than as signes of their calling, whereby they may think vpon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing frō the free righteousnes which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thing doth Augustine in fewe words, but verie well set out where he writeth, I do not say to the Lorde, despise not the workes of my hands, or I haue sought the Lord with my handes and haue not beene deceiued. But I doe not commende the workes of my hands: for I feare, least when thou hast looked vpon them, thou shalt finde moe sinnes than merits. Only this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despise not the works of thy hands, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest mee: if thou beholdest thine, thou crowneste me. For also whatsoeuer good works I haue, they are of thee. He setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his workes to God, because if hee haue any good workes, he seeth therein nothing his own: secondly, because the same is also ouerwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Whereupon commeth to passe that the conscience feeleth thereby more feare & dismaying than assuredneese. Therefore he would haue God no otherwise to looke on his wel doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an ende of the worke which he hath begonne.

In vvhat sense the good vvhich vve do, is tearmed a cause of that good vvhich God doth vnto vs.

21 But furthermore whereas the scripture sheweth that the good works of the faithfull, are causes why the Lord doth good to them, that is so to bee vnderstanded, that that which we haue before set may stand vnshaken, that the effect of our saluation consisteth in the loue of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Sonne: the instrument, in the enlightning of the holy ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the ende is the glorie of the so greate kindnes of God. These things withstand not, but that the Lorde may embrace works as inferiour causes. But whence commeth that? Namely whom the Lord of his mercie hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinarie dispensation he doth by good works bring into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this manner he sometime deriueth eternal life from workes: not for ỹ it is to be ascribed to them: but because whom he hath chosen, them he doth iustifie, that he may at lēgth glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step towarde ỹ which followeth, after a certaine maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasion to assigne the true cause, hee biddeth vs not to see to workes, but holdeth vs in the onely thinking vpon the mercie of God. For what manner of thing is this which he teacheth by the Apostle: The reward of sin is death: the grace of the Lord, is life euerlasting? Why doeth hee not set righteousnesse in comparison against sinne, as hee setteth life against death? Why doeth he not make righteousnesse the cause of life, as hee maketh sinne the cause of death? For so should the comparison of contraries haue stande wel together, which is much broken by this turning. But the Apostle meane by this comparison to expresse that which was trueth, that death is due to the

Rom. 8. 30.

Rom. 6, 13.

the deseruings of men: that life is reposed in the only mercy of God. Finally in these maners of speaking is rather expressed the order than the cause: because God in heaping graces vpon graces, taketh cause of the first to adde the second, that he may leaue nothing vndone to the enriching of his seruants: and he so continually extendeth his liberalitie, that yet hee woulde haue vs alway to looke vnto the free election which is the fountaine & beginning of it. For although he loueth the gifts which he daily giueth, insomuch as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to hold fast that free acceptation, which alone is able to vphold our soules: as for such giftes of his Spirit as he afterward giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

The xv. Chapter.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merites of workes, do ouerthrow as well the praise of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednesse of saluation.

NOwe wee haue declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that because if righteousnesse be vpholden with works, it must needes by and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contained in the onely mercie of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in only faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe staye of the matter, least wee be entangled with that generall errour, not onely of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is mooued of the iustification of faith & workes, they flee to those places which seeme to giue to workes some merite in the sight of God: as though the iustification of works were fully wonne, if it be ones proued that they be of any value with God. But we haue aboue plainly shewed that the righteousnesse of workes consisteth onely in the perfect keeping of the law. Whereupon followeth that no man is iustified by workes, but he that hauing climbed vp to the highest top of perfection cannot be proued guiltie of any offence be it neuer so little. Therefore it is another & a seuerall question: Howsoeuer workes suffice not to iustifie a man, whether yet do they not deserue fauour with God?

Whether workes though not iustifying maie notwithstanding merit.

2 First of the name of merite I must needes say this afore hande, that whosoeuer first applyed it to workes of men compared to the iudgement of God, he did verie ill prouide for the pureneſse of faith. Truely I doe by my good will abstaine from striues about wordes, but I would wish that this sobrietie had alway bin vsed among Christian writers, that they wold not haue found in their heartes to vse words strange frō the scriptures, which ingendered much offence & no fruite. For whereto, I beseech you, was it needfull to haue the name of merit brought in, when the price of good works might be fitly expressed by another name without offence? But how much offence that worde containeth in it, is euident with the great hurt of the worlde. Surely as it is most proude it can do nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with froward pride. The olde writers of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I would to God they had not with the abusing of one litle worde giuen to poſteritie matter of errour. Howbeit they themſelues alſo do in many places teſtifie, how in no caſe they meant to giue any preiudice againſt the trueth. For thus ſaith Auguſtine in one place. Let merites of men here hold their peace, which haue periſhed by Adam: and let the grace of God raigne, by Ieſus Chriſt. Againe, the ſaincts giue nothing to their own Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercie, O God. In another place. When man ſeeth that whatſoeuer good hee hath, hee hath it not from himſelfe, but from his God, he ſeeth that all that which is praiſed in him, is not of his owne merites, but of the mercie of God. You ſee how taking from men the power of doing well, he alſo throweth downe the dignity of merite. And Chryſoſtome ſaith, Our workes, if there be any, which followe the free calling of God, are repaimét & debt: but the gifts of God are grace & bountifulneſſe & the greatneſſe of liberal giuing. But leauing the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thing. I haue verily before alleadged a ſentence out of Bernard, As it ſufficeth to merite, not to preſume of Merits: ſo to want Merites, ſufficeth to iudgement. But by adding forth with an expoſition, he ſufficiently mitigateth the hardneſſe of the worde, where he ſaith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou haſt them, know that they are giuen hope for fruite, the mercie of God: and ſo thou haſt eſcaped all daunger, of pouertie, vnthankfulneſſe, and preſumption. Happie is the church which neither wanteth merites without preſumption, nor preſumption without merites. And a litle before he had largely ſhewed, how godly a meaning he vſed. For of Merites (ſaith he) why ſhould the church be careful, which hath a ſtedfaſter & ſurer cauſe to glorie of the purpoſe of God? God cannot denie himſelfe, he wil do that which hee hath promiſed. If there bee no cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt aske, by what merites may we hope for good things? ſpecially ſith thou heareſt it ſaid, Not for your ſakes, but for my ſake: it ſufficeth to merite, to know that merites ſuffice not.

Our vvorkes ſhall haue reuvard, they deſerue none. Luk. 17. 10.

3 What all our workes deſerue, the Scripture ſheweth when it ſaith that they cannot abide the ſight of God, becauſe they are full of vncleanneſſe: then, what the perfect obſeruing of the law (if any ſuch could be found) ſhall deſerue, when it teacheth that we ſhould thinke our ſelues vnprofitable ſeruants, when we haue done all things that are commaunded vs: becauſe we ſhall haue giuen nothing freely to the Lord, but onely haue performed our due ſeruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But thoſe good works which hee himſelfe hath giuen vs, the Lorde both calleth ours and teſtifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but alſo that they ſhall haue reward. It is our duetie againe for our part, to be encouraged with ſo great a promiſe, and to gather vp our hearts, that wee bee not wearied with well doing, and to yelde true thankfulneſſe to ſo great bountifulneſſe of God. It is vndoubted that it is the grace of God whatſoeuer there is in workes that deſerueth praiſe: that there is not one droppe, which wee ought properly to aſcribe to our ſelues. This if wee doe truely and earneſtly acknowledge, there vaniſheth away not onely all affiance but alſo opinion of Merite. Wee (I ſay) doe not part the praiſe of good workes (as the Sophiſters doe) betweene God and man: but wee reſerue it whole, perfect, and vnminiſhed to the Lorde. Onely this wee aſſigne to man, that euen the ſelfe ſame

workes that were good hee by his vncleanneſſe corrupteth and defileth. For nothing commeth out of man, how perfect ſoeuer hee be, that is not defiled with ſome ſpotte. Therefore, let the Lorde call into iudgement euen theſe things that are beſt in the workes of men: hee ſhall verily eſpie in them his owne righteouſneſſe, but mans diſhoneſtie and ſhame. Good workes therefore doe pleaſe God and are not vnprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for rewarde the moſt large benefites of God: not becauſe they ſo deſerue, but becauſe the goodneſſe of God hath of it ſelfe appointed this price vnto them. But what ſpitefulneſſe is this, that men not contented with that liberalitie of GOD, which giueth vndue rewardes to workes that deſerue no ſuch thing, doe with ambition full of ſacriledge endeuour further, that that which is wholy of the liberalitie of God, may ſeeme to be rendered to the merites of men. Here I appeale to the common iudgement of euery man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a piece of grounde by another mans liberall graunt, doe alſo claime to himſelfe the title of proprietie: doeth hee not by ſuch vnthankfulneſſe deſerue to looſe the verie ſelfe poſſeſſion which he had? Likewiſe, if a bondſlaue being made free of his Lorde, doe hide the baſeneſſe of the eſtate of a Libertine, and boaſt himſelfe to be a freeman borne: is he not worthie to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vſe of enioying a benefite, if wee neither claime to our ſelues more than is giuen, nor do defraude the author of the benefite of his praiſe: but rather do ſo behaue our ſelues, that that which hee hath giuen from himſelfe to vs, may ſeeme after a certaine manner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke and conſider what manner of moderation is due to God.

Libertine, is he that is free by manumiſſion, not by birth.

4 I knowe that the Sophiſters do abuſe certaine places, to proue therby that the name of Merit towarde God is founde in the Scriptures. They alleage a ſentence out of Eccleſiaſticus, Mercy ſhal make place to euery man, according to the Merite of his workes. And out of the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with ſuch ſacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in reſiſting the authoritie of Eccleſiaſticus, I do now releaſe it. Yet I deny that they faithfully alleage that which Eccleſiaſticus, whatſoeuer writer he were, hath written. For the Greeke copie is thus: πᾶσα ἐλεημοσύνη ποιήσει τόπον, ἕκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ εὑρήσει. He ſhall make place to euerie mercie, & euery man ſhall finde according to his works. And ỹ this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latine tranſlation, appeareth both by the framing of theſe wordes, & by a longer ioyning together of the ſentence going before. In the Epiſtle to the Hebrues, there is no cauſe why they ſhould ſnare vs in one litle worde, when in the Greeke wordes of the Apoſtle is nothing elſe but that ſuch ſacrifices doe pleaſe & are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to ſuffice to ſubdue & beate downe the outragiouſnes of our pride, that we faine not anie worthines to works beyond the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that al our good works are cõtinually beſprinkeled with many filthy ſpots, wherwith God may be worthily offended & bee angry with vs: ſo farre is it off, ỹ they be able to win him to vs, or to prouoke his liberality

Teſtimonies abuſed for proofe of merites: whereas the doctrine of ſcripture doth indeede teach the clean contrarie, that our good workes deſerue nothing at the hands of God, either in this life or in the life to come Eccle. 16.14 Heb. 13.6.

toward vs: Yet becauſe he of his tender kindneſſe doeth not examine them by extremitie of law, he taketh them as if they were moſt pure, and therfore though without merite, he rewardeth them with infinite benefites both of this preſent life & of the life to come. For I do not allow the diſtinction ſet by men otherwiſe learned and godly: that good workes deſerue the graces that are giuen vs in this life, and that eternall life is the rewarde of faith alone. For the Lorde doeth commonly alway ſet in heauen the rewarde of labours and the crown of battel. Againe, to giue it ſo to the merite of works, that it bee taken away from grace, that the Lorde heapeth vs with graces vpon graces, is againſt the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Chriſt ſaith that to him that hath, ſhalbe giuen, and that the faithfull and good ſeruant which hath ſhewed himſelfe faithfull in fewe things, ſhalbe ſet ouer many: yet he alſo ſheweth in another place, that the encreaſes of the faithfull are the gifts of his free goodnes. All ye that thirſt (ſaith he) come to the waters: and ye that haue not money, come and buy milke & honie without money and without any exchange. Whatſoeuer therefore is now giuen to the faithfull for helpe of ſaluation, yea and bleſſednes ſelfe, is the meere liberalitie of God: yet both in this and in thoſe hee teſtifieth that hee hath conſideration of works: becauſe to teſtifie the greatnes of his loue toward vs, he vouchſaueth to grant ſuch honor not onely to vs, but alſo to the giftes which he hath giuen vs.

Chriſt is ſuch a foundation that being builded vpō him we cannot reſt anie thing vpon the worthines of our owne workes.

5 If theſe things had in the ages paſt beene handeled & diſpoſed in ſuch order as they ought to haue beene, there had neuer ariſen ſo many troubles & diſſenſions. Paul ſaith, that in the building of Chriſtian doctrin, wee muſt keep ſtil that foundation which he had laide among the Corinthians, beſide which no other can be laide: and that the ſame foundation is Ieſus Chriſt. What manner of foundation haue wee in Chriſt? is it, that hee was to vs the beginning of ſaluation: that the fulfilling thereof ſhould follow of our ſelues? & hath he but only opened the way, by which we ſhould go forwarde of our own ſtrength? Not ſo: but, as he ſaide a little before, when wee acknowledge him, he is giuen to vs for righteouſneſſe. No man therefore is wel founded in Chriſt, but he that hath full righteouſneſſe in him: foraſmuch as the Apoſtle ſaith not that he was ſent to helpe vs to obtain righteouſnes, but that he himſelfe might be our righteouſnes. Namely, that we are choſen in him from eternitie before the making of the world, by no deſeruing of ours, but according to the purpoſe of the good pleaſure of God: that by his death wee are redeemed from the damnation of death, and deliuered from deſtruction: that in him wee are adopted of the heauenly father into children and heires: that by his bloud wee are reconciled to the Father: that being giuen to him to be kept we are deliuered from peril of periſhing and of being loſt: that being ſo engraffed in him, wee are alreadie after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdome of God by hope: and yet more: that hauing obtained ſuch partaking of him, howſoeuer wee be yet fooles in our ſelues, he is wiſedome for vs before God: howſoeuer wee be ſinners, he is righteouſneſſe for vs: howſoeuer wee be vncleane, hee is cleanneſſe for vs: howſoeuer wee bee weake, howſoeuer vnarmed and lying open in daunger of Sathan, yet ours is the power which is giuen him him in heauen and earth, whereby he may treade downe Satan for vs, and breake ỹ gates of hels: howsoeuer we stil cary about with vs ỹ body of death, yet he is life for vs: briefly that all his thinges are ours, & we in him haue all things, in our selues nothing. Vpon this foundation, I say, it behoueth that we be builded, if we wil encrease into a holy temple to the Lord. Math. 28. 18

6 But the world hath a long time beene otherwise taught. For there haue beene found out I wot not what moral good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be grafted in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saieth, that they are al in death which haue not possessed the Sonne. If they be in death, howe shoulde they bring foorth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, that whatsoeuer is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good fruites of an euil tree. But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherin he may shewe foorth his power? They say that he hath deserued for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of deseruing: that it is nowe our parte not to faile the occasion offered. O desperate shamelesnesse of vngodlinesse. Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strippe him naked of his power, and in a maner tread him vnder foot? This testimonie is ech where spoken of him, that al they are iustified that beleue in him: these fellowes teach, that there commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to euery man to iustifie himselfe. But I would to God they tasted what these sayings meane: that al they haue life that haue the Sonne of God: that whosoeuer beleeueth, is already passed frō death into life, that we are iustified by his grace, that we might be made heires of eternall life: that the faithfull haue Christ abiding in them, by whom they cleaue fast to God: that they which are partakers of his life, do sit with him in heauenly places: that they are transplanted into the kingdō of God, and haue obteined saluation and innumerable other such. For they do not declare, that there commeth by the faith of Christ nothing but the power to obteine righteousnesse or saluation, but that they are both giuē to vs. Therfore so soone as thou art by faith engrafted into Christ, thou art already made the sonne of God, the heire of heauē, partaker of righteousnes, possessor of life, & (that their lies may be better confuted) thou hast not obteined the fit ability to deserue, but euen all the deseruinges of Christ: for they are communicated to thee.

Being vvithout Christ vve can do no vvorke that pleaseth God. being in him vve are not indued onlie vvith an ablilitie of meriting saluation for our selues, but possest vvith that righteousnes and life vvhich Christ hath merited for vs.

7 So the Sorbonical scholes, the mothers of all errours, haue taken from vs the iustification of faith which is the summe of all godlinesse. They grant verily in worde, that man is iustified by formed faith: but this they afterwarde expound, because good workes haue of faith this that they auaile to righteousnesse: that they seeme in a manner to name faith in mockage, sith without great enuiousnesse it could not be passed ouer in silence, seing it is so oft repeated of the Scripture. And nor yet contented, they doe in the praise of good works priuily steale from God somwhat to giue away to man. Because they see that good workes litle auaile to aduance man, and that they cannot be properly called Merits, if they be accoūted the fruits of the grace of God: they picke them out of the strength of free wil, oile forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deede that the principall cause of

of them is in grace: but they affirme that thereby is not excluded free will, by which is al merite. And this not onlie the latter Sophisters do teach, but also their Pythagoras, Lombard: whom if you compare with these men, you may say to be sounde witted and sober. It was truely a point of maruellous blindnesse, that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth, they sawe not with how great carefulnesse that man prouided that no peece of the glorie of good workes were it neuer so litle, should be conueyed to men. Here before where we entreated of free will, we recited certaine testimonies of his to this purpose, of which sort there are oftentimes founde manie like in his writings, as when he forbiddeth vs that we should no where boast of our merites, because euen they also are the giftes of God: And when he writeth that al our merite is only of grace, that it is not gotten by our sufficiencie, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no maruell that Lombarde was blind at the light of the Scripture, in which it appeareth that he was not so well practised. Yet nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his disciples, than this word of the Apostle. For whē he forbiddeth Christians al glorying, he adioineth a reason why it is not lawful to glorie: because we are that handworke of God, created to all good workes, that we should walke in them. Sith therefore there commeth out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is whole of God without exceptiō: there is no righ why we should claim to our selues one ounce in good workes. Finally whereas they continually call vpon good workes, in the meane time they so instruct consciences, that they neuer dare haue affiance, that they haue God wel pleased and fauourable to their works. But contrariwise we, without making mention of any Merite, do yet by our doctrine raise vp the courages of the faithfull with singular comfort, when we teach thē that in their works they please God, and are vndoubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea & also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to saie, vnlesse he do first with assured confidence of mind determine that he shal please God.

8 Wherefore let vs not suffer our selues to be led so much as one haire bredth away from this onely foundation: which being laid, wise builders do afterward well and orderly builde vpon it. For if there be need of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in mind, that the sonne of God hath appeared to this ende, that he might destroy the workes of the diuell: that they should not sin which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gentiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercy chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from al filthinesse. But all is spoken at once, when it is shewed that Christ wil haue such disciples, which forsaking themselues, and taking vp their crosse, doe followe him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut off the root of al euils, that he may no more seek those things that are his own. He that hath taken vp his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildnesse. But the example of Christ conteineth both these and all other duties of godlines & holinesse. He shewed himself obedient to his father, euen to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the works of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glorie of his father: he gaue his soule for his brethren: he both both did good and wished good to his enemies. If there be need of comfort, these wil bring marueilous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made careful: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: we are brought low, but we are not confounded: we are throwne downe, but we do not perish: alway bearing about with vs in our body the mortifying of Iesus Christ, that the life of Iesus may be manifestly shewed in vs, that if we bee dead with him, we shal also liue together with him: if we suffer with him, we shall also reigne together with him: that we be so fashioned like to his suffringes, till we attaine to the likenesse of his resurrection: For as much as the Father hath predestinate these to be fashioned like the image of his sonne, whom, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotté among al his brethren: and therfore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shal seuer vs from the loue of God which is in Christ: but rather all things shal turne to vs to good & to saluation. Lo, we do not iustifie a man by workes before God: but we say, that al they that are of God, are regenerate and made a new creature, that they may passe out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteousnes, & that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are iudged as trees by the fruites.

The xvj. Chapter.

With this one worde may the shamelesnesse of certaine vngodlie men bee confuted, which slander vs with saying that wee destroye good workes, and doe draw men awaie from the following of them, when wee say that they are not iustified by workes: nor doe deserue saluation: and againe, that wee make too easie a way to righteousnesse, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, and that we doe by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined thereto alreadie. These slanders (I say) are with that one worde sufficiently confuted: yet I wil briefly answere to them both. They alleadge that by the iustification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leaue vnspoken, what manner of men be these zealous louers of good workes which doe so backbite vs. Let them haue licence as freely to raile as they doe licentiously infect the whole worlde with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they be grieued, that when faith is so gloriously aduaunced, workes are driuen downe out of their place. What if they be more raised vp, and stablished? For neither doe we dreame of a faith voide of good workes, nor a iustification that is without them. This onlie is the difference, that when we confesse that faith and good workes doe necessarily hang together, yet we set iustification in faith not in works. For what reason we do so, we haue in readinesse easily to declare, if we doe but turne to Christ vnto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiueth her whole strength. Why therefore are we iustified by faith? because by faith wee take holde of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But

this thou canſt not take holde of, but that thou muſt alſo therewithall take hold of ſanctification. For he was giuen to vs, for righteouſnes, wiſedome, ſanctification, and redemption. Therefore Chriſt iuſtifieth none whom he doeth not alſo ſanctifie. For theſe benefites are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnſeparable knotte, that whom he enlightneth with his wiſedome, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth, he iuſtifieth: whom he iuſtifieth, he ſanctifieth. But foraſmuch as our queſtion is onely of righteouſnes and ſanctifying, let vs ſtay vpon theſe. We maie put difference betweene them, yet Chriſt containeth them both vnſeparably in himſelfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteouſneſſe in Chriſt? Thou muſt firſt poſſeſſe Chriſt: and thou canſt not poſſeſſe him, but that thou muſt be made partaker of his ſanctification: becauſe he cannot be torne in pieces. Sith therefore the Lorde doeth graunt vs theſe benefites to be enioyed none otherwiſe than in giuing himſelfe, he giueth them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appeareth howe true it is, that we are iuſtified not without workes, and yet not by workes: becauſe in the partaking of Chriſt, whereby wee are iuſtified, is no leſſe contained ſanctification than righteouſneſſe.

1.Cor.1.30.

Neither is the affection of vvel-doing hereby coo-led in men vvhen they are taught that the good vvhich they doe, meriteth not the revvard vvhich they ſhall receiue for doing: the ſcripture hath o-ther motions than thu vvhen it pro-voketh vnto good vvorkes.

2 That alſo is moſt falſe, that the mindes of men are withdrawen from the affection of weldoing, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers muſt be warned, that they fooliſhly reaſon from rewarde to merite, as I ſhall afterwarde more plainely declare: namely, becauſe they know not this principle, that God is no leſſe liberall when he aſſigneth reward to workes, than when he giueth power to do wel. But this I had rather differre to the place fit for it. Now it ſhalbe inough to touch how weake their obiection is: which ſhalbe don two waies. For firſt whereas they ſaie that there ſhalbe no care of wel framing of life, but when hope of reward is ſet before them: they erre quite from the trueth. For if this onlie be entended when men ſerue God, that they looke to rewarde or let out to hire or ſel their labors to him, they litle preuaile: for God will be freely worſhipped, freely loued: he (I ſaie) alloweth that worſhipper, which whē all hope of receiuing reward is cut off, yet ceaſſeth not to worſhip him. Moreouer, if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put ſharper ſpurres vnto them, than thoſe that are taken of the end of our redemption and calling: ſuch as the word of God ſpurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is too wicked vnthankfulnes, not mutually to loue him againe which firſt loued vs: that by the blood of Chriſt our conſciences are cleanſed from dead workes, to ſerue the liuing God: that it is a hainous ſacrilege, if being once cleanſed, we defile our ſelues with newe filthineſſe, and prophane that holie blood: that wee are deliuered from the handes of our enemies, that wee may without feare ſerue him in holineſſe and righteouſneſſe before him all the dayes of our life: that we are made free from ſinne, that we may with a free Spirite follow righteouſneſſe: that our old man is crucified, that we may riſe againe into newneſſe of life: againe, that if we be dead with Chriſt (as becommeth his members) we muſt ſeeke thoſe things that are aboue, and muſt in the world be waifaring men from home, that wee maie long towarde heauen where is our treaſure: that the grace of

God hath appeared to this end, that forsaking al vngodlinesse and worldlie desires, we may liue soberly, holily, & godlily in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appearing of the glorie of the great God and sauiour: therefore that we are not appointed that wee should stirre vp wrath to our selues, but that we maie obteine saluation by Christ: that we are the tẽples of the holy Ghost, which it is not lawful to be defiled: that we are not darknesse, but light in the Lorde, which must walke as children of light: that we are not called to vncleanesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we abstaine from vnlawfull desires: that our calling is holie, that the same is not fulfilled but with pureness of life: that we are for this purpose deliuered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we be pricked foward to charitie with anie more liuely argument than that of Iohn, that we should mutually loue one an other as God hath loued vs? that herein his children doe differ from the children of the Diuell, the children of light from the children of darkenesse, because they abide in loue? Againe with that argument of Paul, that we if we cleaue to Christ, are the members of one bodie, which it is meet to be holpen one of an other with mutual duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holines than when we heare againe of Iohn, that all they that haue this hope, doe sanctifie themselues, because their God is holie? Againe of the mouth of Paul: that hauing the promise of adoption, we shoulde cleanse our selues from all the defiling of the flesh and spirite? then when wee heare Christ setting foorth himselfe for an example vnto vs that we shoulde followe his steppes?

3 And these few thinges I haue set forth for a taste: For if I should entend to goe through all, I should be driuen to make a long volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and rebukings, whereby they may instruct the man of God to euery good work, & that without anie mention of merite. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this that our saluation standeth vpon the onelie mercie of God and vpon no merite of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for vs but in the righteousnesse of Christ, when he commeth downe to morall exhortations, he beseecheth them by that mercie of God which he hath vouchsafed to extende to vs. And trulie this one cause ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs But if anie be not so vehemently moued with the glorie of God, yet the remembrance of his benefites ought to haue bin most sufficient to stirre vp such men to do well. But these men, which do peraduenture with thrusting in of merits beate out some seruile and constrained obediences of the law, doe falsly saie that we haue nothing whereby we may exhort men to good workes, because we go not the same waie to worke. As though God were much delighted with such obediẽces which protesteth ỹ he loueth a cherefull giuer, and forbiddeth any thing to be giuen as it were of heauinesse or of necessitie. Neither do I speake this for that I doe either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes vseth, that it maie leaue no meane vnattempted euery way to stirre vp our mindes. For it rehearseth the reward which God wil render to euerie man according to his workes. But I denie that that is the onelie thing, yea or the chiefe among manie. And then I graunt not that we ought to take beginning therat. Moreouer I affirme that it maketh nothing to the setting vp of such merites as these men boast of, as wee shall hereafter see. Last of all I saie that is to no profitable vse, vnlesse this doctrine haue first taken place, that wee are iustified by the onlie merit of Christ, which is conceiued by faith but by no merits of our works, because none can be fit to the endeuour of holinesse, vnlesse they haue first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the Prophet very wel signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercie ỹ thou maist be feared. For he sheewth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercie is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded & stablished Which is verie worthie to be noted, ỹ wee may know not onlie that the beginning of worshipping God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the feare of God (which the Papistes will haue to be meritorious) cannot haue the name of merit, because it is grounded vpon the pardon and forgiuenesse of sinnes.

Psal. 130.

To teach that God doth freely pardon sinners is no allurement vnto sinne.

4 But it is a most vaine slander, that men are allured to sinne, when wee affirme the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, in which we say that righteousnesse consisteth. For, we saie that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of ours be recompensed, and that therefore it shoulde neuer bee obteined, vnlesse it were freely giuen. Moreouer, that it is to vs in deede freely giuen, but not so to Christ which bought it so deerely, namely with his own most holie blood, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be paide to the iudgement of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holie blood is not shed so oft as they sinne. Furthermore, wee learne, that our filthines is such, as is neuer washed away but with the fountaine of this most pure bloud. Ought not they that heare these thinges, to conceiue a greater horrour of sinne, than if it were saide that it is wiped away with the sprinkeling of good works? And if they haue anything of God, howe can they but dread being once cleansed, to wallowe themselues againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to trouble and infect the pureneſse of this fountaine? I haue washed my feete (saith the faithfull soule in Salomon) howe shall I againe defile them? Nowe it is euident, whether sorte doe both more abase the forgiuenesse of sinnes, and do more make vile the dignitie of righteousnesse. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their doung: We affirme that the guiltinesse of sinne is more grieuous than can bee purged with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogatiue of the onelie bloud of Christ. They saie that righteousnes if it faile at anie time) is restored and repaired by satisfactorie workes: wee thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with anie recompence of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof wee must flie to the onelie mercie of God. As for the rest of those thinges that pertaine to the forgiuenesse of sinnes, let them be sought out of the next Chapter.

Cant. 3. 5.

The

The xvii. Chapter.

The agreement of the promises of the lavv and the Gospel.

NOwe let vs also go through the other argumentes wherewith Satan by the souldiers of his garde, goeth about either to ouerthrowe or batter the iustification of faith. This I thinke we haue alreadie wrung from the slaunderers, that they can no more charge vs as enemies of good workes. For, iustification is taken away from good workes, not that no good works should be done, or that those which be done shuld be denied to be good, but that we should not put affiannce in them, nor glorie in them, nor ascribe saluation vnto them. For this is our affiance, this is our glory, and the only author of our saluatiō, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him the sonnes of God, and heires of the heauenly kingdom, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But because they doe beside these assaile vs, as we haue saide, with other engines, goe to, let vs go forwarde in beating away these also. First they come backe to the promises of the lawe, which the Lorde did set foorth to the keepers of his lawe: and they aske whether we will haue them to be vtterly voyde or effectuall. Because it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are voide, they take it for confessed that they are of some effectualnesse. Hereupon they reason that we are not iustified by only faith. For thus saith the Lord: and it shalbe, if thou shalt here these commaundementes and iudgements, and shal keepe them & do them, the Lord also shal keepe with thee his couenant and mercy which he hath sworne to thy fathers, he shall loue thee and multiply thee, and blesse thee, &c. Againe, If ye shall well direct your waies and your endeuours, if ye walk not after strange Gods, if ye do iudgement betwene man and man, and go not backe into malice, I will walke in the middest of you. I will not recite a thousand peeces of the same sort, which sith they nothing differ in sense, shalbe declared by the solution of these. In a summe, Moses testifieth that in the law is set forth blissing and curse, death and life. Thus therfore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and fruitlesse, or that iustification is not of faith alone. We haue already before shewed, howe if we sticke fast in the law, ouer vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth only curse which is threatned to ᵀtrāsgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his law, such as there is none found. This therfore remaineth, that al mankind is by the law accused, and subiect to curse & the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needs goe out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into liberty from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdrawe vs from the keeping of the law, should allure vs to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staies being broken and with loose reins to run at riot: but the spirituall libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a dismayed and ouerthrowen conscience, shewing it to be free from the curse and damnation wherewith the lawe helde it downe bounde and fast tyed. This deliuerance from the subiection of the lawe, and Manumission (as I may call it) wee obtaine when by faith wee take holde of the mercie of Iustification by faith alone doth not make the promises of the lavv fruitlesse.

God

God in Christ, whereby we are certified and assured of the righteousnesse of sinnes, with the feeling whereof the law did pricke and bite vs.

The promises offered in the lawe should be vneffectuall if Christ did not stand vs in steade of fulfilling that righteousnesse vvhereupon the promises hang. Gal.2.16.

2 By this reason euen the promises that were offred vs in the law, should be all vneffectuall and voyde, vnlesse the goodnesse of God by the Gospell did helpe. For, this condition that we keepe the whole lawe, vpon which the promises hang, and whereby alone they are to be performed, shal neuer be fulfilled. And the Lorde so helpeth, not by leauing part of righteousnes in our workes, and supplying parte by his mercifull bearing with vs, but when he setteth onely Christ for the fulfilling of righteousnesse. For the Apostle, when he had before saide that he and other Iewes beleeued in Iesus Christ, knowing that man is not iustified by the workes of the lawe, addeth a reason: not that they should be holpen to fulnesse of righteousnesse by the faith of Christ, but by it should be iustified not by the workes of the lawe. If the faithfull remoue from the law into faith, that they may in faith finde righteousnesse which they see to be absent from the lawe: truely they forsake the righteousnesse of the lawe. Therefore now let him that list, amplifie the rewardinges which are saide to be prepared for the keeper of the law, so that he therwithal consider that it commeth to passe by our peruersnesse, that we feele no fruite thereof till we haue obteined an other righteousnesse of faith. So Dauid, when he made mention of the rewarding which the Lorde hath prepared for his seruantes, by and by descendeth to the reknowledging of sinnes, whereby that same rewarding is made voyde. Also in the xix. Psalme, he gloriously setteth foorth the benefites of the law, but he by and by crieth out: Who shal vnderstand his faultes? Lord cleanse me from my secret faults. This place altogether agreeth with the place before, where when he had said that al the waies of the Lord are goodnes & truth to them that feare him, he addeth: For thy names sake Lord, thou shalt be mercifull to my peruersenesse, for it is much. So ought wee also to reknowledge, that there is indeed the good wil of God set forth vnto vs in the law, if we might deserue it by works, but that the same neuer commeth to vs by the deseruing of workes.

The vnperfect vvorkes of beleeuers rewarded vvith that vvhich is promised vnto the perfect obseruers of the lavv: vvhereof there are three causes. Leuit.18. Ezec.20.11. Rom.10.5.

3 How then? are they giuē that they should vanish away without fruite? I haue euen now already protested that the same is not my meaning. I saie verily that they vtter not their effectualnes toward vs, so long as they haue respect to the merite of workes, and that therefore if they be considered in themselues, they be after a certaine manner abolished. If the Apostle teacheth that this noble promise: I haue giuen you commaundementes, which who so shall do shall liue in them, is of no value if we stand still in it, & shall neuer a whit more profit than if it had not beene giuen at al: because it belongeth not euen to the most holie seruants of God, which are al far from the fulfilling of the law, but are compassed about with manie transgressions. But when the promises of the Gospel are put in place of them, which do offer free forgiuenesse of sinnes, they bring to passe that not onlie we our selues be acceptable to God, but that our workes also haue their thank: & not this only that the Lord accepteth them, but also extendeth to thē the blessinges which were by couenant due to the keping of ẏ law. I grant therfore, that those thinges which the Lorde hath promised in his law to the followers of righteousnesse and holinesse, are rendered to the workes of the faithful: but in this rendring the cause is alwaies to be considered that powreth grace to workes. Now causes we see that there be three. The first is, ỹ God turning away his sight from the workes of his seruaunts, which alwaie deserue rather reproch than praise, embraceth them in Christ, and by the onely meane of faith reconcileth them to himselfe without the meane of workes. The second, that of his fatherly kindnes and tender mercifulnes, he lifteth vp workes to so great honour, not weying the worthines of them, that he accounteth them of some value. The third, that he receiueth the very same works with pardō, not imputing the imperfection, wherewith they al being defiled should otherwise be rather reckoned among sins than vertues. And hereby appeareth how much the Sophisters haue bin deceiued, which thought they had gaily escaped al absurdities, whē they said ỹ works do not of their own inward goodnesse auaile to deserue saluatiō, but by the forme of the couenant, because the Lord hath of his liberality so much esteemed them. But in the meane time they considered not, how farre those workes which they woulde haue to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promises, vnles there went before both iustification grounded vpon onely faith, and the forgiuenes of sins, by which euen the good workes themselues haue neede to be wiped from spottes. Therfore of three causes of Gods liberalitie, by which it is brought to passe that the works of ỹ faithfull are acceptable, they noted but one, and suppressed two, yea and those the principall.

4 These alledge the saying of Peter, which Luke rehearseth in the Actes: I finde in trueth that God is not an accepter of persons: but in euery nation he that doth righteousnes is acceptable to him. And hereupon they gather that which seemeth to be vndoubted, that if man doeth by right endeuours get himselfe the fauour of God, it is not the beneficial gift of God alone that he obteineth saluation, yea that God doth so of his mercie helpe a sinner, that he is by works bowed to mercie. But you can in no wise make the Scriptures agree together, vnlesse you note a double accepting of man with God. For, such as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby he may be inclined to mercie, but onelie miserie. If therefore it bee certaine that man is naked and needie of all goodnesse, and on the other full stuffed and loden with al kinds of euils, when God first receiueth them: for what qualitie, I pray you, shall we saie that he is worthie of the heauenly calling? Away therefore with the vaine imagining of merites, where God so euidently setteth out his free mercifulnesse. For, that which in the same place is saide by the voyce of the Angels to Cornelius, that his prayers and almes had ascended into the sight of God, is by these men most lewdly wrested, that man by endeuour of good works is prepared to receiue the grace of God. For it must needes be that Cornelius was alreadie enlightened with the spirite of wisedome, sith he was endued with true wisedom, namely with the feare of God: that he was sanctified with the same Spirit, sith he was a follower of righteousnesse, which the Apostle teacheth to be a most certain fruit thereof. All these things therefore which are said to haue pleased God in him, he hath of his grace, so farre is it off that he did oy his own endeuor prepare himselfe to receiue it. Truly there cannot one syllable of the scripture be brought foorth, that agreeth not with this doctrine, ỹ there is none other cause for God to accept man vnto him, but because he seeth that mã should be euery way lost, if he be left to himselfe: but because he will not haue him lost, he vseth his owne mercie in deliuering him. Nowe wee see howe this accepting hath not regard to the righteousnesse of man, but is a mere token of the goodnes of God towarde men being miserable and most vnworthie of so great a benefite.

The good vvorkes of faithfull men acceptable vnto God, howbeit not because they are vvorthie to be accepted, but for that the mercie of God louing their persons embraceth their vvorkes, their vnvvorthinesse notvvithstanding

5 But after that the Lorde hath brought man out of the bottomlesse depth of destruction, and seuered him to himselfe by grace of adoption: because he hath new begotten him and newly formed him into a newe life, he nowe embraceth him, as a new creature with the giftes of his spirite. This is that accepting whereof Peter maketh mention, by which the faithfull are after their vocation allured of God euen in respect also of workes: for the Lord cannot but loue & kisse those good things which he worketh in them by his Spirit. But this is alway to be remembred, that they are none otherwise acceptable to God in respect of workes, but in as much as for their cause & for their sakes, whatsoeuer good workes he hath giuen them in encreasing of his liberalitie, he also vouchsaueth to accept. For whence haue they good workes, but because the Lorde, as he hath chosen them for vessels vnto honour, so wil garnish them with true godlines? Whereby also are they accounted good, as though there were nothing wanting in them, but because the kinde Father tenderly graunteth pardon to those deformities & spottes that cleaue to them? Summarily, he signifieth nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and louely in whom he seeth the marks & features of his owne face. For we haue in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing of the image of God in vs. Forasmuch as therefore whersoeuer the Lord beholdeth his own face, he both worthilie loueth it and hath it in honour: it is not without cause saide, that ỹ life of the faithfull being framed to holines & righteousnes pleaseth him, but because the godly being clothed with mortal flesh, are yet sinners, and their good woorkes are but begunne and sauouring of the faultinesse of the flesh: hee cannot be fauourable neither to those nor to these: vnlesse hee more embrace them in Christ than in themselues. After this maner are those places to be taken, which testifie that GOD is kinde and mercifull to the followers of righteousnesse. Moses saide to the Israelites, The Lorde thy God keepeth couenant, to a thousand generations: which their whole heart. The same wordes are also repeated of Nehemias. For,

Nehe.1.5. Deut.29.18.

as in all the couenants of his mercie, the Lord likewise on their behalfe requireth of his seruauntes vprightnesse and holinesse of life, that his goodnesse should not be made a mockerie, and that no man swelling with vaine reioysing by reason thereof shoulde blesse his owne soule, walking in the meane time in the peruersnesse of his own heart: so his will is by this way to keepe in their duetie them that are admitted into the communion of the couenant: yet neuertheleſſe the couenant it ſelf is both made at the beginning free, & perpetually remaineth ſuch. After this manner Dauid when he glorieth that there was rendred to him rewarde of the cleanneſſe of his handes, yet omitteth not that fountain which I haue ſpoken of, that he was drawen out of the wombe, becauſe God loued him: where he ſo ſetteth out the goodnes of his cauſe, that he abateth nothing frō the free mercy which goeth before al giftes, whereof it is the beginning. 2. Sam. 22. 21.

6 And here by the way it ſhalbe profitable to touch what theſe formes of ſpeaking doe differ from the promiſes of the lawe. I call promiſes of the lawe, not thoſe which are echewhere commonly written in the boekes of Moſes (for as much as in them alſo are found many promiſes of the Goſpel) but thoſe which properly belong to the miniſterie of the law. Such promiſes, by what name ſoeuer you liſt to call them, doe declare that there is rewarde ready vpon condition, if thou doe that whic his commaunded thee. But when it is ſaide, that the Lord keepeth the couenant of mercie to them which loue him, therein is rather ſhewed what maner of men be his ſeruātes which haue faithfully receiued his couenaunt, than the cauſe is expreſſed why the Lord ſhould doe good to them. Nowe this is the manner of ſhewing it. As the Lord vouchſafeth to grant vs the grace of eternal life, to this end that he ſhould be loued, feared, and honored of vs: ſo whatſoeuer promiſes there are of his mercie in the Scriptures, they are rightfully directed to this end that we ſhould reuerence and worſhip the author of the benefites. So oft therefore as we heare that he doth good to them that keepe his law, let vs remember that the children of God are there ſignified by the duetie which ought to be continuall in them: that we are for this cauſe adopted, that we ſhould honour him for our Father. Therfore leaſt we ſhoulde diſherite our ſelues from the right adoption, we muſt alway endeuour to this whereunto our calling tendeth. But let vs againe keepe this in minde, that the accompliſhment of the mercie of God hangeth not vpō the works of the faithfull: but that he therefore fulfilleth the promiſe of ſaluation to them which aunſwere to their calling in vprightnes of life, becauſe in them he acknowledgeth the natural tokens of his children which are ruled with his ſpirite vnto good. Heereunto let that be referred, which is in the xv. Pſalme ſpoken of the Citizens of the Church, Lorde who ſhall dwel in thy tabernacle, and who ſhall reſt in thy holy hill? The innocent in handes and of a cleane heart, &c. Againe in Eſaie, Who ſhall dwell with deuouring fire? He that doth righteouſneſſe, he that ſpeaketh right thinges, &c. For there is not deſcribed the ſtay wherupon the faithful may ſtand before the Lord, but the manner wherewith the moſt merciſull father bringeth them into his ſelowſhippe, and therein defendeth and ſtrengtheneth them. For, becauſe he abhorreth ſinne, he loueth righteouſneſſe: whom he ioyneth to himſelfe, them he cleanſeth with his ſpirite, that he may make them of like faſhion to himſelfe and his kingdome. Therefore if the queſtion bee of the firſt cauſe whereby the entrie is made open to the holy ones into the kingdom of God, from whence they haue that they may ſtand faſt & abide in it, we haue this aunſwere ready, becauſe the Lorde by his mercie both hath once adopted thē, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the queſti- Eſa. 33. 14.

on be of the maner, then we must come down to regeneration & the fruits thereof, which are rehearsed in that Psalme.

In what sense the commaundements of God are called righteousnesse.

7 But there seemeth to be much more hardnesse in these places, which doe both garnish good workes with the title of righteousnesse, and affirmoth that man is iustified by them. Of the first sorte there be verie manie places, where the obseruinges of the commaundementes are called iustifications or righteousnesses. Of the other sort, that is an example which is in Moses. This shalbe our righteousnesse, if we keepe all these commaundementes. And if thou take exception and saie that this is a promise of the law, which being knit to a condition impossible, proueth nothing. There be other of which you can not make the same aunswere, as this: And that shalbe to thee for righteousnesse before the Lord, to redeliuer to the poore man his pledge, &c. Againe, that which the Prophete saieth, that the zeale in reuenging the shame of Israel, was imputed to Phinees for righteousnesse. Therefore the Pharisees of our time thinke that here they haue a large matter to triumphe vpon. For when wee saie, that when the righteousnesse of faith is set vp, the iustification of workes giueth place, by the same right they make this argument: if righteousnesse be of workes, then it is falsse that we are iustified by faith onely. Though I graunt that the commaundementes of the lawe are called righteousnesses: it is no maruell: for they are so indeede. Howe be it wee must warne the readers that the Greciãs haue not fitly translated the Hebrue word Hucmi, Dikeomata, righteousnesses for commaundementes. But for the worde, I willingly release my quarell. For neither doe we denie this to the lawe of GOD, that it conteineth perfect righteousnesse. For although, because we are debters of al the thinges that it commandeth, therefore euen when we haue performed ful obedience thereof, we are vnprofitable seruants: yet because the Lord vouchsafed to graunt it the honour of righteousnesse, we take not away that which he hath giuen. Therefore wee willingly confesse that the full odedience of the lawe is righteousnesse, that the keeping of euerie commaundement, is a parte of righteousnesse, if so be that the whole summe of righteousnesse were had in the other partes also. But we denie that there is anie where anie such forme of righteousnesse. And therefore we take away the righteousnesse of the law, not for that it is maimed and vnperfect of it selfe, but for that by reason of the weakenesse of our flesshe it is no where seene. But the Scripture not onely calleth simply the commaundements of the Lord, righteousnesses: but it also giueth this name to the workes of the holie ones. As when it reporteth that Zacharie and his wife walked in the righteousnesses of the Lorde: truely when it so speaketh, it weigheth workes rather by the nature of the law, than by their own proper stare. Howbeit here againe is that to be noted, which I euen now saide, that of the negligence of the Greeke translatour is not a lawe to be made. But for asmuch as Luke woulde alter nothing in the receiued translation, I wil also not striue about it. For God hath cõmanded these things that are in the law to men for righteousnesse: but this righteousnesse we performe not but in keeping the whole lawe: for by euery transgression it is broken. Whereas therfore the law doth nothing but prescribe righteousnesse: if we

haue respect to it, all the seuerall commaundements thereof are righteousnesse: if we haue respect to men of whom they are done, they doe not obteine the praise of righteousnesse by one worke, being trespassers in many, and by that same worke which is euer partly faultie by reason of imperfection.

8 But nowe I come to the seconde kinde, in which is the chiefe hardnesse, Paul hath nothing more strong to proue the righteousnesse of faith, than that which is written of Abraham, that his faith was imputed to him for righteousnesse. Sith therefore it is saide that the act done by Phinees was imputed to him for righteousnesse: what Paul affirmeth of faith, the same may we also conclude of workes. Whereupon our aduersaries, as though they had wonne the victorie, determine that we are indeede not iustified without faith, but that wee are also not iustified by it alone, and that workes accompliſh our righteousnesse. Therefore here I beseech the godly, that if they know that the true rule of righteousnesse is to be taken out of the Scripture onely, they will religiously & earnestly weigh with me, howe the scripture may without cauillations be rightly made to agree with it self. For as much as Paul knewe that the iustification of faith is the refuge for them that are destitute of their owne righteousnesse, he doeth boldly conclude that all they that are iustified by faith, are excluded from the righteousnesse of works But sith it is certaine that the iustification of faith is common to all the faithfull, he doth thereof with like boldnesse conclude that no man is iustified by workes, but rather contrariwise that men are iustified without any helpe of workes. But it is one thing to dispute of what value workes are by themselues, and an other thing what account is to bee made of them after the stablishing of the righteousnesse of faith. If wee shal set a price vpon workes according to their worthinesse, we saie that they are vnworthie to come into the sight of God: and therefore that man hath no workes whereof he may glorie before God: then, that being spoyled of all help of works he is iustified by onely faith. Nowe we define righteousnesse thus, that a sinner being receiued into the cõmunion of Christ is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleansed with his blood he obteineth forgiuenesse of sinnes, & being clothed with his righteousnes as with his owne, he standeth assured before the heauenly iudgement seat. When the forgiuenesse of sinnes is set before, the good workes which followe haue nowe another valuation than after their owne deseruing: because whatsoeuer is in them vnperfect, is couered with the perfection of Christ: whatsoeuer spots or filthinesse there is, it is wiped away with his cleannesse, that it may not come into the examination of the iudgement of God. Therefore when the guiltines of all trespasses is blotted out, wherby men are hindered that they can bring foorth nothing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont also to defile good workes: the good workes which the faithfull doe are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteousnesse.

In what sense man is said to be iust by workes, & the act of Phinees to haue bene imputed vnto righteousnesse. Gen. 4.4. Psal. 106. 31.

It commeth of the righteousnesse which is by faith without workes that the workes of faithfull men are accounted righteous.

9 Now if anie man obiect this against me to assaile the righteousnesse of faith, first I will aske whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holie workes, being in the rest of the woorkes of his life a trespasser of the lawe. This is more than an absurditie. Then I will aske if he bee counted righteous for manie good workes, if he be in any part founde guiltie. This also he shall not be so bolde to affirme, when the penall ordinance of the lawe crieth out against it, and proclaimeth all them accursed which haue not fulfilled all the commaundementes of the lawe to the vttermost. Moreouer, I will goe further and aske, whether there be anie worke that deserueth to be accused of no vncleanesse or imperfection. And howe coulde there be any such before those eyes, to whom euen the very starres are not cleane enough, nor the Angels righteous enough? So shall hee be compelled to graunt that there is no good worke which is not so defiled with transgressions adioyned with it, and with the corruptnesse of it selfe, that it can not haue the honour of righteousnesse. Nowe if it be certaine that it proceedeth from the righteousnesse of faith that workes which are otherwise vnpure, vncleane, and but halfe workes, not worthie of the sight of God, much lesse of his loue, are imputed to righteousnesse, why do they with boasting of the righteousnesse of workes destroie the iustification of faith, whereas if this iustification were not, they shoulde in vaine boast of that righteousnesse? Will they make a vipers birth? For thereto tend the saying of the vngodlie men. They cannot denie that the iustification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cause, matter, and substance of the righteousnesse of workes: yet they conclude that man is not iustified by faith, because good workes also are accounted for righteousnesse. Therefore let vs passe these follies and confesse as the trueth is, that if the righteousnesse of workes of what sort soeuer it bee accounted, hangeth vpon the iustification of faith, it is by this not onelie nothing minished but also confirmed, namely whereby the strength thereof appeareth more mightie. Neither yet let vs thinke that workes are so commended after free iustification, that they also afterward come into the place of iustifying a man, or doe parte the office betweene them and faith. For vnlesse the iustification remaine alway whole, the vncleanesse of works shall be vncouered. And it is no absurditie, that a man is so iustified by faith that not only he himselfe is righteous, but also his works are esteemed righteous aboue their worthines.

Deut. 27.

Not onelie vvee but our vvorks also iustified by faith in Christ: & therefore the righteousnesse of vvorkes a thing both vnder and after the righteousnes of faith.

10 After this manner we will graunt in workes not onely a righteousnesse in parte (as our aduersaries themselues would haue) but also that it is allowed of God as if it were a perfect & full righteousnes. But if we remember vpon what foundation it is vpholden, al the difficultie shal be dissolued. For then and not till then it beginneth to bee an acceptable worke, when it is receiued with pardon. Nowe whence commeth pardon, but because God beholdeth both vs and all our thinges in Christ? Therfore as we, when we are graffed into Christ, doe therefore appeare righteous before God, because our wickednesses are couered with his innocencie, so our works are & be taken for righteous, because whatsoeuer faultinesse is otherwise in them, being buried in the cleanesse of Christ, it is not imputed. So wee maie rightfully say, that by onely faith not onely we but also our works are iustified. Nowe if this righteousnesse of workes of what sort soeuer it bee, hangeth vpon faith and free iustification, and is made of it: it ought to bee inclo-

ded vnder it, and to be set vnder it as the effect vnder the cause thereof, as I may so call it: so farre is it off that it ought to be raised vp either to destroye or darken it. So Paul to driue men to confesse that our blessednesse consisteth of the mercie of God, not of works, chiefely enforceth that saying of Dauid, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiuen, and whose sinnes are couered. Blessed is he to whome the Lord hath not imputed sinne. If any man do thrust into the contrarie innumerable sayings wherein blessednesse seemeth to be giuen to workes, as are these: Blessed is the man which feareth the Lord, which hath pitie on the poore, which hath not walked in the counsel of the wicked which beareth temptation: Blessed are they which keepe iudgement; ỹ vndefiled, the poore in Spirit, ỹ meek, the mercifull, &c. they shall not make but that it shalbe true which Paul saieth, For because those things that are there commended are neuer so in man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miserable, vnlesse he be deliuered from miserie by forgiuenesse of sinnes. Forasmuch as therefore all the kindes of blessednesse which are extolled in the Scriptures, do fall donwe voide, so that man receiueth fruite of none of them, till hee haue obtained blessednesse by forgiuenesse of sinnes, which may afterward make place for them: it followeth that this is not onely the highest and the chiefe but also the only blessednesse: vnlesse peraduenture you wil haue that it be weakened of those which consist in it alone. Nowe there is much lesse reason why the calling of men righteous should trouble vs, which is commonly giuen to the faithfull. I grant verily that they are called righteous of the holinesse of life: but forasmuch as they rather endeuour to the following of righteousnes, than do fulfil righteousnes it selfe, it is meete that this righteousnesse such as it is, giue place to the iustification of faith, frō whence it hath that which it is.

Rom.4.7 Psal.32 Psal.113 Psal.14.21 Psal.1.1 Iam.1.12 Psa.106.3 & 119.1 Mat.5.3

S. James maketh nothing against iustificatiō by faith alone vvithout vvorks. For he speaketh not of such a faith as is meant by S. Paul in deliuering this doctrine.

11 But they say that wee haue yet more businesse with Iames, namely which with open voice fighteth against vs. For he teacheth both that Abraham was iustified by workes, and also that all we are iustified by workes, not by faith only. What then? wil they drawe Paul to fight with Iames? If they hold Iames for a minister of Christ, his saying must be so taken that it disagree not from Christ speaking by the mouth of Paul, The holy Ghost affirmeth by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteousnes by faith, not by works: and we also do teache that all are iustified by faith without the workes of the law. The same holy Ghost teacheth by Iames that both Abraham righteousnesse and ours consisteth of works, not of only faith. It is certaine that the holy Ghost fighteth not with himself. What agreement shall there be therfore of these two? It is enough for the aduersaries, if they pluck the righteousnes of faith which wee would haue to bee fastened with moste deepe rootes: but to render to consciences their quietnesse, they haue no great care. Whereby verily you may see that they gnawe the iustification of faith, but in the meane time doe appoint no marke of righteousnesse where consciences may stay. Therefore let them triumph as they list, so that they may boast of no other victorie than that they haue taken away all certaintie of righteousnesse. And this wretched victorie they shall obtaine, where the light of trueth being quenched, the Lord shal suffer them to ouerſpread the darkneſſe of lies. But whereſoeuer the trueth of God ſhall ſtande, they ſhall nothing preuaile. I denie therfore that the ſaying of Iames which they ſtil continually hold vp againſt vs as it were the ſhield of Achilles doth any thing at all make for them. That this may be made plaine, firſt wee muſt looke at the marke that the Apoſtle ſhooteth at: and then wee muſt note where they be deceiued. Becauſe there were then manie (which miſchiefe is wont to be continual in the Church) which openly bewrayed their infidelitie, in neglecting and omitting all the proper workes of the faithful, and yet ceaſſed not to boaſt of the falſe name of faith: Iames doeth here mock the fooliſh boldnes of ſuch men. Therefore it is not his purpoſe in any point to diminiſh the force of true faith, but to ſhewe how fondly thoſe triflers did chalenge ſo much the vaine image of it, that being contented herewith they careleſly ranne diſſolutely abrode into all licentiouſnes of vices. This ground being conceiued, it ſhalbe eaſie to perceiue where our aduerſaries doe miſſe. For they fall into two deceites in the word, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word of iuſtifying. Whereas the Apoſtle nameth faith a vaine opinion farre diſtant from the trueth of faith, it is ſpoken by way of granting, which is no derogation to the matter: which he ſheweth at the beginning in theſe wordes. What profiteth it, my brethren, if any man ſay ỹ he hath faith, & hath no works? He doth not ſay, if any haue faith without works, but, If any man boaſt. More plainly alſo he ſpeaketh a litle after, where he in mockerie maketh it worſe than the diuels knowledge: laſt of al, when he calleth it dead. But by the definition you may ſufficiently perceiue what he meaneth. Thou beleeueſt (ſaith he) that there is a God. Truely if nothing be contained in this faith but to beleeue that there is a God, it is now no maruell if it doe not iuſtifie. And when this is taken from it, let vs not thinke that anye thing is abated from the Chriſtian faith, the nature whereof is farre otherwiſe. For after what maner doeth true faith iuſtifie vs, but when it conioyneth vs with Chriſt, that being made one with him wee may enioy the partaking of his righteouſneſſe? It doth not therefore iuſtifie vs by this that it conceiueth a knowledge of the being of God, but by this that it reſteth vpon the aſſurednes of the mercy of God.

Neither doth S Iames vſe the vvord Iuſtification, as S. Paul doth, but in a meaning far different: S. Paul meaning thereby the imputation of righteouſneſſe and S. Iames the declaration of that righteouſnes by vvorkes, vvhich vvithout vvorkes vvas imputed.

12 We haue not yet the worke, vnleſſe we examine alſo the other deceit in the word, foraſmuch as Iames ſetteth part of iuſtification in works. If you will make Iames agreing both with the reſt of the Scriptures, & with himſelf, you muſt of neceſſitie take the worde of Iuſtifying in another ſignification than it is taken in Paul. For Paul ſaith that we are iuſtified, when the remembrance of our vnrighteouſnes being blotted out, wee are accounted righteous. If Iames had meant of that taking, he had wrongfully alledged that out of Moſes: Abraham beleeued God, &c. For he thus frameth it together. Abraham by workes obtained righteouſnes, becauſe he ſticked not at ỹ commandement of God, to offer vp his ſonne. And ſo the ſcripture was fulfilled, which ſaith, that he beleeued God, and it was imputed to him for righteouſnes. If it be an abſurditie, that the effect is before his cauſe, either Moſes doeth in that place falſely teſtifie, that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteouſnes: or he deſerued not righteouſnes by that obedience which hee ſhewed in offering vp of Iſaac. Abraham was iuſtified by his faith, when

Ismael was not yet conceiued, which was now growen past childehood before that Isaac was borne. How therefore shal we say, that he got to himselfe righteousnes by obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either Iames did wrongfully misturne the order (which it is a wickednesse to think) or he meant not to say that he was iustified, as though he deserued to be accounted righteous. How then? Truely it appeareth that he speaketh of the declaratiō of righteousnes & not the imputatiō: as if he had said: Who so are righteous by true faith, they do proue their righteousnes with obedience & good works, not with a bare & imagelike visor of faith. In a summe, he disputeth not by what meane we are iustified, but he requireth of the faithful a working righteousnes. And as Paul affirmeth that men be iustified without the help of works: so Iames doeth here suffer them to be accounted righteous which want good works. The considering of this end, shal deliuer vs out of all dout. For our aduersaries are hereby chiefely deceiued, that they think that Iames defineth the manner of iustifying, whereas hee trauaileth about nothing else but to ouerthrowe their peruerse careleſnesse, which did vainly pretend faith to excuse their despising of good works. Therefore into how many wayes soeuer they wrest the words of Iames, they shall wring out nothing but two sentences: that a vaine bodilesse shewe of faith doth not iustifie, and that a faithful man not contented with such an imaginatiue shewe, doth declare his righteousnes by good workes.

13 As for that which they alleage out of Paul, the same meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers, are iustified, it nothing helpeth them, I will not escape away with the solution of Ambrose, that that is therefore spoken because the fulfilling of the lawe is faith in Christ. For I see that it is but a meere starting hole, which nothing needeth where there is a broad way open. There the Apostle throweth downe the Iewes from fooliſh confidence, which boasted themselues of the onely knowledge of the lawe, when in the meane time they were the greatest despisers of it. Therefore that they shoulde not stande so much in their owne conceit for the bare knowledge of the law, he warneth them, that if righteousnesse bee sought out of the lawe, not the knowledge but the obseruing of it is required. Wee verily make no doubt of this that the righteousnes of the law standeth in workes: nor yet of this also, that the righteousnesse consisteth in the worthines and merites of workes. But it is not yet proued, that we are iustified by workes, vnlesse they bring forth some man that hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant none otherwise, the hanging togither of the text shalbe a sufficient testimonie. After that he had generally condemned the Gentiles and the Iewes of vnrighteousnesse, then he descended to the particular shewing of it, and saith, that they which sinned without the Lawe, doe perish without the Law: which is spoken of the Gentiles: but they which haue sinned in the lawe, are iudged by the lawe: which pertaineth to the Iewes. Nowe because they winking at their owne trespassinges proudly gloried of the onely lawe: he adioyneth that which most fitly agreed, that the law was not therefore made, that men should bee made righteous by onely hearing of the voice therof: but then and not till then when they obeied, as if he should saie: Seekest thou righteousnes in the law: alleage not y hearing of it, which of it self is of ſmall importance, but bring workes, by which thou maiſt declare that the lavv was not ſet for thee in vaine. Of theſe workes becauſe they were al deſtitute, it followed that they were ſpoiled of glorying of the lavv. Therefore we muſt of the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrarie argument.

The righteouſneſſe of the lawe conſiſteth in the perfection of workes. No man can boaſt that he hath by workes ſatisfied the lavv. Therefore there is no righteouſnes by the lawe.

The proteſtations vvhich faithfull men do make of their innocency in the ſight of god, are no arguments that they ſuppoſed them ſelues therby iuſtified before him.
